If, in the hasty reading that I gave to these resolutions, I misapprehended their tenor in any particular, the Senator, as he has them before him, can correct me; but if there is any breach of the privileges of this body, so far as I have committed any, I am ready to be responsible for it in the proper way. Sir, I have spoken of the message of the President of the United States in a speech which I made here, not in terms so strong and so direct as those used by the Legislature, but in terms which involved the same thing. I was sorry to be compelled to do so; but I believed it to be my duty to do so, and in discharging that duty I kept myself as nearly as I possibly could within parliamentary and proper language, taking care, however, to express distinctly the idea which I entertained of that message. The Legislature of Maine has used terms rather stronger and more direct, as they were compelled to do in passing a short resolution, in expressing the same idea; but I have yet to learn that there are no occasions upon which duty may compel a member of the Senate, or may compel the Legislature of a sovereign State to speak distinctly and directly of the character of a communication made to Congress by the Chief Magistrate of the United States.

Sir, if the Chief Magistrate of the United States chooses to indorse and make his own what is false in fact, it is a matter that involves his own personal honor, and he must be responsible for it, like other men, to public opinion. The President of the United States made statements, in the communication alluded to in these resolutions, which I undertook to show upon this floor, he must have known to be incorrect when he made them. I used no offensive epithets with regard to him; I use none now, because I choose to use no offensive epithets with regard to any person, unless absolutely compelled to do so; but if my duty calls upon me to state a fact, and to expose statements that have been made by officers high in the public confidence, it makes no difference how high they are; the higher they stand, the greater is the breach of duty they perform, and the more clear and distinct we should be in pointing out the fact to the attention of the American people.

The Legislature of the State of Maine has done no more than that, and the Senator from Virginia may make such motion as he chooses. I have presented the resolutions on my own responsibility as a Senator. I do not desire to shield myself behind the fact that I am a Senator of the State, and bound to present them. I present them willingly, cheerfully, because they tell the truth, in my judgment; and whether they are printed or not, according to the common mode of proceeding of the Senate, is a matter of great indifference to me. I have presented them, respectfully, to the Senate. I leave them at the disposition of the Senate, with the ordinary motion that they be laid upon the table, and printed.

Mr. MASON. I did not mean at all to challenge or to invite any expression of opinion on the part of the honorable Senator from Maine upon the resolutions of his State. I have too high an estimate of the relation that subsists between a Senator and his State, officially and personally, to have asked or desired any opinion of the honorable Senator as to the act of his State.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I took the opportunity of expressing it.

Mr. MASON. The Senator had a perfect right to do so. I only mean to say that I did not ask it or desire it. But, sir, I would say to that honorable Senator, that however he or any other Senator, under the responsibility of his position here as a Senator, may, and may properly, attack any department of this Government, and is bound to do so when, in his judgment, the occasion for it has arisen, the question is a very different one when one of the States of this Union, in no manner responsible to the Senate, makes the Senate the medium of communicating its opinions of the correlative branches of the Government. Sir, if the State of Maine entertains the opinions, the extraordinary opinions, expressed in these resolutions of the conduct of the President of the United States, I should have thought the State of Maine—as any honorable person in society—would have addressed their opinion directly to the party himself; and what I mean to protest against is only that the Senate, a branch of the Government, should be made the medium of a communication of opinions of that kind in regard to a coördinate branch of the Government, disrespectful to the Senate, disrespectful to the country, whose organ, to some extent, the Senate is. There is a vast difference between a communication of this sort coming from one outside of the Senate, whether a State or an individual, and the expression of like opinions by a Senator on this floor, who not only has the right to do it, but is bound to do it; but does it under his responsibilities to the body of which he is a constituent member.

On looking at the resolutions since they were read at the table, I find that I was in error in the opinions ascribed to the judiciary of the United States. The Senator is right; the language leveled at the judiciary there is leveled at the judiciary of Kansas. I had thought, as the State felt itself at liberty to speak in the terms it did speak, not of the present Congress certainly, but of the Congress of the United States, and felt itself at liberty to speak as it has spoken of the present President of the United States, that it would only have made the circle complete to include the judiciary of the United States; but I find, on looking at it closely, that the judiciary there spoken of is the judiciary of Kansas. The language used by the State of Maine towards the Government, of which it is only a constituent, is this:

"That the Missouri compromise was a solemn compact between the free and slave States; that its perfidious breach in 1854 deserved, as it received, the universal condemnation of our Legislature and people, without regard to party, and such remains the unalterable conviction of the State."

Then, as to the President:

"That the recent message of the President of the United States is a falsification of the history of Kansas, a libel upon the free people of that Territory, and a deep disgrace to the American name and to the office once filled by Washington."

Now, what I mean to say is this: that if there be a State in the Union that considers itself at liberty to make the Senate of the United States the medium of conveying such opinions of the Congress or of the President to those organs of the Government, or to the people of the United States, I trust that the example set by the State of Maine will remain forever a solitary, as it will be a memorable, example. I shall make no motion in relation to the resolutions, coming from a State.

The resolutions were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

EXTENSION OF SLAVERY.

Mr. SEWARD. With the leave of the Senate, I will present a communication on the same or a kindred subject, which is expressed in temperate language, and in a benevolent spirit. I perform a duty which I owe to the Society of Friends, recently assembled in the city of New York, by whose instructions I present this remonstrance to the Senate:

The memorial of the representatives of the religious Society of Friends in the State of New York, and parts adjacent, respectfully shows:

That, as the object of religious association is not only to promote the spiritual and eternal interests of the children of men, but to ameliorate, as far as may be, their moral and physical condition, we feel ourselves under obligations to endeavor practically to carry out the benign precepts of our holy religion, which, in a social point of view, are concisely summed up in the injunction—"Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them;" and which perfectly accords with the anthem which ushered in the Gospel dispensation, namely: "On earth peace, good will toward men."

Feeling our hearts influenced, we trust, by that spirit of good will which prompts us to greet every man as a brother, irrespective of nationality or color, and knowing that even millions of our fellow-creatures are now held in a state of servitude subversive of their natural rights, and derogatory to all the intellectual and physical blessings which the light of the age and the otherwise liberal institutions of our country are so well calculated to confer; and seeing, too, that a disposition is manifested to extend the institution of African slavery over territory still unblighted by its pernicious influence, we hereby remonstrate against any action whereby the evils of slavery may be in any wise extended.

Signed on behalf of the meeting of representatives aforesaid, held in New York, the fourth day of third month, 1855.

WILLIAM WOOD, Clerk.

William F. Mott, James Brown, William Cromwell, David Sands, William Titus, Committee on Presentation.

I will state that I have been on the performance of a similar duty in presenting their memorial directly to the President of the United States; and I express the public wish that, if all other agencies fail to arrest this great evil, I hope a blessing may attend this mode, which is the last that is probably open.

The memorial was ordered to lie on the table.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. CAMERON submitted, informally, a substitute which he intends to offer for the Pacific railroad bill; which was ordered to be printed.

ADMISSION OF MINNESOTA.

Mr. IVERSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Army bill, (H. R. No. 313.)

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The unfinished business of yesterday is the bill admitting Minnesota.

Mr. IVERSON. The hour for the consideration of that bill has not arrived.

Mr. STUART. I would suggest to the honorable Senator from Georgia that it is within four minutes of one o'clock, when the unfinished business of yesterday will come up. Certainly within that time we cannot dispose of the Army bill. I am anxious to dispose of the Minnesota question, inasmuch as it is before the Senate, and I know of no reason why we may not dispose of it to-day; but I hope the Senator will not press his motion at this time.

Mr. IVERSON. I do not consider that the Minnesota bill is to be disposed of in this body so soon as the Senator expects. There were amendments offered yesterday, and I doubt very much whether it can be passed through the Senate to-day; and, as we are to adjourn over until Monday, I consider it important that the Army bill should be disposed of now. As I said yesterday, a single day is of great importance to the Administration in this matter. If we are to give the Government any additional force, we ought to do it promptly; but if we are not to do it, we ought to reject the bill promptly, and let them understand what they are to rely upon. I think we had better take up the Army bill and go through that; it will not probably take long; and then the Minnesota bill can be taken up, but I doubt whether that can be passed to-day. I must insist on my motion to take up the Army bill, and when one o'clock arrives, I shall insist on the Minnesota bill being laid aside.

Mr. HALE. How long will it be before the hour will arrive for the consideration of the Minnesota bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Two minutes and a half.

Mr. HALE. It seems to me hardly worth while to take up the Army bill in that time. It will hardly pass in that time. I think there is nothing about which gentlemen make greater mistakes than they do as to the time necessary to pass the Army bill. I recollect that when it was first taken up the chairman, not now in his seat, intimated that he thought about ten minutes would be enough to pass it. He was rather earnest that it should be taken up at that time. It was taken up. I think that was at least ten weeks ago, and it was nearly seven weeks before the bill came to a vote in the Senate, and I am certain it will take more than ten minutes to pass or to defeat this bill. I hope, then, as the time is so near at hand, only one minute, when the Minnesota bill will come up, that we shall take up the Minnesota bill instead of the Army bill.

Mr. IVERSON. I shall move to take up the Army bill, and if that fails, I shall move when the hour comes on, to postpone the Minnesota bill. On that question I shall call for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will call the attention of the Senate to the special order, which comes up at this hour. It is the bill for the admission of Minnesota.

Mr. IVERSON. I move to postpone that bill, with a view to take up the Army bill.

Mr. STUART called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 10, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Biggs, Clay, Fitzpatrick, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Kennedy, Mason, Sebastian, Slidell, and Yulee—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Bigler, Bright, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Fessenden, Fitch, Foot, Foster, Green, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, King, Pearce, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Toombs, Trumbull, and Wade—32.

So the motion was not agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 86) to admit the State of Minnesota into the Union. Yesterday Mr. DOUGLAS moved to strike out the second section of the bill, which is in the following words:

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That said State shall be entitled to one Representative, and such additional Representatives, in Congress, as the population of said State, according to the census authorized by the act approved February 26, 1856, shall show it to be entitled to according to the present ratio of representation, and no more."

Mr. MASON moved to amend the section by striking out all after the word "Representative," and inserting "in the Congress of the United States," so as to make the section read: "That said State shall be entitled to one Representative in the Congress of the United States." The first question is on Mr. Mason's amendment.

Mr. MASON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not desire to detain the Senate by speaking at all at length, but I have a word to say on this question. The Minnesota enabling act contains the very language which is contained in the second section of this bill:

"And the said State shall be entitled to one Representative, and such additional Representatives as the population of the State, shall, according to the census, show it would be entitled to according to the present ratio of representation."

That is the precise language contained in the present bill for the admission of Minnesota into the Union. They have complied with the provisions of the enabling act in this respect, and the bill now follows the language of the enabling act; and it seems to me but just to the State of Minnesota that she should have her Representatives according to her population. It would not be just to allow her but one Representative, if she has, in fact, a population of two hundred and forty thousand, as is contended by the honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr. GREEN.]

I beg leave to state that there was other evidence, as I understand, before the convention in Minnesota, at the time the number of Representatives was fixed—proofs of the amount of population derived from the kind of census taken by the assessors of Minnesota—showing that she had sufficient population for three members. At all events, this section leaves the question to the House of Representatives, where it properly belongs. They are entitled to one Representative, at all events; and when the question of admission comes up in the House of Representatives, that House will determine whether there is more than one Representative entitled to admission; and they will pass on the fact. On the section as it stands, they are entitled to one Representative, at all events; and then if the House of Representatives shall be satisfied that their population entitles them to more, they will admit more to their seats; otherwise, they will not. Now, it is unjust that they should be restricted to one member at the present time. It is known that the State of Minnesota is becoming populous very fast. The State of Wisconsin to-day has a population of seven hundred thousand, and we have but three Representatives in the other branch. Minnesota has a population, undoubtedly, of two hundred thousand, according to the best evidence; and by many it is believed to reach two hundred and fifty thousand. It would be unjust to confine them to one Representative; but this section, as it is, leaves the matter to be determined by the House of Representatives. I prefer, altogether, that that section should stand as it is reported by the committee.

Mr. TOOMBS. In order to attain the object which I have in view, I do not know but that it may be necessary to strike out the whole section. I quite agree with the Senator from Wisconsin, that to strike out the latter clause, and leave Minnesota with but one Representative, is wrong. As he properly states, this section is in the identical language of the enabling act, and it may be that it would be improper to change it; but I prefer to strike it out entirely, because the enabling act is the law governing the case now, and if we strike out this provision, we shall leave the House of Representatives to interpret that act for themselves. It is their business, not the business of the Senate. Congress passed an act proposing certain terms, on compliance with which Minnesota should come into the Union. Really there is nothing to be done now but, as the Judiciary Committee reported the other day, for Congress to say that there has been a compliance. The terms of admission are all agreed upon; they are specified in the enabling act. One of those terms is, that she shall have one Representative in Congress, and as many more as her census may entitle her to. It turns out, from some defect, as they allege, or some want of attention on the part of those who were to take the census, probably the Government or its officers, that there was an imperfect census taken. The census returned in time probably did not show more than one hundred and forty thousand inhabitants; but they propose to show, by other evidence alimunde, that the population does in truth reach two hundred thousand or two hundred and fifty thousand. The arrangement for taking the census was inadequate, there being no provision made for payment for it; and in one case the official returns show only fifty inhabitants in a district where three hundred votes were actually polled. This is an illustration showing the imperfection of the census. Now, I propose that this section be stricken out, so that the law of the land governing the case being embraced in the enabling act, the House of Representatives may determine for themselves whether Minnesota is entitled to one, two, or three Representatives under that act. I do not see any necessity for this section. It cannot alter the rights of anybody.

Mr. COLLAMER. The honorable Senator was not present yesterday when I explained why this section was inserted in the bill. On the first view of the case, I thought, as the Senator now suggests, that we need not say anything about the representation; and that by so doing we should leave it to be settled by the House of Representatives, under the enabling act; but inasmuch as, after the passage of the enabling act, the convention which formed the constitution had put in it a provision that there should be three Representatives in the other House, the opinion was entertained that if we admitted them, without any exclusion of a conclusion to the contrary, we admitted them with their constitution, and gave them three members. This section was inserted with a view to rebut any presumption of that kind, and to leave it as the original act did. This section is in the very words of the enabling act.

Mr. TOOMBS. Then I think I can make a proposition on which I shall agree with my honorable friend from Vermont. I attach not the slightest importance to that clause in the constitution of Minnesota, on a subject over which they have not the least control. It is a mere nullity. They cannot fix their representation in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. COLLAMER. The gentleman does not understand me. We supposed that if they put it into their constitution, and we accepted them with that constitution, we should thereby agree that they should have three members, unless we inserted some provision excluding that conclusion.

Mr. TOOMBS. I understand the Senator, and I will tell him how we can agree. Though I talk pretty fast, it seems his ideas run ahead of me. I propose to exclude any such conclusion, by inserting a provision, that nothing in this act shall be construed to entitle Minnesota to three members, according to her constitution. That is a matter over which Congress has control. The constitution was a curious place in which to insert any such provision. It does not concern any of her domestic institutions. Her relations to this Government are fixed by another standard. If she had elected three hundred instead of three persons, as Representatives, that could not have altered our rights. Nor do I think that if we admit her simply on the basis that she has complied with the enabling act, and that her constitution is republican, it can be construed into an assent by Congress to this provision of her constitution. To exclude any such conclusion, however, I propose, if we strike out this section, to move the insertion of a provision, declaring that we do not affirm her right to three members.

Mr. COLLAMER. Does the section do anything more than the gentleman now states?

Mr. TOOMBS. I think not. It says she shall be entitled to one member, and such additional members as her population may show her to be entitled to. I want the House of Representatives to settle the question of its own members under that enabling act, and say whether she is entitled to one, two, or three. To accomplish the object which I have indicated, I give notice, that if the pending amendment be voted down, as I hope it will be, and then the section be stricken out, I shall move to insert a clause, providing that nothing in this act of admission shall be construed to entitle her to the three members claimed in her constitution.

Mr. BIGLER. I concur mainly in what has been said by the Senator from Georgia on the main question. I do not propose to discuss it, except to say that I think the vote cast is perhaps the best data we have as to the population. That, I understand, was about forty thousand; which, on a moderate calculation, would give a population of two hundred thousand, or two hundred and twenty thousand. I think, on that calculation, it would be illiberal, if not unjust, to confine Minnesota to a single Representative. My object in rising is to explain the vote which I am about to give. The effect of the proposition of the Senator from Virginia will be to confine the representation to a single member. That I am not willing to agree to; but I voted yesterday against the motion to strike out "one" and insert "two." I did that with the intention of voting for the motion of the Senator from Illinois to strike out the whole section, thus leaving the question to the House of Representatives. It seems to me to be eminently proper that the House of Representatives should say whether Minnesota shall have one, two, or three members. I desire to say, therefore, that I shall vote against the proposition of the Senator from Virginia; but in doing that, I may seem to be inconsistent with my vote yesterday. I shall vote against it; and then vote to strike out the section.

Mr. POLK. For myself, sir, on this question I am in favor not only of not striking out this section, but I am in favor of leaving it as it is. I am satisfied myself that equal justice to this State requires it. If we take the vote that was cast at the election in Minnesota last fall, and multiply it by six, which has been done by some gentlemen for the purpose of getting at the true amount of population of the State, it would give two hundred and forty thousand; and still that would not reach the actual population of the State. I am well satisfied that the Indians in that Territory have not been regarded in the census as a basis of population, nor even the half-breeds, though there are many of them settled on the lands of the Territory, and cultivating those lands as agriculturists, just as the best population in the Territory is doing.

I am also satisfied of another fact: that in many instances persons have been registered by the census-takers who went to Minnesota as a great many went into Kansas; they went there for the purpose of settling themselves; they marked out their lands; they commenced their improvements, but had not got their houses comfortably fixed yet so as to bring their families into them, and their families were not there when the census was taken for that reason. Most of those families are there by this time, or, in almost all cases, will be there by the close of the present season. I differ entirely with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] on this point. I think that in such a case the domicile of a man and his family is not in Vermont or in whatever other State he may have left, but in Minnesota, if he had gone there and commenced making his home, and had not yet taken his family only because he had not made his home comfortable enough to bring his family into it.

I am satisfied, therefore, that the population of that Territory is more than the two hundred and forty thousand, which is the conclusion at which some gentlemen have arrived, by multiplying the amount of votes by six. There is a further consideration to be borne in mind. Minnesota is about equal, in point of square miles, to the aggregate territory of both the States of Ohio and Pennsylvania; and in many instances the voting precincts were so far apart that there were many men who were really entitled to vote who were not able to get to the precincts and vote; much less were they able to get registered. In some of the counties, the gentlemen who undertook to take the census were not actual inhabitants of the county. In the county of Todd, for instance, as I am informed, the census that was attempted to be taken was taken by a gentleman who did not reside in the county, but who was a storekeeper in the neighborhood; and probably he returned only such persons as came to his store and registered their names themselves. The census of that county, I think, showed about forty residents, and the vote actually cast was one hundred.

In voting upon this question, I, for one, will not consent to shut my eyes to what I know to be the condition of a new State like Minnesota—a frontier State, where society is not settled down, and where the people are not surrounded with all the conveniences for their voting or registration, that belong to the older States. I am opposed to the motion that is before the Senate, and, so far from going for that, I am in favor of giving this new State three Representatives in the Congress of the United States; and I do not believe, then, that she will have anything more than very meager justice meted out to her. I hope that, in voting on this question, gentlemen will not overlook the fact that the settlements in these new States are of such a kind that you cannot apply to them the same standard that you apply to an old State that was in the Confederacy when it was first formed under the Constitution. I have been told by a gentleman who has had the very best means of judging, that, in one county especially, nearly all the voters were in the category I first named; that is, they were there making their farms, building their houses, getting ready to bring their families there just as soon as they should make their homes comfortable; but the families were not there, not because that was not their residence, not because they did not mean to bring them there, but only because the physical circumstances by which they were surrounded were such as to make the father of a family forego their presence only because he could not do otherwise, and do his duty to his wife and children.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It is well that we should be sure that we understand the legal effect of what we are about to do. I confess that I have my doubts as to whether the legal effect of my proposition is to be what the Senator from Georgia understands that it will be. If his amendment be added to it, I think it will then produce the opposite result to that which I desire. My proposition is to strike out the second section of the bill, in order to admit three members from Minnesota. The Senator from Georgia thinks that will not be the legal effect of it, and he proposes to exclude that conclusion by inserting a provision that nothing contained in the bill shall be construed to admit three members from Minnesota. I am very sure that if his amendment be adopted, and the bill be passed in that shape, Minnesota would have but one member under the law, as it would then stand according to the enabling act. If we are to be governed strictly by that, I suppose Minnesota can have but one Representative. The provision of the enabling act is, that she shall have one, and such additional Representatives as the census ordered by that act shall show her to be entitled to. Now, the census taken under that act, and returned here, does not show population enough for an additional member; and if, therefore, we decide the question according to the strict terms of that law, she will be restricted to one member. If we send the bill in that shape to the House of Representatives, the House will have no discretion to go beyond the law. The two Houses of Congress, by law, may say we have satisfactory evidence outside of the census, unofficial evidence, that justifies us in disregarding the official, and assigning to Minnesota two or three Representatives; but if the law provides that she shall have only such number as the census returns show that she is entitled to, and those returns only show that she is entitled to one member, the House of Representatives cannot go beyond that one.

I think, therefore, the effect of the proposition of the Senator from Georgia is to restrict the number to one, and to give the House of Representatives no discretion beyond that number. I know that he does not intend that result; I know he does not desire it; but such, it strikes me, will be the legal effect of the proposition. According to the terms of the provision, as it is now in the bill, which I move to strike out, I think the House of Representatives would be restricted to the admission of one member. If we say that Minnesota shall have as many members as she is entitled to by the census which has been taken, and if we are to decide according to the terms of that census as they are before us, she is technically entitled to but one member. I think we may act on other information that is satisfactory to us; that convinces us that, although the census shows a population of only one hundred and forty-nine or one hundred and fifty thousand, she has largely more than that, probably two hundred and twenty or two hundred and forty thousand. I think we may act upon that evidence, which, though unofficial, is yet satisfactory to us, and allow to Minnesota a proportionate number of Representatives. I go for the additional member on that kind of evidence—the same that I acted upon in the Texas case and the California case—to which I referred yesterday; but, if we are to confine ourselves to the technicalities of the law, she will be restricted to one member.

If we pass the bill with this section in its present language, so that the House must be confined to the technical language of the law, the House must restrict her to one member. I have made the motion to strike out, under the impression that if we admit the State without saying anything on the subject, we give our assent to the provision of her constitution for the election of three members. The Senator from Georgia, however, thinks that would not be the effect; but that in that event she would fall back on the enabling act; and I think, under the terms of the enabling act, she is confined to one member; in my opinion unjustly confined to one. I am inclined to think, therefore, that perhaps we had better make our propositions specifically, and say that we will give her three members, or if not three, that we will give her two; or if we cannot agree to that, we will give her one. I think we had better say exactly what we are going to give, lest we may have a result declared in the House of Representatives different from that we intend. My impression is, that the striking out of the second section would, in effect, decide that she would have three members; but I believe it is better to say so distinctly, if we think she is entitled to three; or if we cannot get three, then let us give two; but let us not deceive ourselves by the terms we may use, in regard to the effect of our own action. I make these suggestions to the Senator from Georgia, because he and I wish to arrive at the same result by our action; and I hope he will direct his attention to the use of such phraseology as will accomplish the object.

Mr. TOOMBS. I presume the Senator from Illinois and myself desire to attain the same object; but he having moved yesterday to strike out this section with a view to allow three members to Minnesota, and that motion having failed—

Mr. DOUGLAS. It has not been voted upon. The proposition to allow two members has failed; but my proposition to allow three has not yet been voted upon.

Mr. TOOMBS. I was informed that the vote had been taken, and that the proposition had been rejected.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If I knew the fate of my motion, I should know exactly how to shape my action.

Mr. TOOMBS. That being the case, I shall vote for the motion to strike out, as I think the question is one more properly to be settled by the House of Representatives. I would leave that House to determine it according to their judgment of the facts under this law, or let them make a new law on account of that one having been improperly executed; and when they send such a law to us, I apprehend the Senate will be perfectly willing to take it as they have passed it, they being judges of the elections, qualifications, and returns, of their own members. That question being so peculiarly and constitutionally within their jurisdiction, I choose to let them act upon it without being trammelled by any action of this body. I do not regard the constitution of Minnesota as in any way controlling this question. I think that provision of the constitution entirely nugatory. It is a question for the House of Representatives, or for Congress; and I prefer that the House should take into consideration all the circumstances. I am ready to vote for allowing three members; but if that be not acceded to, I will vote to leave the matter to be settled by the House of Representatives. I know that the population of Minnesota is large, and increasing; and I recollect that when Wisconsin was admitted, the argument was expressly made that the rapidity with which population was pouring in would entitle her to more Representatives before the next census; and she came in with three members, if my memory does not fail me. This was unusual: it was a larger number than any census which had been taken would allow her; but on account of her peculiar position and the rapid increase of her population, she was allowed three members of Congress. I think Minnesota ought to have three members. I believe she has sufficient population for that. Supposing that this body had already voted down the motion to strike out the second section, and thinking it a more appropriate question for the House of Representatives, I was willing to leave it a blank, to be filled by that House. The question not having yet been taken, I shall vote for the motion to strike out when it is taken.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will make a proposition by which, I think, we can get distinctly at the object. Instead of moving merely to strike out the second section, I propose to insert, in lieu of it, a provision that until the next general apportionment the State of Minnesota shall have three Representatives.

Mr. GWIN. I hope that motion will prevail. I wish to allow Minnesota three members, and I shall do everything I can by my vote to accomplish that object. I do not place much reliance on these census returns. I recollect that in the case of California only ninety-two thousand people were returned, when we had three hundred thousand or four hundred thousand. It is evident that there is an immense emigration going to Minnesota all the time, and before the next census her population will be much more than enough to entitle her to this number of members. My State is entitled to six members at this time, according to her population. I wish to give to Minnesota the three members she has elected. I believe that if the census were properly taken, it would show that she has now population sufficient for that. It is well known that it is very difficult to take the census in a new State; it is almost impossible to get the numbers of the entire population.

Before taking my seat, I desire to ask the Senator from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on Territories, what objection, if any, he has to inserting in this bill, now when we are disposing of the Territories that wish to become States, a proposition to admit Oregon? We know that she has gone through all the forms. I have her constitution before me. It has been submitted to the other House, and it certainly will be here very soon. There are none of the objections to her admission that I have heard urged in regard to other States; and it seems to me that this is the proper time to dispose of the question. I hope the Senator from Illinois will have no objection to an amendment of that description to this bill.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will say, in response to the Senator from California, that I have not brought up a proposition for the admission of Oregon, for the reason that I have received no official information that she has made a constitution. She has sent no constitution here. We have no facts, no evidence, before us, showing that to be the case. Nor has the President so informed us; nor have we any official information, from any source, on the subject. Having learned, from the newspapers, that a convention had been held there; that it had formed a constitution, and it had been submitted to and ratified by the people, I have wondered why it was that it had not found its way here. I spoke to the Delegate in the other House, General Lane, about it, and I told him that I understood that he had presented it to the House of Representatives. He said he had; but he thought he had better let it sleep until the contest about Kansas and Minnesota was over. I said to him that whenever he desired action here, and would furnish me with a copy of the constitution of Oregon, properly certified, I would take great pleasure in initiating the steps at once for her admission. He thanked me for the suggestion, and said he would attend to it. He has not done so yet, and hence we have nothing here to act upon.

Mr. GWIN. I have made this suggestion at the request of the Delegate from Oregon in the other House. He has furnished me with a copy of the constitution, which is here in House document No. 58, and he requested that I should bring the subject to the notice of the Senate. Like the Senator from Illinois, I have been somewhat surprised to find that the subject has not been brought before the Senate. The Delegate from Oregon yesterday informed me that he would be exceedingly glad if the question could be disposed of now. There being no objection to Oregon that I can see, it having gone through all those forms the want of which has been objected to in Kansas and Minnesota, the constitution having been framed and submitted to the people in various forms and voted upon, I thought the Senator from Illinois, as chairman of the Committee on Territories, with this official document before him, might frame an amendment to this bill by which it could be brought in.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I should do so, but I have never seen the constitution of Oregon. I do not know what is in it; I do not know the boundaries of the proposed new State; I do not know anything concerning it. I have never set eyes on the document; and, if I should offer a proposition, it would be at random. I do not know whether her constitution is such a one as I can sanction or not; but I suppose it is. I should think, however, the Delegate would present it to the Senate, and refer it to the committee. Let the committee read over the constitution, and report the facts. I should take great pleasure in calling a special session of the committee at any moment for immediate action upon it; and I would hurry it through as fast as I could; but I do not feel authorized to take a paper which I have never yet had an opportunity of reading, and move the admission of a State on it, when I do not know what it contained.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope there will be no effort to unite the two. In regard to the question of Minnesota, there is no doubt about it; all are prepared to vote for her admission; but there may be some doubt in regard to Oregon. At any rate, the constitution of that proposed State has not been examined and investigated by the committee. None of us have ever seen the facts (I have not, for one) in regard to the constitution; nor have I seen the constitution itself. I hope that the measures will be taken up separately. If application is made for Oregon, let it be submitted to the committee and reported upon regularly, as a separate measure. There is no doubt in regard to Minnesota; Congress has given its permission in advance in the shape of an enabling act; and if she has complied with that, she is entitled to come in without being delayed.

Mr. BROWN. I am very desirous to vote for the admission of Minnesota. We stand agreed, honorably bound, to admit her, and I shall regret exceedingly if anything be put into this bill which shall forbid me recording my vote in favor of it. I must say, in all sincerity, that I do not like this proposition to give Minnesota three Representatives. I understand that you are to take a census of the population as a starting point, and then that your authority is to apportion your representation according to the population. I do not understand that it is within the province of Congress to guess the population of an old or a new State, and apportion its representation on mere guess-work. If you are going to guess for Minnesota, why not guess for all the States? If you were about to apportion the representation among other States, and I were to come in here as a Representative, and say, the "census was incorrectly taken in my State; I tell you that I believe we have one hundred thousand people more than the census shows," are you to depart from the rule prescribed by the Constitution, and not to apportion the representation according to the census, but according to the guess of a Representative from a State? and if so, where are you to drift to? But, sir, this does not happen to be guess-work coming from Minnesota; it is guess-work outside of the State, and made up on the loosest possible calculation. One Senator tells us the number of votes, and makes a calculation on the supposition that there are six members of a family to every voter, and thus he brings up the population to two hundred and forty thousand. What sort of a way of taking a census is that? Did the framers of the Constitution ever dream of ascertaining the population of a State by any such rule?

Then, sir, when you come to look at the State, what is it? A new State, to which young and enterprising men have gone, leaving the women and children in the older State, as they always do. Six to a family may be a very good estimate for Rhode Island, or Connecticut, or Virginia, but it is an over-estimate for any new country on the face of the earth; because to such countries men go, and the women and children stay at home. You have got no such population there. This is a proposition to give to Minnesota a representation in the other House of Congress to which her population does not entitle her—a proposition to unhinge the balance of representation between the States, and to give to one State an advantage over the other States. I protest against it. The census shows that Minnesota has a population of a little over one hundred and forty thousand. Making a liberal estimate for the three counties from which no return has been made, she probably has one hundred and fifty thousand. For the first ninety-three thousand four hundred and twenty, she is clearly entitled to a Representative. South Carolina has a Representative for a fraction, and I believe California had one awarded to her for the largest fraction. The fraction in the case of Minnesota is even larger than that, and I am willing to vote her a Representative for that fraction; but I will not vote a Representative, ex gratia, on a population which she has not got.

Now that I am on this subject, and as I do not care to worry the Senate again, I may say that, while I shall vote for the admission of this State, desire to do it, mean to do it, and will do it—if you do not put something in the bill that absolutely drives me away from it—I want to do it because I wish to keep faith upon the slavery question. Minnesota comes here and asks for admission as a free State. I would yield more than I would in another case, lest I might be suspected of having broken faith on that point. I want to vote for it; I mean to do it; I will do it; I say again, unless I am driven from doing it; but, in doing that, I wish now to say, that I am in no manner to be suspected of approving the constitution of Minnesota. If I thought my vote was thus to be construed, I never could record it in favor of the admission of this State. I do not approve her constitution. There is very much in it to which I object.

I object to the very provision which leads to this debate—that a State shall undertake to say in her constitution how many Representatives in Congress she will have. She has no right to say any such thing. I object to other features of her constitution. I object to that clause which fixes the qualification of voters; and I undertake to say it is the most extraordinary that ever found its way into any constitution, State or national. Her constitution prescribes different classes of voters. The first is, "white citizens of the United States." They might as well have said white male citizens, for I believe women are citizens. The next class is, "white persons of foreign birth, who shall have declared their intention to become citizens conformably to the laws of the United States on the subject of naturalization." I object to that. Foreigners who have merely declared their intention to become citizens, in my opinion, ought not to be allowed to vote. What is an intention? It is a myth; it is nothing. A man may to-day have a very bona fide intention to become a citizen, but to-morrow he may have no intention ever to become so; and yet on making a mere declaration of such intention, a man is allowed to take part, not only in the elections of this State, but necessarily in the election of a President of the United States. I would permit no man to take part in the elections of this country who did not owe allegiance to the flag. Until he had sworn his allegiance to the Government, and would be guilty of treason in case he took up arms against it, he should have no part or lot in the elections, with my consent. What right has a man who to-morrow may take up arms against your Government, and yet commit no treason, to go to the ballot-box and take part in your elections? How many thousands, nay, how many hundreds of thousands of foreigners, unnaturalized, hostile to your country, to your Government, and to your Constitution, might, under that clause, vote upon a mere declaration of intention? How are you to punish a refusal to carry out an intention? A man may swear to it honestly; he may swear to it corruptly; but whether honestly or corruptly, you can never ascertain. That is a secret locked up in his own heart; a secret which can only be seen by the eye of the all-seeing Power who ruleth above—a secret not seen of men, and therefore not to be punished by men.

That is not all. The next class of voters is, "persons of mixed white and Indian blood, who have adopted the customs and habits of civilization." Is not that beautiful? An Indian who has adopted the habits of civilization is to be allowed to vote. I should like to know what amounts to adopting habits of civilization? I suppose if he put on a pair of pantaloons, a pair of spurs, and a shirt collar, he would then be a Georgia major fixed up; and if he got drunk, he would approximate to the highest degree of civilization. [Laughter.] Under that clause, there is not a breechless savage in all Minnesota that cannot be led up to the ballot-box and made to vote.

Mr. MASON. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. BROWN. Certainly.

Mr. MASON. They possibly intended to model it on the old Scotch usage that I remember having read of in one of the ballads for indicating the approach of the Highland men to civilization—when they put on pantaloons and left off cattle stealing. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROWN. I do not know how that is; but the language is, "habits of civilization."

Mr. TOOMBS. I ask my friend from Mississippi, does he at all dispute the right of Minnesota to allow anybody she pleases to vote within her limits?

Mr. BROWN. No, sir.

Mr. TOOMBS. Then cui bomo the argument?

Mr. BROWN. I am making it for the same reason that my friend from Ohio [Mr. FURN] the other day moved his amendment to the Kansas bill—not that I think there is anything in it, but I want to keep down clamor. I do not want to be misunderstood on this subject. I do not want to be understood as in any manner approving these provisions of this constitution when I vote for the admission of Minnesota; and therefore I point them out and comment upon them, and file my protest against them, so as to exclude any such conclusion hereafter. That is my whole object in doing it. I said in the outset, that if I supposed myself responsible for this constitution, if I was to be considered as approving it, I could not vote to admit the State. I do not believe that any State, old or new, ought to have any such provisions in its constitution. I feel that I have no power to strike them out; and if I had, my notion of State rights and State sovereignty is; that if Minnesota chose, she could put them back again to-morrow. I cannot control them; I can say, and will say, that I do not approve them. I do not say that I shall vote against this bill, even if you allow Minnesota three Representatives; yet I do not well see how I can vote for it then, with my notions of what is right. I hope the Senate will do no such thing. Give Minnesota the two Representatives to which her census entitles her, and then I think there can be no further controversy. If she has any right to ask another Representative on guess-work, I do not know but that I shall ask another for Mississippi. She has been populating very fast, and has a great many more people than she had when the last census was taken. I know that census in many counties was imperfectly taken. Let us stick to the record; to the census, as made under the Constitution. Make your apportionment according to that, and you will always be right, or somewhere in the neighborhood of it.

Mr. WILSON. I agree with the Senator from Mississippi, in regard to the restrictions that we ought to place on this State. Minnesota is a young, growing, and prosperous State; but we have only the evidence before us that she has about one hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants, and I do not see why we here should assume her to have a population entitling her to three Representatives. The State of Vermont, with more than three hundred thousand inhabitants has only three Representatives in the other House. Here is a State where the census has been taken. It may have been imperfectly taken; but it is here with only one hundred and forty-nine thousand inhabitants; and yet she is claiming, and Senators are claiming for her, that she should be allowed three Representatives. This State will grow, unquestionably. I am willing to give her one Representative now, and let her, if she chooses, take a new census, and have for the future, three, four, or five Representatives, if that census shall show her to be entitled to them.

The Senator from Mississippi complains of allowing civilized Indians to vote. I think the Senator ought not to complain of that, for he should remember that it was the votes of the civilized Indians that gave the State to the political party with which he acts, and without their votes it would have been beaten by a very decisive majority in the Territory. One the occasion of voting in one section of the State, a gentleman informed me that he himself witnessed this scene: there was near by the place of voting a large collection of Indians, in their native habits and costumes; one of your Indian agents, or a person connected with your Government, obtained some articles of apparel that civilized men wear; a few of those persons were robed in them, marched up to the ballot-box and voted; they were then carried back to the place where they were encamped, these articles of apparel were removed, and other persons robed in them; and this was carried on throughout the day, and a very large Indian vote was taken.

Mr. FITCH. Will the Senator from Massachusetts be kind enough to state the place where this happened?

Mr. WILSON. I cannot. It was told to me by a gentleman who said he witnessed it himself in one election precinct. I did not ask him where it occurred.

Mr. FITCH. I only wished to ascertain his informant's veracity. No such thing occurred.

Mr. WILSON. I do not certify to the fact, but I am so told.

Mr. FITCH. I understand.

Mr. WILSON. I have good reason to think that this was not a solitary instance of the kind. Now I propose to offer an amendment to the second section, if it be in order to move it now; but I suppose it is not in order to move it before the question is taken on striking out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is an amendment now pending.

Mr. WILSON. Let it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Clerk will again read the pending amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia.

The Clerk read the amendment, which is, in line two, of section two, after the word "Representative," to strike out the residue of the section and insert "in the Congress of the United States," so that the section will read:

"That said State shall be entitled to one Representative in the Congress of the United States."

Mr. WILSON. The amendment I propose I will read for information. It is to strike out all after the word "additional," in line two, and insert other words, so as to make it read:

"Said State shall be entitled to one Representative, and such additional number of Representatives hereafter as a census, hereafter to be taken, shall entitle the said State to have in the Congress of the United States."

The effect of this would be to admit Minnesota now with one Representative; and if she chooses to order a new census to be taken, she can do it as soon as she is admitted, and we give her authority here to have as many additional Representatives as that census shall show that she is entitled to. If she has three hundred thousand inhabitants, she would be entitled to two additional Representatives, and she could then elect those two Representatives and send them to this Congress, even before its adjournment; and for the next Congress she could have as many Representatives as her population would entitle her to. I think this is just and fair. I propose to admit this State with one Representative—all that her census entitles her to; but in view of the fact that she has a large fraction, and is increasing very rapidly, and probably has a larger population than her returns show, I am willing to allow her to take a new census to ascertain precisely what her population is, and to have the benefit of it just as soon as she chooses to take that census; and give her the privilege of electing an additional number of Representatives, one, two, three, or four. When it shall be in order, I shall move this amendment, which I think just, liberal, and fair.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I wish merely to make a single statement in relation to my vote. I doubt very much whether any of these amendments will improve the section that we have now under consideration. The Constitution of the United States provides, in the organization of the two bodies, that each House shall be judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its own members. It also provides that each State shall be entitled to at least one Representative. The section, as I now understand it in the bill, gives to the State of Minnesota one Representative, and it then goes on to provide that she shall be entitled to as many other Representatives as her population shall justify. That settles the whole question. The House of Representatives is the arbiter. It is for that House to determine, and for them to determine it upon such evidence as will satisfy the House, what number of members she is entitled to; and, it seems to me, that section, as it now stands, will not be improved by the amendments proposed. The House of Representatives must determine the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members. We say, in compliance with the Constitution, that Minnesota shall have one member certainly, and as many others as her population may entitle her to; and it is for the House to determine that question. It seems to me that the section is better than the amendments proposed will make it; and for that reason I shall vote to retain it in its present shape, and get it through as soon as we can.

While I am up, I desire to enter my protest against a doctrine which may be supposed to be advanced here in reference to the qualification of the voters of a State. This Government has no power under the Constitution of the United States to fix the qualification of voters in any sovereign State of this Confederacy. I want to enter my protest against the doctrine being indulged in or cultivated to any extent, that this Government has power to go inside a sovereign State, and prescribe the qualification of her voters at the ballot-box. It is for the State, and not for this Government, to do that. If the doctrine be once conceded that the Federal Government has the power to fix the qualification of voters in a State, the idea of State sovereignty is utopian. There is no such thing as State sovereignty, if this Government can fix the qualification of voters. We have no right to inquire into it. There are simply two things to be ascertained here: first, have we evidence that a State has been formed? second, have we evidence that it is republican in its character? These two things being ascertained, everything else is for the State that applies for admission into the Union.

Mr. MASON. In the amendment that is pending, which is the one I had the honor to offer yesterday, there is no purpose or design to deny or impair the proper representative weight of this new State of Minnesota. All that is designed by it, and its whole effect, will be to assign to her the representation to which she will be entitled according to the Constitution and the laws. All that is asked by the amendment is, that the Senate of the United States will not assign political power to that State in disregard of the Constitution and the laws—nothing more. If it appeared that she was entitled to three or to ten Representatives in the other House, I should be the last man, by any mode whatever, direct or indirect, to impair her proper power in the slightest degree; but I do humbly ask, not in my own name, but in behalf of that State which I represent, and which has, in common with the other States, a very deep interest in this question, that the laws and the Constitution shall be regarded in assigning political power to a State. That is all.

What are the facts? The enabling statute provided that when Minnesota came into the Union she should be entitled to one Representative at any rate—the Constitution assigns that, no matter what her population may be—and any other number to which she might appear to be entitled according to the census ordered by that statute of 1857. That is the law of the land. What have been the results under that census? It has been ascertained that the census has been returned from all the counties, I think, but three; the whole population thus returned amounts to about one hundred and forty-six thousand, and then making the estimate which gentlemen have chosen to do for their own information, (I hope not for their guidance,) of those counties from which there were no returns, based upon data given by those counties from which there were returns, the highest population assigned to it by the law is about one hundred and forty-nine thousand. That is the fact.

What says the Constitution in this most important matter of assigning to the States political power in the Union? The Constitution declares that that political power shall be assigned in proportion to population. It further declares that that population shall be ascertained by means of a decennial census, and the power to be assigned upon a census thus obtained. It provided for a census to be taken within three years after the government went into effect, and decennially thereafter. The last regular census was taken in 1850, a census ordered by law and by the Constitution. The representative number was then determined, in the distribution of political power among the States, to be one for every ninety-three thousand four hundred and twenty persons of Federal population; so that there is required by the Constitution a Federal population of ninety-three thousand four hundred and twenty for every Representative in the other branch; and the fact shown here is, that there is but one hundred and forty-nine thousand, at the outside, of actual population in Minnesota. What is proposed, then? That you shall assign to them political power, not only unknown to the Constitution, but forbidden by it; and for what purpose?

Mr. STUART. With the permission of the honorable Senator from Virginia, I wish to call his attention to a single point. Do I understand him to say that the Constitution of the United States governs, in this case, in that clause which provides for the general apportionment of Representatives in the House of Representatives for all the States decennially, and that it is not competent for Congress, between the time of taking each decennial census and making the apportionment, to resort to any other means of information?

Mr. MASON. Oh, no. I say the Constitution provided that there should be a decennial census for the purpose of apportioning representation, which is the assignment of political power to the different States; but, inasmuch as there is a power given to Congress to admit new States, and a provision that when admitted they shall stand on an equal footing with the other States, I do not mean to say that a power cannot be implied for Congress to do what was done in this enabling act, provide for a census to ascertain how Representatives should be apportioned to such new State in order to insure to her equality. I do not mean to deny that power.

Mr. STUART. That was not my question precisely. It was this: whether, in the admission of a new State and giving it its representation in the other House, Congress, in the opinion of the Senator, is confined to the taking of a census, in order to define what representation it will give; or whether it may resort to other means of information?

Mr. MASON. I should say very clearly that I could entertain no doubt on the proposition of the honorable Senator from Michigan. Congress cannot, within the pale of the Constitution, assign to the new State greater relative political weight than has been assigned to the existing States. I take that almost to be a truism. Then the Constitution having prescribed the mode of ascertaining the political power to be assigned to each State in the popular branch, and having made it to rest on population, and required that population to be ascertained by a census, it would follow, almost logically, that it is not in the power of Congress to give a representation to a new State, when she comes in, upon any ratio or by any rule except that of population ascertained under a Federal census. I should take that to be the true constitutional rule, and that has been done in the present case. The law authorizing Minnesota to erect herself into a State provided for a census and for the returns; and inasmuch as until that census was made and an apportionment based upon it, the actual amount of representation could not be ascertained, the same statute provided, within the terms of the Constitution, that she should at least have one Representative, and any more that she might appear to be entitled to after the census was taken. As I have said, the census was taken, and we are here now to carry out that enabling statute. What is required of us? That we shall assign one Representative, or more than one, as may appear to be the proper quota of the State upon the census which has thus been taken pursuant to the law. That is what we are here to do; to carry out the enabling statute in good faith, because that is in conformity to the Constitution. We are here for the purpose of determining whether, under the law and the Constitution, this State is entitled to more than one Representative; for, of course, she is entitled to at least one. How are we to do it? According to the very terms of the enabling statute, by seeing what her population is under the census. We have ascertained it; and we have ascertained that, although that population entitles her to one Representative, it does not entitle her to more than one. That is not a postulate; it is a fact.

Honorable Senators said yesterday, I think, that we might assign a second Representative, at least, because of the large fraction. That is unknown to the law fixing the rule of apportionment. No representation is assigned to a fraction by the law. It is very true that, in providing for the representation assigned to a State under the rule of apportionment by the law of 1850, it was found necessary, in order to give to some of the States their due number of Representatives, that some large fractions should be represented; but yet that was not by the act of the law assigning a Representative to the fraction. It was only assigning the number of Representatives by the apportionment to belong to the State in proportion to her population, which sometimes would make a fraction represented. That I understand to be the exact condition of the apportionment law. Now, with the fact ascertained by means of a Federal census that Minnesota is entitled, under the existing rule of apportionment and under the Constitution, to but one Representative, it is not only proposed to make that fraction—less than the Representative number—the basis of representation, but to go far beyond it, and to assign to her three instead of one Representative. And how is this sustained in the debate?

Honorable Senators have said—among them, the honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. POLK]—that we ought to be liberal, inasmuch as this is a new State, and as population has been pouring very rapidly into it, and as the exigencies of a new population would require that the head of the family (the husband, I suppose, or father) should, for his convenience, or that of his family, go alone and stake out his claim, and commence the building of his cabin; and we are to assign to him not only what he counts numerically in the population, but we are to assign to him, not his family, but his conjectured family, and make them a portion of the population of Minnesota. This idea was first introduced here, according to my recollection, in the case of California. I remember that an honorable Senator then, but not now a member of this body, sought to establish that rule in fixing the representation of California. There had been no census there whatever. They did not give us time to make a census. California came and presented herself here, asking for admission under a constitution formed in a hurry by the act of the people, without any form of law, except the proclamation of a military officer of the Federal Government, and said, through those who represented her on this floor, "from the circumstances attending the population of California, we have a right to infer that she has a population of at least two hundred thousand"—a wilder conjecture, I think, than seems to be made in the case of Minnesota, but still a conjecture; and one honorable Senator said we are not only to estimate those who are in pedis possessio of California, but we are to take it for granted that every man who went from the Atlantic States to California left a family behind him, and that it is his purpose to take them there; and that in estimating the population of California, we are to ascribe to it this conjectural population which the emigrants left at home!

What is the difference between what was said there and what is said here, and what is the difference between that suggestion as a basis of our action here in assigning political power, and that which falls from the Senator from Missouri? He says that many—I do not know how many, nor does he know; but a conjectural number—of those who intend hereafter to settle in Minnesota, have gone there and made preparations by staking out their claims, I believe in the western prairie, and by beginning to build a cabin, and that we are to presume they left behind them wives and children who, because they are to follow after them at some time, we are to estimate now as a portion of the population of that State. If I were allowed to conjecture, with certainly far less information of the character of the population there than the honorable Senator possesses, I should say that the chances are in going to one of those remote Territories, and Minnesota is a very remote one from the Atlantic States, that the larger portion of the population who go there are men who have no families, young men with little more than health and enterprise and their brawny arms, to make their way in life—the very best part of our population, but the very men who have not yet had it in their power to incur the responsibilities of a family. I may be wrong in this conjecture, but it would seem to be at least as probable as that of the honorable Senator from Missouri, or those who think with him.

But be that as it may, when this Government is little more than three fourths of a century old, whose only stability can be hoped for in a regard to the written compact on which the Government reposes, are we, at this day, in so important a matter as assigning political power to the States, to depart from the Constitution, and to base it upon wild and reckless conjecture, a conjecture which may be right, but which in all probability is utterly wrong? Why, sir, see how it would work. If we have the right to assign three members in the House of Representatives to Minnesota, what earthly security have we that under an excitement which may exist in the country, actuating a majority here to carry a political act, they would not assign to a new State ten or twenty members to attain a political object? Sir, there is no curb but the Constitution, and if you depart from that, we have not the guarantee of a day for the stability of this Government.

Other Senators have said that there are evidences before them, or perhaps by written communications from that country, that this census was imperfectly taken; that, in many instances, the officers refused to take it at all, because they were not satisfied with the compensation; and that, at best, in a new country, it is a difficult thing to get an exact census. I agree to this. It is a difficult thing anywhere to get an exact census. We know that whenever the decennial apportionment of representation comes before either House, a struggle is made by the different sections of the country, and by different States, to get more of the political power of the country, by all sorts of reasoning, which will shield them from the restrictions of the law. It is familiar to those who were here in 1850, that the complaint was from every State exactly such as is made here now from the State of Minnesota. In some instances it was said that frauds were practiced, in other instances it was said that there was such looseness that no kind of regard ought to be paid to the census; and I remember very well that we were importuned to listen to these evidences that satisfied the parties interested, to depart from the census and assign to them a larger share of political power than the census would give them. We did not do it; but we had exactly the same right and the same inducements, and we had precisely the same responsibilities, to refuse it then which should bind us to refuse it now.

The States of this Confederacy were intended to be equal. It is stipulated for in the Constitution, and I would pray and implore Senators not to depart from that equality which alone can make the condition of this Government tolerable, or to be endured.

I say again, with perfect candor and frankness, that I have no design or wish, nor is it contemplated by the amendment I have offered, to deprive this State of any portion of her due political weight in the Confederacy; but I would most earnestly remonstrate against assigning to her that which she is not only not entitled to, but which the law and the execution of the law show that she is not entitled to. I differ altogether with the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Tennessee, that we can get at the proper representation of this State by leaving the clause as it stands in the bill now, thereby assigning it to the House of Representatives. Sir, the House of Representatives has no power over the subject; none under the Constitution; none under any existing law. The honorable Senator from Tennessee, and I think the honorable Senator from Georgia, also, referred to that clause of the Constitution which makes each House the exclusive judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its members, and drew from that clause the power, in the House of Representatives, to determine what should be the number of the Representatives from Minnesota if the second section shall be allowed to stand in the bill. I deny that absolutely. What is to be determined under the second section of this bill? Anything affecting the election of a member? Anything affecting the return of a member? Anything affecting the qualifications of a member? Certainly not. What is to be determined under that clause, whether it be done by law or by the House of Representatives separately, is, what shall be the number of Representatives of the State of Minnesota?—a question not affected either by the election, the return, or the qualification. The point is, what shall be the number, and what does the Constitution say? The Constitution says the number shall be fixed by law. I would therefore say, as the best construction I can place on a very equivocal provision, that if the clause remains as it now is, it will be found that Minnesota is entitled to but one member, not by the express declaration of the law, but by implication and by construction, because none but the law can assign the number that shall belong to any State.

I have said in good faith that I have no desire in the world to put a straw in the way of the admission of Minnesota into the Union as a State. I am satisfied that the objections I have made, are objections founded upon constitutional faith between the States. If it is departed from, by assigning to this State more than she is shown to be entitled to under the census act and the rule of apportionment, it will be a departure from the Constitution, at the expense of all the other States of the Confederacy. I can, under no circumstances, vote to admit a State with that undue assignment to her of political power in Congress. It will be with great regret that I shall feel myself compelled to vote against the admission of this State, because, in my judgment, it would involve an absolute departure from the faith, as well of the law, as of the Constitution. The effect of my amendment only, is to assign to her one member; to fix by law the representation that she shall have, and to fix it at one member, because, as I construe the law and the execution of the law—I mean the census act—it is shown that she is entitled to but one. At last, what practical result is attained by insisting upon more? We shall have another general census within two years. Then the political power to be assigned to Minnesota will be ascertained, as it will be for all the States, by a new apportionment under a new census, and at last she will be entitled to exactly the same political weight relatively in the Confederacy that is assigned to all the other States, as based on representation, with this advantage, if it be an advantage, that belongs to her position, that her population is increasing, I understand, from the emigration there, every week and every month, giving to her in the estimate of population that has been made, advantages that cannot be given to the other States, no matter what their population has been, or what increase may have taken place in their population since 1850; and, I doubt not, in a great many of them there has been a large increase since that time.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I wish to make an inquiry of the Senator from Virginia if he will permit me to do so.

Mr. MASON. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. In 1843, after Congress had passed a law, or rather issued a mandamus to each State to lay off the State into congressional districts, many of the States refused to do so, but proceeded to elect their Representatives by general ticket, in violation of the law. They presented their credentials to the House of Representatives, and the House determined that they should take their seats, that body having the power to do so under the clause of the Constitution making it the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members. That is a fact; and it does seem to me that the Senator from Virginia has made an unanswerable argument in favor of the provision of the bill as it now stands. First, the Constitution gives to each State one member, without reference to the number of her population. Next comes in this provision of the enabling act. That is the law of the case. It gives to Minnesota one Representative, and as many more as she can show herself to be entitled to under the Federal census. The law, as it now stands upon the statute-book, fixes the ratio at ninety-three thousand four hundred and twenty, and each State is entitled to one member of the House of Representatives for every ninety-three thousand four hundred and twenty Federal population that it contains. The House of Representatives is the proper tribunal to determine that question. The ratio being fixed by law, when the members present themselves it is for the House of Representatives to determine whether the State is entitled to as many as claim admission. I thank the Senator for the argument—for I think it is an unanswerable argument—in favor of the provision as it stands.

Mr. MASON. I should feel very reluctant to give a different version to the very feeble arguments which I have endeavored to advance here in opposition to the views taken by the honorable Senator from Tennessee. If the reasons that I adduced to show that the House of Representatives has no power to construe this law have satisfied him of the reverse of the position that I endeavored to show, I most certainly leave him in possession of that opinion; for I shall not endeavor to go over the ground again. It may be, and I believe it is, historically true that the law to which he alludes that was passed by Congress under the clause of the Constitution giving power over the subject, was disregarded by the House of Representatives; but I do not see how that advances the honorable Senator one step in his argument. What he has to show is this: that there is any power in the House of Representatives to construe that law. The law gives one Representative, and no more—I mean the section which I propose to strike out. It provides that if, at a future day under the census, it shall be found that it is entitled to more, more shall be given—given how? By the House of Representatives? Certainly not. Given by law; a law ascertaining the fact, and a law fixing the number on the fact.

The objection is that the law does not do it, and there is no tribunal to which it is referred to ascertain it. The clause says that the State shall have one Representative, and as many more as, under existing laws, she may appear entitled to by the census. Who is to ascertain it? The Constitution says the law shall ascertain it. You may say the law has attempted to ascertain it, but it has not done it, for it has not fixed the number numerically, and has provided no tribunal to do it. The House of Representatives has no more power to do it than the Senate has. The law has failed to do it. It is for that reason that, with very great diffidence, I concurred in the opinion advanced by some Senators here, that if the clause remains as it is, the only construction to be placed on it will be to assign to Minnesota but one Representative, because none but the law can increase the number, and the law has failed to do it. That is my impression.

I will not detain the Senate longer, but express the regret that I have occupied so much of their time in a matter which I feel is one of the very greatest moment, not only in its effect here, but as a precedent, for it is the assignment of political power to States. It is proposed to be done upon a conjecture, and a departure from the Constitution and the law.

Mr. CRITENDEN. I have but a very few words to say. I am sure that I should be willing to extend the most liberal construction that we could properly make on the Constitution and the laws, so as to give this new State all the representation to which she is entitled, according to population. But it seems to me that the gentleman from Virginia is entirely right when he says that the apportionment of Representatives is the apportionment of power, and it ought always, upon the principles of the Constitution, upon the very spirit of the Constitution, to be strictly observed in the apportionment of Representatives. As well as I recollect, it was for some deviation in this particular that General Washington exercised, for the first time in the history of this Government, the veto power. I think we are bound to adhere to a strict observance of this provision of the Constitution, because it is the very spirit and life of the Constitution—equal representation and equal apportionment of political power. I think the honorable Senator from Virginia is entirely correct, and one Representative seems to me to be all that, according to any scale or any rule, this new State can be entitled to. She is not entitled to more by the census of her population. Make all fair, legitimate additions to that for portions of the country to which this enumeration was not extended, and still, if I understand the case, she is not entitled, she has not the number necessary, to give her two Representatives. Why are we, by conjecture, to multiply that number arbitrarily? or why are we, for a fraction, to give her a Representative? The fraction, according to what I have heard, is not half the ratio of general representation that is required, which is over ninety-three thousand. She has not a fraction equal to one half that, according to the census actually returned. I agree with the Senator from Virginia, that it would be dangerous for us to go beyond that, and make conjectural computations of people who were not there when the census was taken.

There is another fact that I will state. There is not a member from any of the old States in the House of Representatives that does not represent a population beyond the census. They have been increasing now for eight years. We make no allowances for that. If we are to interpose here by special legislation, why should we not undertake now, upon mere conjecture, to take the reported and undoubted surpluses in many of the States and give additional representation for them? Gentlemen in the other House represent districts containing twice or thrice the number of the ratio; and would it be just and fair to vote to stretch the rights of a new State coming into the Union, by taking now a census of her population, giving her a representation for her population in 1858, when the other States are represented only according to the population of 1850? I do not think it is right. I do not think we ought to have any question about it. However anxious, and I think the anxiety a laudable one, on the part of members of this House to treat with great liberality a new State just coming into the Union, and I am sure I sympathize in this sentiment, I must observe some equality and some regard to the rights of every portion of the country, and particularly must observe and confine myself to the rule which I understand is prescribed by the law and the Constitution on this subject.

Mr. POLK. I certainly have never entertained a supposition that the honorable Senator from Virginia was indisposed to do anything else than entire and equal justice to all the States, and the new States as well as the old States. I know I have said nothing that intimates that, and I shall say no such thing; but while I concede that to the honorable Senator, I beg leave to say that, in the few remarks I submitted on this question before, I certainly did not desire, and do not now desire, and shall not contend for, anything more than what I believe to be equal justice to this new State of Minnesota. If I did not believe that she was entitled to three Representatives, I certainly would not have assumed the position that I did when I was before on the floor. I do not claim that Minnesota shall have any more political power, or that she ought to have any more political power in this Government, than any of the old States, or any rights or privileges that are not accorded to the old States; but I do claim that, in fixing the representation for that State, we ought not to shut our eyes against what we must be convinced are the facts of the case.

If I did so present them, I did not certainly intend the remarks I made, in regard to the condition of a portion of the population in Minnesota, to have the exact bearing that the Senator from Virginia seems to have taken them in.

Before I dwelt on that particular point in my remarks, to which the Senator directed the attention of the Senate, I had pointed out, very briefly to be sure, the other main facts to which I cited this as subsidiary. We know, on the documents before us, that a perfect census has not been taken. We know that some counties are entirely unreported—I shall not undertake to state the exact number—yet I believe it seems to be the common opinion of the Senate that those counties ought not to be overlooked. I say that common justice requires that we should not ignore the fact that there are people in counties where the census does not show any; when the vote cast for these very gentlemen, whose seats are now in question, shows that there were hundreds of legal voters, who were not only qualified to vote, but did actually vote in that election.

I say we ought also to look at the further fact that the proportion of population to the voter, as shown by this vote, and comparing it with the census, is much less than it is in the older States; and when we have that fact, we cannot, as reasoning men, avoid what is the rationale of the fact how it comes to be so; and when we come to look at that, we must necessarily also look at the further fact that this is a new State just being populated by emigrants who have recently gone there, to be sure, but who, though recently there, are just as much citizens of the State as those who have been born and bred in an old State are citizens of that.

Senators have said that they are willing to deal liberally with this new State. Certainly a new State is entitled to liberal dealing; but I do not even claim that. I say that what is asked for by those who claim three members for this State is supported on grounds of justice. Suppose it to be true that there are some States in which fractions are not represented; suppose it to be true, as I believe it to be in my own State, that we are here with seven members in the lower branch of Congress, whereas if a census were taken to-day we should be entitled, perhaps, to two additional ones, certainly to one additional member: yet when Minnesota comes asking admission into the Union, the fact that the State of Missouri may not have as much of political power in the Confederacy as I believe it was the design of the Constitution she should have, and cannot have it until the next decennial census shall be taken, is no reason why Minnesota should not have all that her population entitles her to.

In this view of the case I say that the fact to which I called the attention of the Senate is not to be overlooked. I did not offer it in the sense in which the Senator from Virginia seemed to receive it, as the main ground on which I based the claim of Minnesota to three Representatives in the other House of Congress; but I say, in view of the case which I have presented, it is a fact going to show not only that you would not be doing anything beyond liberality, but nothing beyond justice, in giving what this State asks as her portion of political power in the other branch of the Legislature of the United States.

I say, we cannot ignore the fact that the state of population there is what I indicate. Heads of families have gone there in great numbers; have settled there; have spent their money and employed their labor there, to make for themselves homes; and though their families were not there when the census was taken, they will be there before the end of the present season. Now, the Senator from Virginia supposes the fact to be, that many who have gone there are young, unmarried men, who have gone to win their way by their own good right arms, and their own clear heads, in that new country. I believe that is so, and, so far as that class of population is concerned, they are entitled to no more than each individual will count in taking the census; but, while that is so, we know that they are not all, nor a majority, nor even a large proportion, nor even, I undertake to say, one quarter of those who have gone into this Territory. The great majority who have gone there have gone for the purpose of making provision for the families that they could not so well raise to respectability and influence in the old States as in the new; and, having a proper paternal regard for those families, they, of course, have not undertaken to take them there when they would have nothing but canvas to put over their heads. They have gone themselves, being willing to live under canvas for a season, for the purpose of making a home to bring their families to. They may not have entirely completed those homes. As I stated when I was up before, I have information, which to me is entirely satisfactory, that, at least in one county, a great majority of those who voted, and of those who were registered, were circumstanced just exactly as that class of emigrants is circumstanced in every new State.

Now, sir, what is equal justice to this new State of Minnesota? What is giving to her not more political power than she is entitled to in this Confederacy? That is not the claim—certainly it is not the claim on my part; but what is giving to her her equal power in the Confederacy? The facts are patent before us; we have the evidence that in some counties no census at all has been taken; we have the evidence, satisfactory to my mind certainly, and I was going to say, to the mind of every Senator, that in a great majority of the counties in which the census was taken, it was imperfectly taken; and we have the further fact that this imperfection results from the circumstances of the country; and though the Senator from Virginia says the census is imperfect in the old States, and I admit it, I say, comparatively speaking, it is infinitely more perfect there than it can be in any new State, and as we know it was in this new State of Minnesota. Under these circumstances, what does equal justice require? Can we shut our eyes against these facts? Are we to say to this new State, we will bind you down to the number that is shown by this census thus imperfectly taken, when we know the fact that, if the census had been taken ever so perfectly, it would have given the true exhibit of what is the potential and the legal population of the State.

Mr. TOOMBS. Will the Senator give way for a moment to allow me to make a suggestion in this connection?

Mr. POLK. With great pleasure.

Mr. TOOMBS. The difficulty seems to me to be, that gentlemen want some certainty about the matter; and, on the other hand, it seems that this State can have no representation at the present, certainly no fair representation, if less than three be allowed. I give notice now, that if this section be stricken out, as proposed by the Senator from Illinois, I shall move, then, the following amendments, as additional sections:

And be it further enacted, That said State shall be entitled to three Representatives, until the census authorized to be taken by the act of February 26, 1857, shall be again correctly taken and returned, and then she shall be entitled to as many Representatives as the present ratio will give her population thus ascertained.

And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Interior shall take all proper means to retake a perfect census of said State, and return the same as soon as the same can be conveniently done.

I simply propose to give her the three, and then to have this census, which is universally admitted to be imperfect, corrected, and as soon as that is done, to let her representation be according to her exact population on the present ratio.

Mr. FITCH. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Georgia that there is an apparent omission in his amendment; an omission which will lead to the same defective census of which we are now complaining. He makes no provision for defraying the expense, and that was the real difficulty before.

Mr. TOOMBS. That can be done in an appropriation bill.

Mr. FITCH. There was no appropriation before, and that caused the difficulty in regard to the taking of the census.

Mr. TOOMBS. I give notice that I shall move this amendment if the section be stricken out.

Mr. POLK. If proper provision shall be made for having a fair census taken, certainly the proposed amendment of the Senator from Georgia is entirely satisfactory, and I believe it is perfectly fair.

Now, sir, I shall not detain the Senate; but I was about to remark, when I was interrupted by the Senator from Georgia, that I of course do not know what took place in the discussion on the admission of California in reference to the proportion of representation that she ought to have had at that time in the House of Representatives. I protest against Minnesota being put on the arguments that were then adduced; but from the reference that is made by the Senator from Virginia to what was said by Senators on this floor in the case of California, I infer that the facts to which I called the attention of the Senate in reference to the actual and certain condition of a large proportion of the emigration into this new State of Minnesota, were such as to strike the minds of Senators who were acquainted with the condition of the new States in former cases. I agree with the Senator from Virginia in reference to his views on the propriety of fixing, by the act of both Houses, the number of Representatives to which the State is entitled; but I do say that Senators, in being very anxious to do justice to the older States in the Union, ought also to recollect that in that anxiety, unless they are careful, they may do injustice to a new State that is seeking admission into the Union. While, on the one hand, I would be as far as the Senator from Virginia, or any other Senator on this floor, from asking for Minnesota any more than she is entitled to, yet I do certainly think that we cannot look at the true state of the case in this Territory without being satisfied that she is entitled to at least three Representatives in the Congress of the United States.

As I said before, she has a territory that stretches over as many square miles, I am informed, as are contained in both the States of Ohio and Pennsylvania, or nearly so; and her population is scattered over nearly that entire territory. This census has been taken under circumstances as disadvantageous as we know must belong to a population thus sparsely scattered over a new territory, without roads or bridges or means of convenient traveling; and there was no provision made for paying the men for doing the work. This work was to be done in a new country, where wages are high, and where what may be very good compensation in such a State as Massachusetts or New York, where the population is dense—for the pay was per capita, I believe—would be insufficient. A man can take hundreds and thousands of names in a short time in a dense population. In Minnesota, where a man must travel hundreds and thousands of miles to get the same number of names, the compensation that would be abundant in the old States would be nothing in Minnesota, and would not tempt a man to do it. I am only surprised that this census, imperfect as it is, has been taken with the degree of fulness that it has been under the circumstances; and I think, if I may be allowed to say so now, that this enabling act, in this particular, in regard to Minnesota, did that State injustice necessarily, not intentionally; but Congress, in passing that act, did not make the machinery, did not provide the ways and means without which it was impossible that a correct census should be taken in that new State.

Mr. BAYARD. I should be disposed to do justice to a new State quite as much as to an old State, but I think it preferable to adhere to the intent of the Federal Constitution, and to the mode of the apportionment of representation among the States in accordance with its spirit and intent, rather than to adopt any new rules of evidence in regard to old or new States. Under the Constitution there are two bases of representation: one is the right of a State to a Representative without regard to her numbers; the other is, that after the first apportionment was made the Constitution provided for a decennial enumeration of the inhabitants and that the representation of the States should be based on that decennial enumeration. That is done under a general law. When a new State presents herself the proper course is, as I suppose, that which was taken in reference to the enabling act of Minnesota. We provided that she should have authority to form a constitution; and the provision goes still further, and adopts the same rule by which we apportion Representatives in the other States, the same evidence for the purpose of apportionment; that is, an enumeration of the inhabitants of the State. There has been an imperfect execution of that. So there were as regards the general census when we made the apportionment in the year 1850; there were many complaints made.

I can see no reason, arising out of the fact that there may be imperfections, for your undertaking, by conjectural calculation, to allow to a State representation based, not upon enumeration, but upon entirely conjectural estimates. I can never agree to it. If there has been a defect, I am willing to remedy that defect by a law which shall provide properly for an enumeration. In the mean time, the State should be content with the representation which the Constitution gives her, which is one Representative until you have, by enumeration, ascertained that she is entitled to more. That, I think, is the position in which every State stands. I am perfectly willing, therefore, if this enumeration is considered so defective as not to do justice to Minnesota, that, allowing her one Representative now, we shall provide in the same bill a clause for the enumeration, and the returns to be made between this and the 1st of December next, and make proper preparation for having them made; and then, when these returns come in, to give the representation she would be entitled to, according to a fair enumeration; but I am not willing to resort to any calculation of population from votes. It is the most illusory mode of calculation imaginable. It varies, in different parts of the country, from four up to nine. In the last presidential election, there were districts in Pennsylvania in which the relative proportion of population to voters was as three and a half to one. In a new State, of course the relative population of a State just settling to voters, would be greatly less than it would be in an old State; but there are variations. It is an utterly uncertain rule.

But the greatest objection I have to it, is that it is not the rule the Constitution prescribes. It is not an enumeration, it is a conjectural estimate. I see no particular hardship in admitting the State now, if she gets her constitutional representation, which is one, in the absence of the legitimate constitutional proof that she is entitled to more; to provide in the law for taking a census, and making an appropriation for the purpose of taking it; and then if she is entitled to three or more, I am perfectly willing to give her whatever she is entitled to. But if gentlemen object to that, I am willing to go thus far. Now we have the census returns, and they show about one hundred and forty-six thousand inhabitants, independent of three counties from which no returns have been made. I am willing to suppose the whole number to be one hundred and fifty thousand. By taking the ratio of representation which is ninety-three thousand four hundred and twenty, you find that the fraction over is as great as the lowest fraction under which any present State holds its representation.

I am willing therefore to give two Representatives instead of making the present provision. I am willing to take either course; I rather think it would give two, though yesterday I was inclined to the contrary opinion; I believe the lowest fraction at present represented in Congress under the rule of apportionment is in the State of South Carolina; and my impression is, that the fraction in that case is less than one half of the proportionate number—that is, less than half of ninety-three thousand four hundred and twenty. If that be so, on the census returns as made, Minnesota would be entitled to two Representatives; and if you are willing to take the returns, although there may be irregularities, although there may be imperfections, I am willing that my vote shall accord to her two Representatives if I am right in the result that has been arrived at by the enumeration; but if gentlemen desire to abandon those returns as not reliable, then, in my opinion, there is but one constitutional course—to admit the State with the one Representative to which she is entitled under the Constitution, and to provide by law for remedying the defective enumeration by taking the census between this and the first Monday of December next, making a proper appropriation to take it rightly, and then giving the State at the next session whatever number of Representatives that enumeration shall show her to be entitled to.

I think a great deal of the difficulty has arisen from the fact, which I never shall vote in any case, whether it comes from a new or an old State, to countenance, that Minnesota, in her inchoate condition, before admission, has undertaken to violate two laws of the United States—first, she has undertaken, in the schedule to her constitution, to tell us what number of Representatives she shall be entitled to, to determine that matter for herself. I recognize no such authority in any State of this Union. It belongs, under the Constitution, to Congress, and I would keep the States, as well as the Federal Government, within their own proper orbits. Further than that, she has undertaken to violate another law of the United States, passed on solemn consideration. With a view to the protection of republican principles, and to avoid combinations, Congress has provided that the election of Representatives in Congress shall be by single districts. The Legislature of Minnesota is in session, and if that State is entitled to more than one member, it should have provided for single districts; but the schedule to the constitution undertakes, in defiance of the law, to prescribe that the State shall be one district, and shall be entitled to three members.

I recognize no such right as that; nor do I mean by any vote of mine, to recognize an assumption of authority, on the part of a new State or an old State, to override the laws of Congress, legitimately passed. I, therefore, cannot vote to strike out this provision in the bill; because, if we admit Minnesota without any provision on the subject, we should necessarily be sanctioning the number she claims, and giving her that number, with the right, also, to elect three members in one district. I mean to do neither the one or the other. If the right belongs to her, it belongs to every State; and if the policy is sound and republican that we should elect by single districts in one State, we should in all the States. I say no inchoate State, and no full-grown State, has a right to assume to herself to alter the laws of the United States that are passed in accordance with the legitimate powers vested in the Federal Government. Therefore, if this section be stricken out, I shall vote against the bill. If it remains, I shall cheerfully vote for it. I desire to see the State admitted; I desire to see her admitted according to the principles of the Federal Constitution; and I desire, also, to adhere to the Constitution as to the mode of evidence by which her right to representation is to be ascertained. From these principles I do not mean to depart; for I have seen too often that the expediency of the hour tempting you to depart once from a principle, may ultimately lead to much worse results than gentlemen suppose.

Mr. IVERSON. I see there is no probability that we shall get through with this bill to-night, as I anticipated this morning when the Senator from Michigan and others thought we could get through with it in ten or fifteen minutes. The Committee on Military Affairs desire to promote the public business by seeking an executive session. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the doors were closed. After being some time engaged therein, the doors were reopened; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 25, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a message from the President of the United States, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 26th of January, requesting the President to communicate to the House "so much of the correspondence between the late Secretary of War and Major General John E. Wool, late commander of the Pacific department, relative to the affairs of such department as has not heretofore been published under a call of the House," all the correspondence called for so far as is afforded by the files of the War Department; which, on motion of Mr. FAULKNER, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and with the accompanying papers ordered to be printed.

LAND CLAIMS IN NEW MEXICO.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Department of the Interior, transmitting new schedules of public and private land claims in New Mexico, reported by the surveyor general of that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

FOREIGN MAIL SERVICE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Postmaster General, transmitting estimates of the sums required for the foreign mail service, and across the Isthmus of Panama, for the year ending July 1, 1858; and estimates of the sums of money required for the service of the year ending June 30, 1859; which were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

THE KANSAS QUESTION.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, in order that all sides may be prepared, I wish that, by common consent, some day may be fixed when action shall be taken on the Kansas bill. I am willing that ample time shall be given for discussion, and that no hasty steps shall be taken.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, this question of the admission of Kansas has been discussed during the whole of this session. Kindred questions have been discussed, to my personal knowledge, for the past nine years, and I think I may appeal to the Speaker for testimony to corroborate what I say. This Kansas question stands now in the way of all the material interests of this country. It blocks up public business and private business. For one, I am ready to meet the question to-day, or to-morrow, with or without debate. I feel it due to the great interests of the country that we should come speedily to a vote. I therefore suggest to the gentleman from Georgia that, by common consent, we agree to take up that bill to-morrow.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, to the House—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The House is unusually thin at this moment, and perhaps upon consultation, when more members are here, some day may be agreed upon by common consent; but I am not willing now to make any agreement.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Is this question in order? If it is not, I object to the whole thing.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would be very glad if the gentleman from Georgia would indicate a day when, in his judgment, we should take action upon that bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects to any further debate upon the question.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Neither the gentleman from Georgia, nor myself, nor any other member, has a right to indicate when this vote shall be taken, but—

Mr. BURROUGHS. I inquired of the Chair if this question was properly before the House. If not, I objected.

The SPEAKER. The Chair answered that it was not regularly before the House.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I will then simply give notice that next Tuesday week I shall move to—

Mr. CAMPBELL. Allow me to suggest to the gentleman that he say next Tuesday.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Say this day week.

Mr. CAMPBELL. This House has already agreed to adjourn upon the first Monday of June, and it will be impossible to transact the business of the country in that time, unless we speedily act upon this Kansas question.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I wish to suggest that, in all human probability, if not embarrassed by action now, we may make some mutual arrangement fixing the day when this matter shall be brought up and acted upon. But we never can do it by this kind of discussion in the House. We had better have an agreement which will suit all parties; and I think it can be consummated, if gentlemen will only wait. Perhaps during the day the arrangement can be made, and notice given of it.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Well, I withdraw my suggestion.

Mr. LETCHER. Allow me a single moment. We have the deficiency bill before the committee; and as it is my desire to endeavor to get it disposed of, I trust, as the House has agreed that this debate is to close to-morrow night, we may go on with the measure and dispose of it between that time and Tuesday. If it is to go over, and other matter is to intervene, we will probably occupy three or four times as much time in the end, as we shall occupy now in bringing it to a conclusion.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. As I think an agreement will be made I withdraw my suggestions, and move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

JOHN HASTINGS.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to communicate to this House all information in his possession, including reports by persons appointed to examine the case, relating to the alleged robbery of John Hastings, late collector of customs at Pittsburg.

MEMORIAL AND RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. BILLINGHURST, by unanimous consent, presented the memorial of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, for the amount of the five per cent. due from the sale of public lands lying within that State; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORGAN, by unanimous consent, presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of New York, in reference to the admission of Kansas; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

BREAKWATER IN DELAWARE BAY.

Mr. LANDY, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Commerce a bill making an appropriation for constructing a breakwater on Crow shoal, in the Delaware bay; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GROW. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to allow me to report two bills, merely for the purpose of having them printed. They are bills relating to the mode and manner of collecting and disbursing the revenue, and to which no gentleman perhaps will object.

Mr. GROW. I object; and call for the regular order of business.

The motion of Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, was then agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BOCOCK in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the deficiency bill.

Mr. TALBOT, who was entitled to the floor, yielded to his colleague, Mr. PEYTON.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

Mr. PEYTON. Mr. Chairman, in coming before the committee to-day to present my views upon a question which has been discussed for many days, I labor under considerable embarrassment; but, in what I have to say in regard to this question, I shall give you my views frankly and candidly, and the reasons why I am in favor of the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution.

In order to make up a fair and just opinion on this question, it is absolutely necessary to trace up its history and origin; and to take not only the recorded evidence, but the under current, got from newspaper reports and conversations had with various persons, and bring all in as auxiliary testimony. I admit that this question is complicated; that it admits of doubt; and I think that the only way to arrive at a just conclusion in this matter, is to lay aside all party prejudices, and examine it with scrutiny, carefully and honestly. I have no doubt that thus we can come to a just conclusion in regard to it.

Now, sir, ten years ago I was a member of this House. After the passage of the Missouri compromise in 1820, peace and tranquility were restored to the country. But, growing out of the Mexican war, we had acquired a large extent of territory. A question then sprang up as to what disposition should be made of that acquisition. The northern men said that no slavery existed in that territory, and that they never would give a vote to extend slavery into territory then free. The southern men said: "We contributed our share of men and money in the acquisition of this territory. The bones of our sons, who died to acquire it, now bleach upon the plains of Mexico; and we ask to have a fair participation in its benefits." The North refused; and the gentleman now in the chair, and others around me, well recollect the struggle that followed at the close of Polk's administration.

That was the spirit that pervaded the North. The southern men found out that, although northern men were willing to stand shoulder to shoulder with them and fight the battles of the country, yet, if territory were acquired by their joint blood and treasure, the South would be excluded from that territory. Then it was that alarm spread through the country. The sage of Ashland and the statesmen of that day came forth from their homes and settled that great question. And how was it settled? The Democrats of the North, while many of them entertained the opinion that Congress had power to exclude slavery from the Territories, agreed that it was unjust to the South to do so; and they were willing that both southern and northern men should go into the Territories, and settle there as friends and neighbors; and, when they came to form a State government, they should take the vote, and slavery should be recognized or excluded, according to the will of the majority. That was fair and just. But no sooner had that bill passed, than there was a storm created in the North in opposition to it.

Again, Mr. Chairman, in 1854, Congress met; and, inasmuch as a portion of that territory which was governed by the Missouri compromise had been taken to make up the territory governed by the compromise of 1850, Congress repealed the Missouri restriction, and applied, in 1854, the same principle that had been applied in 1850.

What then occurred, Mr. Chairman? Did parties all submit to the will of the majority, and agree faithfully and honestly to abide by the law of Congress? Not so, sir. An organization sprang up into existence at the moment. That organization contributed men and money; the avowed object being to send men into Kansas, to maintain them there, and to get them to vote slavery out of the Territory.

Now, sir, in all sorts of difficulties it is a matter of the first importance to find out who was the aggressor—who was wrong in the beginning. I do not care how pure and patriotic were the motives of the association; for they sent into the Territory men who, if they were not bad men when they started, became bad after they got there. They were clothed, and fed, and maintained by the society, under the pledge that they would vote to make the Territory free.

Now, what was the natural consequence? What would any other State, situated as Missouri is, have done? The report spread all through the State of Missouri that Massachusetts was sending men into the Territory by hundreds, to make that Territory free. The people of Missouri thereupon determined to go there, and stand around the polls, and see that their friends had an opportunity to vote. The idea had gone out in Missouri that the free-State men in the Territory would take possession of the polls, and prevent pro-slavery men from voting. Well, the Missourians went into the Territory, and stood around the polls, and some of them, I have no doubt, voted. The great bulk of them, however, merely stood around the polls, with their rifles in their hands; kept off the marauders, and allowed their friends to vote.

Now, I say there was a majority of pro-slavery men in the Territory of Kansas, at the first election; and, as evidence of that fact, I refer to the census. A registry was taken, and there was a clear and decided majority of three, or four, or five hundred votes of pro-slavery men in that Territory. Another proof of that fact is, that the Governor of the Territory—the only official authority that we have to speak from in relation to that matter—said that, although there was fraudulent voting, yet that a majority of the delegates to the Legislature were elected without fraud; and, therefore, he unhesitatingly gave the certificates to a majority.

What next followed? That Legislature was recognized; a Delegate was elected and took his seat here; and, from that day to this, Congress, the President of the United States, and the people of the Territory of Kansas, except those who refused to submit to the laws, recognized that Territorial Legislature as legal and binding.

What next occurred? That Territorial Legislature passed a law, authorizing the people to vote for, or against, a convention to frame a State constitution; and all the people concurred in the opinion that they ought to have such convention. A free-State paper there, the Kansas Herald, said that the people all voted on that occasion, and that there was no opposition to the calling of the convention. Delegates were nominated and elected, and the convention met. The free-State party, if they did not wish to have that convention, could have gone to the polls, and, if they had a majority, voted it down. If they refused to vote, it was their own fault. The pro-slavery men were elected, and, in obedience to the wishes of their friends, they framed a constitution and submitted it to the people. They were elected in June. Governor Walker, who had then been sent into the Territory, called on the free-State men to come forward and vote. He went through the Territory and made speeches; he begged and implored them to take part in the election; he told them that the peace and prosperity of the Territory, in a great measure, depended upon them; he told them that if they would come forward and vote, and if they had the majority, and would go on and form a State government, he had no doubt Congress would be liberal to them, and would give them liberal grants of the public lands; and that they would do a deed that would entitle them to the gratitude of the American people. But, mark you, he told them that if they stood off, and refused to vote, the persons who did come forward and vote would elect their candidates; and those who did not vote would delegate the power to those who did to vote for them, and they would be bound by the action of the delegates elected.

Now, it is alleged that there was a fault in the registry; that some nineteen counties were disfranchised; and that the persons living in those counties were not permitted to take part in the election. Mr. Chairman, what is the fact in regard to this charge? The officers executed their duty faithfully. They registered every man they could get to register. But in three or four of the counties the people would not give their names. They threatened violence to the officers, and drove them from the counties. Others gave fictitious names. Then, sir, it was their own fault that they were not registered.

But, sir, everywhere in the counties where the registry was completed there was a large majority in favor of the constitution. There were nine thousand two hundred and odd voters registered in the Territory, and some two or three thousand voted at that election. Taking the doctrine that is admitted here on all sides, that those who did not vote authorized those who did to vote for them, and the fact that a majority of those who did vote voted for the constitution, it makes no difference what was the number, the election was binding on all. It is to be taken for granted that those who did not vote were either indifferent or were perfectly satisfied to let those who did take the trouble to vote, vote for all.

But, Mr. Chairman, there can be no dispute as to the fairness of the election in the counties where the registry was completed. Now take the vote that was polled on the 4th of January last, in which our friends on the other side of the House say ten thousand two hundred votes were cast—my own judgment is that they did not cast any such vote; but taking it for granted that they did cast that number of votes, and still nine thousand and odd of that number were cast in the counties that were registered. But unless you can show that a majority of the people were left out of the registry, unless you can prove that in those counties where there was no registry taken there were voters enough to have changed the result, then the election was valid and binding. But our northern friends tell us, "Do you want to cram a constitution down the throats of the people against their will?" I answer that I have no such wish. But, sir, when a community settle in a Territory they must have some law by which they are to be governed; they must have some rules and regulations to go by. If a portion of them desire peace and harmony and good government, and another portion desire disturbance, and will submit to no law, I say that all law-abiding men in this House and in the country should strengthen and encourage the men there who desire and are seeking to establish law and order. Now, sir, what would be the condition of a community where a large portion of the people were standing out, marauding and deprecating continually upon the community, and who were against all law? Is it not the duty of every man who desires the peace and harmony of the country to encourage and sustain the men there who are striving to maintain peace and good order?

Well, sir, the delegates to this convention were elected. They went on and made a constitution; they submitted that constitution; they applied to it all the forms of law. Is it to be thrown back upon those marauding and law-defying people? Mr. Chairman, if these men had been correct, straightforward, honest men, when Governor Walker told them to come forward and vote—that they should be protected in their rights at the ballot-box; that he had troops there to protect the polls; that if they had the majority they could make just such a constitution as they chose; that if they did not vote, the pro-slavery party would elect their delegates, and they would be bound by the result—I say, if they had been honest, correct men, why did they not come forward and vote? Why, sir, they never wanted a constitution. The object of that party, from the very moment they landed in Kansas, was to keep up a political excitement, instead of making a constitution, or abiding by wholesome laws. They came there to rob, and some of them to murder. I do not charge the party which sent them there with any improper motive. I make the charge against the men who were sent there. The party were not particular who were sent, to be sure. The emigrant aid societies raised the funds, and all who were willing to go were sent. Hence, the worst men, perhaps, men out of employment and of desperate characters, were forwarded to Kansas—the very men, sir, disposed to keep up a continual disturbance of the public peace. Yet grave legislators have told us here that these men are good and law-abiding citizens! They were refused the exercise of the right of franchise, we are told, and asked to have this constitution referred back to them, that they may make another.

Now, sir, what authority have we for thinking that if the constitution be referred back, they will make a better one? They have been at it for three years already. We have Governor Reeder's statement that they promised him to cease marauding and disturbing the peace, and abide by the ballot-box; and we have, too, the proof that they were faithless to that promise. Notwithstanding all this, and that the Legislature which authorized the convention was legally elected, and by a majority of the people, we are now begged by these men to reject Kansas, because there is a majority of the people opposed to this Lecompton constitution. I deny that there is any such majority in Kansas. Although the free-State party elected a majority of the last Legislature, and ten thousand votes were cast on the 4th of January against the constitution, there is no evidence to my mind that they have a majority in that Territory. Take the list and examine it. You find some ten or fifteen counties registered, and that those men gave, in those counties where the Lecompton constitution received a pro-slavery majority of six thousand seven hundred votes, some nine thousand six hundred votes, which is nearly the entire vote. Nearly every vote they polled was polled in those registered counties, where some six thousand seven hundred votes had been previously given for Lecompton. They gave, too, five or six hundred votes more than were absolutely registered in those counties. It is so reported and believed by many; and there is some evidence that they imported votes from Lawrence, where they had a surplus, to Leavenworth, where they were in a minority.

Mr. Chairman, let us examine this constitution. "Oh!" say our friends around us, "it should have been submitted." They say that when the people were called upon to vote, they were called to vote for the constitution with slavery, or for the constitution without slavery; and that the only question submitted was, whether the people should raise slaves without importation of new ones, or whether they should raise them and import them too. That is an unfair statement of the question. I think the convention acted more prudently than they would have done if they had followed the advice of Governor Walker. What did he tell them? He said: "Gentlemen, go on and form your constitution; make it free; protect what slaves are in the Territory, and I have no doubt in the world but that it will be adopted by a large majority of the people of Kansas." What did they do? They followed Governor Walker's advice, except in one particular. They could not take upon themselves the responsibility of making it a free State; but they would do precisely as Governor Walker recommended. They would make stringent provisions to protect what slaves were in the Territory. They would allow the men who owned slaves to be protected in their rights. What then? Then, said they, instead of making it free, they would submit the slavery clause to the people. If the people struck out that slavery clause, then what? Then, that it should be a free State, with the exception that the slaves in the Territory should belong to their masters until compensation was paid for them by the Legislature. I ask if there is any solitary free-State man, who has any idea of doing justice to the South, who would be in favor of taking the two or three hundred negroes there without compensation? What would be the consequence? It would raise a storm much more dangerous and perilous than the admission or rejection of the Lecompton constitution would raise; for the southern men who went there with their slaves, under the Constitution of the United States, never expected to surrender them without compensation. It would be unjust to take them unless compensation were made. It would be as much an act of injustice as if the slaves of Kentucky were set free by this Government without compensation.

What did this Lecompton constitution say? Look at it as you please, and slavery is the only question of controversy which is involved. Strike slavery out of the Lecompton constitution, and there would be no objection on the part of those who now oppose it. If there had been no slavery question, there would have been no trouble about Kansas. If those men of the North had wanted to do what was strictly right, and to make Kansas a free State, they would, in my judgment, have come forward and voted the slavery clause out. The Legislature had authority, by paying their owners a fair price for them, to emancipate the slaves that would be then left in the Territory. As just men, as men who desired peace, as men who desired to live in harmony with their neighbors and brethren, ought they not to have come forward at first, and voted against the slave clause? Then what? A prospective law might have been passed by the Legislature emancipating all the slaves in Kansas, providing at the same time for paying their owners a fair valuation for their property; and thereby Kansas might have been made a free State.

But what are you now called upon to do? You are called upon to turn round and say that those men who have refused from the start to submit to law, who have organized their forces, and have their captains, their lieutenants, and other officers, that those men who have threatened and forced the free-State Democrats to join them by abusing them and their wives, and threatening to drive them out of the Territory unless they joined them—I say you are called upon to say that that party is right; and that the constitution should have been submitted to them, and that they should have had the opportunity to say whether they were in favor of that constitution or not. That is not, Mr. Chairman, the way, in my judgment, in which a good government can be carried on. The object of law always is to protect the weak from the encroachments of the strong and the vicious. Here is a party—and there is no denying it—with a military leader. He has his men, and they have decidedly the advantage of the Federal troops. The Federal troops have only the right to fight when necessary; but they have no right to vote. But General Lane and his men have both the right to fight and to vote. But they prefer to do neither. They kept up a great parade, kept themselves marshaled, and sallied out at one time to disturb one neighborhood; but as soon as they knew that the Federal troops were ordered out to punish them, they would be suddenly found in another place. Their whole object and aim from the beginning was to keep up a continual disturbance in the Territory—not to vote, nor to organize a peaceable government there, but to keep that country in continual turmoil.

Now, the newspapers in Kansas and in the northern States were filled with statements that the people of Kansas were down-trodden; that they were suffering wonderful afflictions from the border-ruffians; that they had been driven from the polls; and that they were denied the right of suffrage. What was the effect? The effect was to arouse a feeling of revenge in the bosoms of northern men. At the North they heard but one side, and that was that the people who had gone to Kansas from the North were down-trodden and abused; and hence it was that they were for seeing them placed right.

Mr. Chairman, there is a radical difference between the Democrats who stand upon the Kansas-Nebraska bill and the Republicans. The Republicans come out very boldly and honestly—and I look upon the great mass of them as being as honest as anybody—and tell us that if Kansas were to come here by a very large majority of the bona fide voters of that Territory, with a constitution tolerating slavery, they would not admit her; that they look upon slavery as a moral and political evil, and that they do not intend to vote for the admission of another slave State. Well, I do not know what that course will lead to, but it is frank and open, and I admire it. But what do our Democrats say? In 1856 we met at Cincinnati, and united upon a set of principles—a platform—one main feature of which was, that Kansas should have the right to regulate her own social and domestic institutions, slavery included, in her own way. The presidential canvass was opened; and the Democrats of the North came forward, and upon every stump they repudiated the idea that the Legislature of Kansas was not a legal Legislature. They spurned with contempt the reports then circulated, that Kansas was down-trodden and oppressed by the slave power. They said that this matter was all a political trick; that it was all intended to open anew the wounds of bleeding Kansas in order to elect Fremont; that it was to excite the passions of the free-State people and to induce them to believe that the people of the South had been doing injustice, and all this was done to enable the North to elect their Republican candidate.

But what do some of the northern Democrats say now? They turn round and say that they were mistaken; that those men in Kansas were meek, and gentle, and pure men—just as pure as they make men in Massachusetts; that they had been raised and educated in that city of morals and religion, Boston; that when they left Massachusetts they were as pure as they could be. But it seems to me there was an innate diabolical disposition in their hearts, and as soon as they were brought into contact with the border ruffians they became more devilish than the border ruffians themselves. From the moment they entered the Territory they have kept up one continual disturbance, refusing to go to the polls to vote when called upon to do so. They were unwilling to take any constitution except the one which they made at Topeka; and that, too, in defiance of law. Now their friends come forward and say, “do not let us admit Kansas under this constitution; it does not embody the will of the majority.” How are we to ascertain that will? If there are ten thousand voters in Kansas, and six thousand of them refuse to vote on any occasion, how can you find out that the four thousand who have voted do not express the will of the majority? It is a very common thing in some counties, where there is no contest, that men are elected by less than a one-third vote; and in a close contest in States and counties, the men elected, nine times out of ten, do not get a majority of the votes of the State or county. There are always a number of voters who do not go to the polls; and if their votes were cast against the successful candidate, he would be defeated.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what injurious effect would follow the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution? Some men say that the people there can alter their constitution before 1864, and others say they cannot. I am no lawyer, and do not propose to investigate that legal question. All I have to say is this: if they have the constitutional and legal right to alter it, let them alter it. If they cannot, let them submit. This thing was not thrown upon them suddenly. They were fully advised of the consequences by Walker and Stanton; and they were told that if they refused to vote they must take the consequences. They did refuse to vote. The convention met and the constitution was framed. That constitution is now presented. Congress ought, in my opinion, as an act of justice, leaving out the technicalities of law, to admit Kansas under that constitution. I must confess to you that I have but little sympathy for a party that stands out stubbornly, and refuses to abide by the law; and I am perfectly astonished at my Democratic friends who come forward and preach up the purity and honesty of those whom, in 1856, they denounced as traitors and rebels.

The question is not so much as to whether Kansas should be a free State or a slave State. But the question is, whether the public mind should be allowed to have repose from this matter which has been agitating it for years past. The South should have confidence in the North; the North should have confidence in the South; they should have confidence that each would do justice to the other. In 1856, when we were in conflict with the American party, we told them that their whole party in the North was abolitionized, and that, if the South expected to get justice she must look to the Democratic party North. We held up the State conventions of the Democratic party, and the speeches of their leaders, in which they stated that they intended to stand by the principle of non-intervention, by the principles of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, and that they regarded that act as just in all its parts.

Now, what did our friends of the American party say on that occasion? They said to us, your northern Democrats are promising very fairly, but you will see how they will carry out those promises if the people of Kansas recognize slavery in their constitution. They said that when our Democratic friends came to be called upon to vote on that constitution, the South would not have the support of a corporal's guard. We confidently believed otherwise; and I confidently believe still, that we have enough patriotism and love of country left in the ranks of the Democracy to carry this question. We have lost some friends whose loss I regret exceedingly. The influence of that loss will be serious in the southern States. So far as party is concerned, it would be ten thousand times better that Kansas should be rejected without Democratic votes. Some of our friends are disposed to look upon these brother Democrats of ours, who vote against Lecompton, as having joined the Republicans. My judgment is, that we will have a hard fight in 1860 with the Republicans, and that we will need every one of these Democrats to help us. I am opposed to turning one of them out; I fear that some of them will go out themselves; but so far as I am concerned I am in favor of keeping every one of them that I can keep. My honest opinion about these Democrats is, that when they come to examine the whole ground in regard to this Lecompton constitution, if they believe that there has been fraud and wrong, and that there has been a gross violation of right in getting up this Lecompton constitution, it is their duty to vote against it. But before they cast their votes against it, there should not rest on their minds one solitary doubt as to the propriety of their course. They must be fully satisfied. They must make up their minds not as partisans and politicians. I know that when the Democratic party parts with a brother Democrat, it does so with reluctance. We have stood shoulder to shoulder; have fought the battle and won it; and it is with feelings of deep mortification and regret that we are compelled to part with them. But before they do vote against us, I ask them to examine the whole history of this matter candidly and impartially; to lay aside all outside issues; and then, if they believe that there has been a violation of right and of justice, it is their duty, I repeat, as honest men, to vote against this Lecompton constitution. Their act will make a serious impression upon us at the South. But, sir, mixed up with evils there is always some good. When we go home and commence talking about this question, and when northern Democrats are held up to derision, and their vote cast in our teeth, we can point to southern gentlemen in this House and say that we had not made all right at home; and that before we say a solitary word against northern Democrats, we ought to see that we ourselves present a solid and compact column. We should first make pure our own household before we turn round and criticise our neighbor's.

That is all I shall say on this point, for I am not at all accustomed to addressing public assemblies. I have never before addressed a legislative body in my life. But, Mr. Chairman, I did not make up my mind on this subject until I had given it a most thorough scrutiny; until I had viewed it in all its aspects calmly and dispassionately. That scrutiny has led me to the conclusion that it is right and just; that the interests of the American people require the admission of Kansas into the Union, in order to restore peace and quiet to that Territory.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if you refuse to settle this Kansas difficulty at this time, what will be the result? This Topeka party will, in all probability, have the ascendancy, and they will liberate every solitary slave in the Territory. What then? Do you suppose these Missourians will submit to it? Not at all. They will never submit to it. The troubles of the Territory will begin anew, and be kept up until 1860. The Democratic party now desire to put down the Republican party. They desire to keep a Republican out of the presidential chair in 1860, because, if he once gets there, there will be danger. If you send this constitution back to Kansas without ratification, there is danger that the excitement may go on until it produces bloodshed and border war; and the difficulty will not be settled before 1860, if then. Admit Kansas into the Union, and what will be the result? There are not a great many negroes there; there will not be a great many there before 1860; and besides that, her Legislature has the right, under the constitution, to pay for the negroes, and then make it a free State. Would it not be a great deal better to contribute thus; would it not be better to raise the necessary funds, even by contributions? I myself would contribute towards the purchase of the slaves who are there, if they want to make it a free State. That is the way to make peace in the country.

The constitution which we have before us is just in all its features. It is a good constitution. The only difficulty about it is the slavery question. But, if there is not a majority of the people there in favor of slavery they are not going to have slavery there. This constitution cannot force slavery upon a free people if they do not want it; nor can they make a Territory or State free if its people want slaves. The only way, in my judgment, to restore peace in Kansas is to admit her into the Union with her constitution, and then allow the people there to settle their affairs in their own way. It is just like a man who has a wild boy; as long as the old man pays his expenses he will continue wild and ungovernable; but when the old man cuts loose and turns the boy on his own resources, he will reform. Just so with Kansas. The moment you give her a constitution, and leave the people to take care of themselves, they will regulate their own affairs, and peace and quiet will be restored. If it is to be a free State, they will make it a free State; if it is to be a slave State, there is no power in Congress, nor in the North, to make it a free State. So far as that is concerned, it is a matter of entire indifference to me. The great question upon which the South insists with so much pertinacity is this: Democrats of the North, will you vote to admit a State of the Union with a constitution recognizing slavery? Satisfy the South that you will do justice by her, and God forbid that we should ask for more. If they could be assured that you do not vote against the admission of Kansas into the Union because the constitution has slavery in it, they would be satisfied.

But, Mr. Chairman, you know that the very moment this constitution is rejected, and the intelligence goes forth over the land, southern men will say that northern Democrats have refused the constitution of Kansas because it had slavery in it. They will go upon the stump and vindicate the South against the usurpation. They can show more facts why Kansas should have been admitted than any man can show why she should not be admitted. The South is already united upon this question; she marches in a solid column.

I say, therefore, to northern Democrats, that unless you believe it is your imperious duty, unless you can see clearly that there has been fraud, unless you can see that the will of an honest people has been violated—for if they be a dishonest people they have no rights—I say, that unless you can see clearly that the will of the law-abiding, honest people has been overridden, do not reject this constitution. If you do so believe, then you must vote as your duty requires.

In regard to my Republican friends, all I have to say is just this: my own judgment about the whole matter is, that you men of the North are not really so solicitous whether Kansas shall be a free or a slave State as you are about the loaves and fishes—as you are about the election of the President of the United States. But, if you do not design the final and speedy overthrow of this Government, what, I ask, are you doing? It is apparent to everybody who looks over this House, that you are sowing the seeds of discord among our people. There is now, between the North and South, a feeling of distrust; a want of confidence; a belief that the North is not prepared to do the South justice. If you continue to go on and nourish this feeling—if you widen the breach, it will, before many years, grow into hate. Now, sir, the stability of our Government is dependent upon the affections of the American people, and upon their intelligence. Destroy the affection of the people for the Government, excite jealousy and distrust between the North and South, and I tell you there is not power or patriotism enough in the Union to hold the Government together.

Mr. GROW. I agree with the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. PERRY], who has just closed his remarks, that there should be no distrust between the different sections of the Union that the rights of each and all are not secure under the protection of the Constitution of the Republic.

By the third section of the fourth article of the Constitution, it is provided that "new States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union." Under that clause eighteen States have been added to the Union since its formation; thirteen with and five without an act of Congress authorizing the formation of a State government. But in every application, whether with or without an enabling act, the first and most important question for the determination of Congress is whether the constitution presented embodies in its essential features the will of the people to be affected by it. If it does not, then it should be rejected, no matter what the authority or mode of its formation. The people of a Territory have the right, like any other portion of the American people, under the first clause of the amendments to the Constitution, to petition the Government at all times, and it is in the discretionary power of Congress to grant their prayer or not. The application of a people for admission as a State is, in all cases, in the nature of a petition. An enabling act is not, therefore, absolutely necessary for the people of a Territory before they can proceed to form a constitution and State government, in order to apply for admission into the Union. Yet as the territorial government is established by Congress, it cannot be superseded by any other government without the assent of Congress. It is not, however, material whether that assent be given before or after the action of the people of the Territory.

I take this occasion, in passing, to express my obligations to my colleague, [Mr. PHILLIPS,] for the notice and importance which he attached to my views on this point, expressed by me in the last Congress. As he quoted them with approval, I am rejoiced to know that he and his political associates still adhere to one doctrine of the Jackson Democracy, and I hope that they may yet return to the principles and teachings of Jefferson and the fathers of American Democracy, from which, within the last few years, they have so widely strayed.

The great question which presents itself in this case is, does the constitution meet the will of the people who are to be affected by it? That has been the first and the controlling question in the action of Congress on every application for a new State in the history of the Government. In the case of Michigan, she came here against the forms prescribed for her action; yet Congress took the will of the people, and set aside all formalities.

In the case upon which we are now called to act, we have only the form of a constitution presented by one man, and the argument of the President in its favor; while the people of Kansas, who are to be affected by it, protest against admission into the Union under it in every form by which they can make their will known.

The entire history of the Lecompton constitution proves that a large majority of the people of Kansas are opposed to it. The evidence of this fact, in the possession of the House, is the remonstrance of its citizens laid upon your table, the protest of the State officers elected under this constitution, also of the Delegate on this floor; the resolutions of the Legislative Assembly, and the vote of the people on the 4th of January. In all the reliable information from the Territory there is but one opinion expressed as to the opposition of the people to this constitution. Governor Walker, in his letter to General Cass, says:

"I state it as a fact, based on a long and intimate association with the people of Kansas, that an overwhelming majority of that people are opposed to that instrument; and my letters state that but one out of twenty of the press of Kansas sustains it." * * * * "Indeed, disguise it as we may to ourselves under the influence of the present excitement, the facts will demonstrate that any attempt by Congress to force this constitution upon the people of Kansas will be an effort to substitute the will of a small minority for that of an overwhelming majority of the people of Kansas."

Governor Stanton corroborates this statement, and adds:

"It can only be maintained by the arms of the Federal Government forcing the constitution upon the people against their declared will, and against every principle of republicanism, democracy, right, and justice."

The State officers elected on the 4th of January last, under this constitution, protest in the following language:

"We, the officers elected under said constitution, do most respectfully and earnestly pray your honorable bodies not to admit Kansas into the Union under said constitution, and thus force upon an unwilling people an organic law against their express will, and in violation of every principle of popular government."

Signed by the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, Secretary of State, State Treasurer, and Auditor.

This memorial was laid on our table with an indorsement of its truth by the Delegate from the Territory.

We also have the resolutions of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory, passed on the 12th of January, declaring:

"That the people of Kansas being opposed to said constitution, Congress has no rightful power under it to admit said Territory into the Union as a State, and we, the representatives of said people, do hereby, in their name, and on their behalf, solemnly protest against such admission."

And on the last day of its session the Legislature passed unanimously the following resolve:

"That we do hereby, for the last time, solemnly protest against the admission of Kansas into the Union under the Lecompton constitution; that we hail back, with scorn, the libelous charge contained in the message of the President accompanying the Lecompton constitution, to the effect that the freemen of Kansas are a lawless people; that, relying upon the justice of our cause, we do hereby, in behalf of the people we represent, solemnly pledge ourselves to each other, to our friends in Congress and in the States, our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honors, to resist the Lecompton constitution and government by the force of arms, if necessary; that, in this perilous hour of our history, we appeal to the civilized world for the rectitude of our position, and call upon the friends of freedom everywhere to array themselves against the last act of oppression in the Kansas drama."

Thus have they protested in every form known to the organism of our Government. And last of all they protested at the ballot-box, with over ten thousand voices. On the 4th of January last, a vote was ordered to be taken for and against this constitution by the Legislature, which is recognized as valid by all parties in the Territory, and by the President, in declaring to Governor Denver that the people must be protected in voting for or against the constitution on that day. Almost eleven thousand voters protested then against that constitution, as not embodying their will. On the 21st of December, the vote was only six thousand five hundred and twenty-six, half of which has been proven fraudulent by the investigating committee ordered by the Legislature; so that not more than three thousand legal votes were cast on the proposition then submitted, leaving a majority of from seven to eight thousand against this constitution. Yet we are asked to enact it into the organic law of the people, and to institute under it a State government of officers elected by fraud. We are asked to cast aside the vote of the people on the 4th of January, because they did not vote at the preceding elections.

That election, it is said, was illegal, though it is not denied that it expressed the popular will; but that the people could not vote on their constitution at any other election than the one fixed by the delegates to the convention. It was the same legislative power that fixed the election of the 4th of January that called the convention, with the exception that the Legislature that fixed the election derived its power from the people, while the one that called the convention was a usurpation. But treating them both as valid, the last one had as much power as the first, and was the legislative power of the Territory, and must continue to be till it is superseded by some government, with the consent of Congress. Until that time it has full legislative power to enact, repeal, or modify any existing laws of the Territory; and if the Lecompton convention prevents that, then, in the language of the President, it would be rebellion; for the territorial government would be superseded without the consent of Congress. Why does he not send his army to put down this constitution and its supporters, as he did to put down the Topeka party on the 4th of July, 1856? If the Territorial Legislature does not possess the legislative power of the Territory, then the people have parted with their sovereignty, irrevocably, for four months, or until the action of Congress on this constitution. If so, they could as well part with it forever, and thus your reason would subvert all the maxims of our system of government. The time and mode of voting on the 4th of January was established by the legislative authority of the Territory, an authority as valid and as legal as was the same authority in calling the convention.

It is argued that though this constitution does not embody the will of the people, yet they must submit to it because they did not vote before its formation, though they did afterwards. It is a new and a strange doctrine that the people of this country, who are the depositaries of the sovereignty of the Government, have not the right to vote upon the same subject to-morrow because they refuse to go to the polls to-day. It is one of the rights of American citizens to absent themselves from elections if they choose; and I grant you that when all have the privilege of voting, those who do not vote must submit to the action of those who do. But when the majority do vote, where is the reason for turning a deaf ear to their voice? If the people withhold their votes at a primary election, does that deprive them of the right to vote upon the great question of what shall be their fundamental law? They did vote on the 4th of January; and why disregard the will of the people fully expressed at the ballot-box? This is not a question of whether the minority shall control the State because the majority have not voted; for in this case they went to the polls and did vote. But you say they shall not vote to-day, because they refused to vote yesterday. That is a matter which does not concern you. The people themselves are the ones to decide under what circumstances they will vote, or withhold their votes. They voted at the first election held in that Territory, at which a fair expression of the public will could be given.

At the election for the call of a convention, the test oaths were upon the statute-books of Kansas, which would disfranchise all who would not submit to degradation; all the tests and laws which were declared by General Cass, in the Senate, to be a "disgrace to the age and the country." Senator Bayard said they were "shocking to the moral sense;" and Senator Weller that they were "infamous in their character," "in violation of the Constitution," and "revolting to every feeling of humanity." Mr. Clayton denounced them as "unjust, iniquitous, oppressive, and infamous laws."

These test laws were thus denounced upon the floor of the Senate of the United States, by men who could not be charged with fanaticism. No one, then, could vote on the call for the convention who was not ready to submit to those test oaths; and but 2,670 votes were polled for the convention, though the Delegate to Congress, at the same election, received 4,276. These test oaths were repealed, it is true, before the election of delegates; but in the election of delegates half of the counties were disfranchised, and that, too, by no fault of theirs. Fifteen of the counties were entirely disfranchised, and four others partially. Governor Walker, in his letter to General Cass of the 15th December, 1857, says:

"In nineteen of these counties there was no census, and therefore there could be no such apportionment there of delegates, based upon such census. And in fifteen of these counties there was no registry of voters. These fifteen counties, including many of the oldest organized counties of the Territory, were entirely disfranchised, and did not give and (by no fault of their own) could not give a solitary vote for delegates to the convention."

"In fifteen counties out of thirty-four, there was no registry, and not a solitary vote was given or could be given for delegates to the convention in any of these counties."

Governor Stanton, in corroboration of this statement, in his address to the people of the United States, says:

"The registration required by law had been imperfect in all the counties, and had been wholly omitted in one half of them; nor could the people of these disfranchised counties vote in any adjacent county, as has been falsely suggested."

But it has been urged by the advocates of Le-compton that the disfranchisement of these counties was the fault of the voters themselves in not being registered; that after the census was taken, an opportunity was given for correcting the list. But how correct a list where there is none? and the voters who were disfranchised had no opportunity to put themselves upon the list, for no registry was made, and no correction could be made until there was a registry.

Mr. CLEMENS. I wish to ask the gentleman if the law does not require that the lists shall be posted up in a conspicuous place in each county, in order to give the people the right and power before the proper authorities to have their names inserted? And in addition to that, did not, in four of those counties, your party interpose every obstacle against taking the census, and interfere with the officers whose duty it was to take the census?

Mr. GROW. Can you correct a list until it is made? The law requires a copy of the lists to be posted, and then they could be corrected. I will read the law which required the census and registration, passed 19th February, 1857, which provides that a census shall be taken by the sheriffs of the several counties; and in case there shall be no sheriff, then by the probate judge of the courts; and in case of vacancy in the office of both sheriff and probate judge, the Governor to appoint some competent resident of said county.

The duty of the census-taker is thus prescribed by the third section of this law:

"It shall be the duty of the sheriff, probate judge, or person appointed by the Governor as herein provided, in each county or election district, on or before the 10th day of April next, to file in the office of the probate judge for such county or election district a full and complete list of all the qualified voters resident in his said county or election district on the 1st day of April, 1857; which list shall exhibit, in a fair and legible hand, the names of all such legal voters."

And in the fifth section, it is provided that

"Said probate judge shall remain in session each day, Sundays excepted, from the time of receiving said returns, until the first day of May next, at such place as shall be most convenient to the inhabitants of the county or election district; and proceed to the inspection of said returns, and hear, correct, and finally determine, according to the facts, without unreasonable delay, all questions concerning the omission of any person from said returns, or the improper insertion of any name on said returns, and any other questions affecting the integrity or fidelity of said returns; and for this purpose shall have power to administer oaths and examine witnesses, and compel their attendance in such manner as said judge shall deem necessary."

Now, unless a return was made by the census taker to the probate judge, there would be no list to correct, and of course there was no way for the voter to be registered, and if not registered, he could not vote. Nine of those fifteen counties which were disfranchised, gave a vote on the 4th of January, as certified to by Governor Denver, of one thousand six hundred and twenty-four against this constitution.

Mr. CLEMENS. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania is making a fair argument, I desire to ask another question. I put it to the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether, in every county in which a vote was not taken, or in which a registry was not made, the obstacles against taking a vote and making the registry did not come exclusively from the free-State party of Kansas?

Mr. GROW. No, sir, not to my knowledge; and in fifteen of those counties which were totally disfranchised the people of those counties were no way in fault for no census being taken by the officers required by law to do it; and if there was none taken, then they could not vote, as I have shown. The people of some of them, Anderson county in particular, petitioned the Governor, stating that no census had been taken, and asking what they should do. He answered that he had no power to remedy the omission, but advised them to go on and elect delegates, and that the convention would undoubtedly receive them. In Anderson they did elect delegates, but the convention did not receive them.

The votes polled by the free-State men in nine of these disfranchised counties on the 4th of January, being one thousand six hundred and twenty-four, is almost as great as the whole number of votes polled in the Territory for the election of delegates to the convention, the average of the vote on delegates being about eighteen hundred. These counties were never attached to any other counties for the purpose of electing delegates to the convention, though they were attached to other counties for the purpose of electing members to the Legislature. One half of the counties of Kansas, then, had no right to vote at all for delegates to the convention that framed this constitution, and that, too, by no fault of theirs; while the census was very imperfectly taken in the other counties, by the intentional omission of free-State men. The Delegate from Kansas upon this floor, the Mayor of the city of Leavenworth, and many other of the most prominent free-State men, were omitted, in addition to whole free-State settlements.

Under the pretended submission the 21st of December, there was no opportunity for an expression of opinion on the constitution; for nothing could be voted on save the future importation of slaves, and that only by swearing to support the constitution itself, if adopted. Even if they did that, they could only vote on the slavery clause that permitted future importation of slaves, with no power whatever to vote slavery out. For if everybody voted against what was called "the slavery clause," there still remained the clause against which nobody was allowed to vote, viz: "that the rights of property in slaves, now in this Territory, shall in no manner be interfered with." This was not submitted; and to make it perpetual, another clause, not submitted, provides that by no future "revising, altering, or amending of the constitution" shall "alteration be made to affect the right of property in the ownership of slaves."

But I pass on, having shown conclusively from the record that the people of Kansas never had, until the 4th day of January last, a fair opportunity to be heard upon the formation of this constitution, either in calling the convention, or in the election of delegates. The only time they could vote fairly was on the 4th of January, and yet gentlemen upon this floor insist that because they did not vote before, their votes then are of no consequence.

Why did they not vote before? First, on account of the test oaths at the time the question of the convention was voted on. Next, when the delegates to that convention were elected, more than half the counties were entirely disfranchised; and there were a large number of the free-State party in the other counties who could not vote. Yet it is asked why, under this state of things, they did not go to the polls and vote. These facts would be a sufficient reason of themselves for their abstaining from voting; but in addition they were assured that they would have an opportunity to vote on the constitution itself. They had a right to expect it by every consideration of fairness and justice, whether they voted for delegates or not. In the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent, should the question be submitted whether a constitutional convention should be called or not, I may stay from the polls when that question is submitted; but when the constitution is framed, and I desire to vote on it, where is the justice under our system of government of excluding me from voting upon it? Gentlemen have quoted precedents to show that it is not necessary to have a vote on the constitution. We have been told that the constitutions of New Jersey and other States were never submitted; and that therefore there is no need of submitting a constitution to the vote of any people.

The gentleman from Rhode Island on my left, [Mr. BRAYTON,] represents a State which for nearly two centuries, had a charter from Charles the Second as its constitution, and it never was voted on by the people, and for over three quarters of a century after the Declaration of Independence it continued to be the organic law of Rhode Island; and the argument is, that that being so, there is no need of the people of Kansas voting on their constitution. New Jersey never voted on her constitution; therefore, say these precedent-finders, why should the people of Kansas be allowed to vote on theirs? If each of the States of the Union had to-day a constitution that was never submitted to a vote of the people, but was acquiesced in, as framed by the delegates, would that be any reason why, when there are two great parties in a State, differing on fundamental principles and as to their proposed organic law, a majority of the people ought to be deprived of the chance of voting upon it? We often pass laws here by one vote, or no vote at all, because there is no difference of sentiment on it, but is that any reason why we should not have a chance to vote when we do differ? When there is a general acquiescence by a people in a constitution, then it is of no consequence whether it be submitted or not; but when a portion of the people demand that it shall be submitted, are they to be told that they are not to exercise the right of voting on it, because some other people did not wish to vote on theirs?

There is no precedent for a constitution being put in force, in this country anywhere, without a submission to a vote of the people, if any considerable portion of them desired it, or if there was any great diversity of sentiment as to its essential provisions. That in such a case it is not necessary to submit the constitution to a vote, is a doctrine asserted for the first time in our history on this constitution.

What is the difference in a law being passed for a people by a despot, or by nominal representatives, whose acts are beyond the supervision of the constituency?

If such a doctrine is to be established in the politics of this country, we may well ask, are we upon the banks of the Danube and Bosphorus, or on soil drenched by martyr blood in its consecration to freedom? The disregard of the will of the people, in the refusal to submit their organic law for their approval, if they desire it, is, to me, a despotism equally odious with that of Austria or any other tyranny.

The people of Kansas had a right to expect that the constitution of the Leecompton convention would be submitted for approval or rejection, not only by every consideration of justice and the universally-recognized maxims of free government, but by the pledges of all who were supposed to have any control over the matter.

How could the popular will be so well ascertained as by an election? In no other way are you sure of embodying it, for the reason which the President, in his annual message, states why a constitution should be submitted:

"The election of delegates to a convention must necessarily take place in separate districts. From this cause it may readily happen, as has often been the case, that a majority of the people of a State or Territory are on one side of a question, whilst a majority of the representatives from the several districts into which it is divided may be upon the other side. This arises from the fact that in some districts delegates may be elected by small majorities, whilst in others those of different sentiments may receive majorities sufficiently great not only to overcome the votes given for the former, but to leave a large majority of the whole people in direct opposition to a majority of the delegates. Besides, our history proves that influences may be brought to bear on the representative sufficiently powerful to induce him to disregard the will of his constituents."

The Washington Union of 7th July, 1857, held the same views as to the duty and propriety of the constitution of a people being submitted to a vote if desired:

"Under these circumstances, there can be no such thing as ascertaining clearly and without doubt, the will of the people, in any way except by their own direct expression of it at the polls. A constitution not subjected to that test, no matter what it contains, will never be acknowledged by its opponents to be anything but a fraud."

"We do most devoutly believe that, unless the constitution of Kansas be submitted to a direct vote of the people, the unhappy controversy which has heretofore raged in that Territory, will be prolonged for an indefinite time to come."

Governor Walker, everywhere in Kansas, pledged his honor, by the approval, as he told the people, of the President and his Cabinet, that the constitution should be submitted. In his inaugural to the people of Kansas, after quoting his instructions from the President, he says:

"I repeat, then, as my clear conviction, that unless the convention submit the constitution to the vote of all the actual resident settlers of Kansas, and the election be fairly and justly conducted, the constitution will be, and ought to be, rejected by Congress."

Without stopping for further reference to his inaugural, in which he is most emphatic on this point, I read from a speech of his delivered at Topeka, on the 8th of June, 1857, and published in the Topeka Statesman of the 9th:

"At the next election in October, when you elect the Territorial Legislature, you can repeal these laws; and you can, also, by a majority of your own votes, adopt or reject the constitution presented for your consideration next fall. Can you not peaceably decide this question in the mode pointed out by the act of Congress, if you, as you can and will, have a full opportunity of recording your vote? [A voice, 'How are we to get it?'] You will get it by the convention submitting the constitution to the vote of the whole people. [A voice, 'Who is to elect the convention?'] That is the grand question. Gentlemen, it is a comparatively small point by whom the constitution is submitted. Don't let us run away after shadows. The great substantial point is this: Will the whole people of Kansas next fall, by a fair election, impartially and fairly conducted by impartial judges, have an opportunity to decide for themselves what shall be their form of government, and what shall be their social institutions? I say they will; but I go a step further. [A voice, 'Have you the power?'] If I have not the power to bring it about, if the convention will not do it, I will join you in lawful opposition to their proceedings. [Cries of 'Good!'] 'Good!' 'We hold you to your promise. Nothing can be asked fairer than that.']"

These promises were given in the most authoritative forms; first, on the general doctrine of free governments, that the people shall have an opportunity to pass on their organic law; and next, they had the positive pledges of the men who had authority to give those pledges. And yet, Judas-like, they were betrayed by a kiss. Governor Walker, in his letter to General Cass of December 15, 1857, says:

"In truth, I had to choose between arresting that insurrection, at whatever cost of American blood, by the Federal army, or to prevent the terrible catastrophe, as I did, by my pledges to the people of the exertion of all my power to obtain a fair election, and the submission of the constitution to the vote of the people for ratification or rejection."

"Not a drop of blood has been shed by the Federal troops in Kansas during my administration. But insurrection and civil war, extending, I fear, throughout the country, were alone prevented by the course pursued by me on those occasions; and the whole people, abandoning revolutionary violence, were induced by me to go for the first time into a general and peaceful election."

proclaimed to them that they should have a fair chance to vote, and that they would not be cheated out of their rights by fraud and violence, as they had been before in the whole history of Kansas, said that they asked nothing fairer than that; and they went to the polls holding your executive officer to his word; which, had he been permitted by the President to keep, there would have been now no disturbance in Kansas.

The Government told them that they would have the privilege of going to the polls and voting for or against the constitution; yet that right was denied them: and you insist now on consummating the wrong.

These men whom the President has arraigned as traitors and rebels, and therefore not to have the rights of freemen, were quieted by the simple declaration that they should have justice. All opposition ceases then, and they follow the course marked out by Governor Walker to pacify Kansas. You could have pacified Kansas in five minutes, at any time within the last four years, by securing to her people a ballot-box free from fraud and violence. It was all they asked. I will read you from the dispatches that came to the President, to show that he falsifies the truth of history when he charges these men with rebellion and treason. They have done what American freemen, true to the blood that runs in their veins, and true to the great heritage which they received from their ancestors, should do. They would never submit to a usurpation of their political rights. They believe in the motto of Thomas Jefferson, that "resistance to tyrants is obedience to God."

The President cannot find on record an instance of the people of Kansas ever resisting the laws of the United States. They simply refused to support the territorial organization. They said, "we will have nothing to do with it; you may go on and administer it as you please; we pay no attention to it, but offer no forcible resistance."

Governor Shannon, in his dispatch to the President of April 11, 1856, speaking of the Topeka Legislature, says:

"The legislative action of this body was mainly prospective in its character, and looks forward to the admission of Kansas into the Union as a State, or to future legislation before their enactments are to be enforced as law."

Governor Robinson, in his message to this Legislature, takes occasion to define the character of the Topeka movement in the following declarations:

"It is understood that the deputy marshal has private instructions to arrest the members of the Legislature and the State officers for treason as soon as this address is received by you. In such an event, of course, no resistance will be offered to the officer. Men who are ready to defend their own and their country's honor with their lives, can never object to a legal investigation into their action, nor to suffer any punishment their conduct may merit. We should be unworthy the constituency we represent did we shrink from martyrdom on the scaffold or at the stake, should duty require it. Should the blood of Collins and Dow, of Barber and Brown, be insufficient to quench the thirst of the President and his accomplices in the hollow mockery of 'squatter sovereignty' they are practicing upon the people of Kansas, then more victims must be furnished. Let what will come, not a finger should be raised against the Federal authority until there shall be no hope of relief but in revolution."

Governor Geary, in his farewell to the people of Kansas, bears the following testimony as to the character of this people:

"The great body of the actual citizens are conservative, law-abiding and peace-loving men, disposed rather to make sacrifices for conciliation and consequent peace, than to insist for their entire rights, should the general good thereby be caused to suffer."

What was the character of the government in Kansas that the President says would have been long since overturned if he had not maintained it with the Army of the United States? Governor Geary, in his dispatch to Mr. Marcy, September 9, 1856, (Executive Documents, Third Session Thirty-Fourth Congress, volume I, part I, page 88), says:

"I find that I have not simply to contend against bands of armed ruffians and brigands, whose sole aim and end is assassination and robbery, infuriated adherents and advocates of conflicting political sentiments and local institutions, and evil-disposed persons actuated by a desire to obtain elevated positions, but worst of all, against the influence of men who have been placed in authority, and have employed all the destructive agents around them to promote their own personal interests at the sacrifice of every just, honorable, and lawful consideration. I have barely time to give you a brief statement of facts as I find them. The town of Leavenworth is now in the hands of armed bodies of men, who, having been enrolled as militia, perpetrate outrages of the most atrocious character, under shadow of authority from the territorial government. Within a few days these men have robbed and driven from their houses unfording citizens; have fired upon and killed others in their own dwellings, and stolen horses and property under the pretense of employing them in the public service. They have seized persons who had committed no offense, and after stripping them of all their valuables, placed them on steamers, and sent them out of the Territory."

"In isolated or country places, no man's life is safe. The roads are filled with armed robbers; and murders, for mere plunder, are of daily occurrence. Almost every farm-house is deserted, and no traveler has the temerity to venture upon the highways without an escort."

Same document, page 72, Lieutenant McIntosh, of the first cavalry, writes Woodsen, acting Governor at the time, that—

"It is a notorious fact that some of the band who originally came into this Territory with Colonel Buford has committed gross outrages, and I can say with certainty that there are still small parties of his men now in the Territory acting in the most lawless manner."

"Great complaints are constantly made to me of the stoppage of wagons and men on the road, and in a great many instances robberies have been committed."

These men are some of the peaceable emigrants that went from the South, each presented by a clergyman of the Palmetto State with a Bible instead of a Sharpe's rifle.

Same document, page 106, Governor Geary, in a dispatch to Mr. Marcy, September 16, 1856, says:

"The whole country was evidently infested with armed bands of marauders, who set all law at defiance, and traveled from place to place, assailing villages, sacking and burning houses, destroying crops, maltreating women and children, driving off and stealing cattle and horses, and murdering harmless men in their own dwellings and on the public highways."

"Whilst engaged in making preparations for the foregoing expedition, several messengers reached me from Lawrence, announcing that a powerful army was marching upon that place, it being the main body of the militia called into service by the proclamation of Secretary Woodson, when acting Governor."

"Twenty-seven hundred men; under command of Generals Hershell, Reid, Atchinson, Richardson, Stringfellow, &c., were encamped on the Warkarusa, about four miles from Lawrence, eager and determined to exterminate that place and all its inhabitants."

Governor Geary, in his message to the Legislature, says:

"There is not a single officer in the Territory amenable to the people or to the Governor; all having been appointed by the Legislature and holding their offices until 1857. This system of depriving the people of the just exercise of their rights cannot be too strongly condemned."

Governor Geary, in his farewell to the people of Kansas, gives the following picture of its condition:

"I reached Kansas and entered upon the discharge of my official duties in the most gloomy hour of her history. Desolation and ruin reigned on every hand. Homes and fire-sides were deserted. The smoke of burning dwellings darkened the atmosphere. Women and children, driven from their habitations, wandered over the prairies and through the woodlands, or sought refuge and protection among the Indian tribes."

While such was the condition of Kansas, and these wrongs were perpetrated by the acquiescence, if not instigation, of the Administration, its supporters in Pennsylvania called upon the voters in the following language. I read from a handbill for a Democratic meeting, at Mifflinburg, September 27, 1856:

"Democrats! Whigs! Republicans! turn out and learn the fact that it is the Democratic party that is laboring for freedom for Kansas, the assertions of opposition orators to the contrary notwithstanding."

Four Governors have returned from that Territory, all telling the same story to the American people; that is, that the rights of the people of Kansas have all been trampled in the dust, the ballot-box violated, their houses burned, their presses destroyed, their public buildings battered down by United States cannon under the direction of United States officers; yet in the face of the unanimous voice of these men who have been upon the ground, seen with their own eyes, and heard with their own ears, the President and his adherents insist that they know best what is the condition of Kansas and the will of its people. The President says the free-State party have been rebellious because they have refused to vote. The free-State party in Kansas have never refused to vote, when they had a fair opportunity.

Why should this great fraud upon the rights of a people be consummated? What reason can there be, what overshadowing necessity exists, for so great a violation of the principles of free government. The only reason urged by its advocates for sustaining so glaring frauds upon popular rights is, that it will give peace to Kansas, and end the political agitations of the country.

Peace among a brave people is not the fruit of injustice, nor does agitation cease by the perpetration of wrong. For a third of a century the advocates of slavery, while exercising unrestricted speech in its defense, have struggled to prevent all discussion against it. In the South by penal statutes, mob-law, and brute force; in the North by dispersing assemblages of peaceable citizens, pelting their lecturers, burning their halls, and destroying their presses. In this forum of the people, by finality resolves, on all laws for the benefit of slavery, not, however, to affect those in behalf of freedom, and by attempts to stifle the great constitutional right of the people at all times to petition their Government. Yet, despite threats, mob-law, and finality resolves, the discussion goes on, and will continue to, so long as right and wrong, justice and injustice, humanity and inhumanity, shall struggle for supremacy in the affairs of men.

The President makes the same excuse for his treatment of Kansas that tyrants ever employ in justification of their cruelty and wrong. That is, that the injured and oppressed, because they will not kiss the hand that smites, are rebels and traitors; and the wrong-doer, while perverting the truth and suppressing the facts of history, strives, with hard words, to heap obloquy and reproach upon the character and motives of men in every way the equal, if not the superior, of the traducer.

All the wrongs of Kansas are sustained by the Administration, because they were perpetrated under the forms of law. Justice and right seem to be of less consequence than forms and precedents. The cruelest tyranny on the face of the earth rests on forms of law where it exists.

The bloodiest pages in the drama of man's existence have been written under the color of law, and too often in the name of justice and liberty. The Jew crucified the Savior because he was a fanatic, and stirred up dissensions among the people. The law-and-order conservatism of the middle ages ostracised Luther as a heretic, because, while exposing the corruptions of the church and the reigning dynasties, he proclaimed to the people the great truths first taught on the sea-shore, and along the hillsides of Judea. The Grütli of the forest cantons of Switzerland, planning at the midnight hour on the banks of Lake Luzerne the liberties of their country, were, in the eyes of all Europe, rebels against society, and traitors to law and order. The world's reformers have ever been, in the days in which they lived, heretics, fanatics, and agitators; and in most instances have fallen victims to the prevailing prejudices and vices which they combated. Yet such are the retributions of Heaven on earth that the crucifiers of the world's redeemers have been forced to pay homage at their graves when dead.

The President, in his special message on Kansas, seems to have imbibed the spirit, adopted the tone, temper, and language of George III., in his proclamations and manifestoes against the American colonies. While thus imitating his great prototype, let him take warning by his example how he forces a wronged and outraged people to appeal to the God of battles, in vindication of their rights, unless he is ambitious of being the Nero of the liberties of his country.

In my judgment, the first gun fired by a United States soldier in an attempt to force this Lecompton fraud upon the people of Kansas, will light a flame that seas of blood may not be able to extinguish. It will be but the echo of the British musketry, in the streets of Boston, on the 19th of April, 1775. It would be but another struggle in vindication of the great truth of the Declaration of Independence, that all governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed.

From my personal acquaintance with the free-State men of Kansas, and what I know of their character—these descendants of Warren, Putnam, Greene and Wayne—when forced, in submitting to injustice and wrong, to a point beyond which endurance ceases to be a virtue, will prove themselves no degenerate sons of noble sires. When, ever any portion of the American people shall become so callous to a sense of justice, and so dead to the rights which belong to freemen, as tamely to submit to a usurpation, by fraud and violence, of all the powers of their government, then, indeed, will they be fit for slaves.

Mr. MILLSON. The gentleman refers to the consequences of firing a gun after the adoption of the Lecompton constitution. I ask him whether, if the Lecompton constitution be voted down, Kansas would not be returned to her territorial condition?

Mr. GROW. She will remain under a Territorial Legislature recognized now by all sides as a valid one.

Mr. MILLSON. Is not slavery now one of the institutions of the Territory?

Mr. GROW. It is under the Lecompton constitution.

Mr. MILLSON. Outside of the Lecompton constitution, is it not recognized by the territorial laws?

Mr. GROW. The law of the Territory protects it.

Mr. MILLSON. Then the adoption of the Lecompton constitution would not effect any change in the rights or personal condition of any human being in Kansas?

Mr. GROW. I do not propose to go into that matter, as it is not a question involved. The question in Kansas now, is whether the people shall have a right to govern themselves? and whenever any portion of the people abandon that right tamely, and submit to a usurpation of the powers of their government, then they will be fit for slaves. If ever that time comes, the Genius of Liberty may wing her way back from earth to Heaven.

Mr. PHILLIPS. In this connection I will ask my colleague whether he has not, on a former occasion, said that the will of the people of a Territory could be as well expressed in the choice of delegates as in their action in the convention?

Mr. GROW. The gentleman has not understood my speech correctly. He will find that I put the admission of Kansas under the Topeka constitution upon the ground that it had been submitted to the people, and that two thousand three hundred—a large majority of all the legal voters of the Territory at that time—voted in favor of it.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. GROW. I cannot yield any more of my time.

Mr. Chairman, injustice, once enthroned in power, ever strives, by every device of taunt and jeer, to divert attention from its enormities, and to avoid, if possible, all discussion of its abuses. The weapons of a self-satisfied conservatism, employed since the world began to uphold its injustice and wrong, or to perpetuate its ill-gotten power, has been to excite popular prejudice by crying "destructive," "agrarian," "leveler," "fanatic," or some other epithet made odious by sceptered cruelty and wrong. Such have been the arguments of prejudice and power from the time Socrates swallowed the hemlock, and Galileo quivered on the rack.

The history of to-day proves that power and wrong have not ceased to rely for their support upon attempts to excite the unworthy prejudices of human nature by the clamor of startling and odious epithets. By such means does the President strive to gloss over the blackest page of American history, written within the last four years, by the Administration and its minions, in the woes of Kansas. Its soil red with the blood of its murdered citizens, and its atmosphere darkened with the smoke of their burning dwellings, while women and children flee to the savage tribes of the wilderness to find protection against their less merciful white pursuers. With the wrongs of this people unredressed, and their supplications for justice and the rights of freemen still ringing in the ears of the President, he declares that "Kansas has, for some years, occupied too much of the public attention. It is high time this should be directed to far more important objects."

What more important object can this Government have than to guard the hearthstone of the hardy pioneer as he goes forth into the wilderness to found new States and build up new empires? What higher duty has it to perform than to secure to the citizen—the humblest and most obscure, as well as to the highest and most exalted—the rights guaranteed to him by the Constitution of his country? In Kansas, from the first, these have all been trampled in the dust. Hence, Kansas has, for some years, occupied the public attention. Is it possible that the Chief Magistrate of the Republic can find any more important object for the attention of the Government than the protection of the rights and liberties of American citizens, ruthlessly violated under the flag of their country, unless the nobler and better impulses of human nature expired in his bosom as the last drop of Democratic blood oozed from his veins?

Kansas wants peace; not the peace of servile submission, to brute force, but the peace that justice ever brings. The country wants quiet and repose; not the quiet of the graveyard or the repose of death, but the quiet and repose secured by liberty, maintained by law. But so long as the power of this Government is wielded to fasten an odious despotism upon Kansas, and to propagate the institutions of human bondage, so long there will and can be no peace. You can give peace to Kansas, repose to the country—and forever this slavery agitation—if you will bring back the Government to the policy of the fathers, and reestablish in its administration their maxims of justice and humanity.

Peace is the siren song that has ever preceded the perpetration of every new outrage upon the sentiments of the North, and the rights and interests of free labor. On the 4th of March, 1853, from the steps of yonder portico, the President congratulated the country that "the agitation of the slavery question was at rest." The troubled waters of past political dissensions had subsided, and not a ripple disturbed the surface. The ark of our covenant reposed on dry ground, and the dove had found a resting-place. Every foot of territory then owned by the Federal Government was fixed in its character of slave or free, by some law which Mr. Webster, in his delusion, thought to be irrevocable. And under the then existing judicial decisions and constitutional constructions it was all fixed for freedom. No note of discord jarred on the universal harmony. The patriot was congratulating himself that the era of good feeling and brotherhood had at last dawned upon his country. What disturbed this unruffled calm, and again broke up the fountains of the deep?

On the 30th of May, 1854, five hundred thousand square miles of this territory, once consecrated to freedom forever by solemn act of our fathers, was opened to the spread of the institutions of human bondage. The passage of the bill at the dead hour of the night, was heralded from this Capitol by the boom of cannon, since echoed from the plains of Kansas in the sighs of its widows and orphans, and the wail of its martyrs to freedom. In order to drown these cries, and, if possible, to stifle the awakened sense of justice, and the excited sympathies of the humane heart, we are now called upon to perpetrate still another great outrage upon the rights of this people. There is no difficulty in giving peace to Kansas, and quieting the agitation of the country upon the exciting subject of slavery. When you will do justice to freemen, and allow them to make their own organic law, free from violence and fraud, that object will be accomplished.

There is in Kansas, to-day, a state of things which has not existed there since its organization. At their first election, their government was seized upon by invaders, who held possession of it till the election in October last, when the people of Kansas, for the first time, elected their own officers.

Mr. CLEMENS. As the gentleman is the reputed leader—

Mr. GROW. I am the leader of nobody but myself.

Mr. CLEMENS. Well, I want to ask a question.

Mr. GROW. Very well.

Mr. CLEMENS. Do I understand the gentleman to maintain that the people of Kansas have not the right to amend their constitution until 1864?

Mr. GROW. I maintain that when you make a fundamental law for the people, and put in it a provision prescribing the mode and manner in which it can be changed, it cannot be changed peaceably, except through those forms, as long as there is a party that adheres to the forms. If there is a party in Kansas who will attempt to change that constitution before 1864, except in the mode provided by it, in my opinion the Federal Administration, judging from its actions during the last four years, will send the Army of the United States to put down any such attempt.

Mr. CLEMENS. What becomes, then, of your doctrine of the sovereignty of the people?

Mr. GROW. The people place in their organic law the conditions upon which they will exert their sovereignty; and if it could be changed without any observance of forms, a constitution would be the same as a by-law of a corporation. By acquiescence of the people it could be changed at any time. While I believe it to be the absolute right of a people to change their form of government at any time, I must act on such a question in view of the probable action of the President, who, if called upon, has to quell insurrection with the Army. In Rhode Island, the people had been protesting against their constitution for twenty years, and the people, by a clear majority, came together and framed a new constitution; but the Supreme Court of the United States said that they were rebels; and the President sent the Army of the United States to put them down.

Last October, the people of Kansas regained, by the aid of Governor Walker, the control of their own government by the election of a Legislature, which is now recognized by all parties as valid; and therefore Kansas is not in the same condition she was when she asked for admission under the Topeka constitution—

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, I have, up to this hour, refrained from a public expression of my views on the Kansas question, in the hope that some fair and honorable compromise would be effected which would settle it in a way satisfactory to all parties. I begin to fear that my hope will prove a false one; and as I will shortly be called to record my vote for or against the admission of Kansas, under the Lecompton constitution, it is but proper that I should make known to my constituents and my country the reasons which induce me to vote as I shall when the time arrives for me to give that vote.

I confess, sir, that this question has given me more anxiety than all others to which I have had my attention called, or on which it has been my duty to vote since I took my seat as a member of this House. Indeed, I consider it a question of more moment, and fraught with more of good or evil to the country, than any other ever presented for the consideration of Congress since the formation of our Government. It certainly demands an exercise of the best judgment, and must appeal to the patriotism of every true American citizen. We may, perhaps, in a few days decide the fate of this Republic. How careful, then, ought we to be of our words, how sure that we do no act which will cause us regret in the future!

This subject has not occupied the minds and engaged the attention of those in authority alone; it has been and is yet being discussed at almost every fireside in our land. It has been, and is now, a fruitful theme for all classes of our citizens. The statesman and the politician; the minister, the merchant and the mechanic; the farmer, the laborer, and the lawyer, have all felt, and still feel, a deep solicitude for its rightful solution and peaceful settlement. They fear, and perhaps not without just cause, that, if not settled now, it may for years to come, continue and increase the jealousy and bitterness which now exist between our brethren of the North and South, and are, therefore, anxiously directing their attention and hopes to Congress for a speedy and amicable termination of the agitation and excitement which this vexed and dangerous question has produced throughout our country, so that peace and harmony may once more prevail among our people, and the Union stand, as it has in time past, a monument to perpetuate the fame of those whose wisdom planned it, as also the pride and boast of the nation.

How shall we meet the expectations of our fellow-citizens? How shall we drive from our political horizon the clouds which lower over our house, and cause the sunshine of peace and happiness to enter and keep possession of every dwelling in our once thrice happy land? We cannot do it by engendering and encouraging strife and contention between one portion and another of our people. We cannot do it by calling each other harsh names and using opprobrious epithets; by stigmatizing as base, mean, and vile all those who may hold a certain class of human beings in servitude. We cannot do it by condemning in harsh, unmeasured terms of abuse those who may honestly think that the institution of slavery is wrong. No, sir, this will not heal the wound inflicted upon our country by the indiscretion of some and the madness of others. This will only tend to widen the breach, already too wide, between our fellow-citizens of the North and the South. The circumstances in which we are placed demand calm, sensible action, and unyielding devotion to the interests and welfare of the great people whose representatives and servants we are.

Mr. Chairman, in performing the duty which I undertook to discharge, I shall not detain the House by an elaborate or lengthy argument to prove that Kansas ought to be admitted into the Union under the Lecompton constitution. Nor is it my purpose to go into a history of the settlement of Kansas, to show that a portion of the people now there went there with the intention of making it a slave State, and another portion to make it a free State. In my judgment, the citizens of this free country have a perfect right to settle on any of the unappropriated territory of the United States; and, if the decision of the highest judicial tribunal of the nation is to be taken as the law, they have a right to take their slaves with them, and, if they can, even establish slavery as one of their domestic institutions. Nor will I pretend to show that the citizens of the North or of the South have not the right to appropriate money for the purpose of sending persons into a Territory to make it either a free or a slave State, provided such persons, after they have arrived in the Territory, set about the accomplishment of their work in a peaceful and orderly manner, and in obedience to the Constitution of the United States. This part of the present controversy I shall hand over to others to discuss, if they feel inclined to do so, and shall proceed to state a few facts, as I understand them, and the conclusions I have arrived at upon those facts.

In the year 1854 an act of Congress was passed organizing the Territory of Kansas. A Governor and other officers for the Territory were appointed by the President then in power. In 1855 a Legislature was elected, and convened at Pawnee. Divers laws were passed by this Legislature, among them one calling a convention to frame a constitution preparatory to the admission of Kansas into the Union as a State. This convention met at Lecompton, framed a constitution, and submitted it to a vote of the people.

There are four questions arising out of this state of facts to which I will direct the attention of the committee for a short time.

First. Was the Legislature which passed the act calling a convention to frame a constitution a legally elected body?

Second. Was the convention which framed the Lecompton constitution a legally elected body?

Third. Was that convention bound by law, precedent, or otherwise, to submit the constitution framed by it to a vote of the people for ratification or rejection?

Fourth. If Kansas shall be admitted into the Union, will the people of that State have a right to alter, amend, or abolish the Lecompton constitution in any other manner or at any other time than that prescribed in that constitution?

In answering the first of these questions, it seems to me that I need do very little more than read one or two extracts from the inaugural address of Governor Walker to the people of Kansas. I presume these will be considered good authority by those who rely with so much confidence upon his statements.

The extracts from the inaugural are as follows:

"Under our practice, the preliminary act of framing a State constitution is uniformly performed through the instrumentality of a convention of delegates chosen by the people themselves. That convention is now about to be elected by you under the call of the Territorial Legislature, created and still recognized by the authority of Congress, and clothed by it, in the comprehensive language of the organic law, with full power to make such an enactment. The Territorial Legislature, then, in assembling this convention, were fully sustained by the act of Congress, and the authority of that convention is distinctly recognized in my instructions from the President of the United States. Those who oppose this course cannot aver the alleged irregularity of the Territorial Legislature, whose laws in town and city elections, in corporate franchises, and on all other subjects but slavery, they acknowledge by their votes and acquiescence. If that Legislature was invalid, then are we without law or order in Kansas, without town, city, or county organizations; all legal and judicial transactions are void, all titles null, and anarchy reigns throughout our borders."

Again:

"But it is said that the convention is not legally called, and that the election will not be freely and fairly conducted. The Territorial Legislature is the power ordained for this purpose by the Congress of the United States; and, in opposing it, you resist the authority of the Federal Government. That Legislature was called into being by the Congress of 1854, and is recognized in the very latest congressional legislation. It is recognized by the present Chief Magistrate of the Union, just chosen by the American people, and many of its acts are now in operation here by universal assent. As the Governor of the Territory of Kansas, I must support the laws and the Constitution; and I have no other alternative under my oath but to see that all constitutional laws are fully and fairly executed."

The position here taken by Governor Walker cannot, in my opinion, be overthrown. But, sir, both parties in Kansas, have, by their acts, admitted that Legislature to have been a legally constituted body, and the act passed by it, calling a convention, to be a binding statute. The pro-slavery party have admitted it by voting for the constitution framed at Lecompton by the convention called into being by virtue of that act; and the free-State party admitted it by voting against that constitution, on the 4th of January last. For, if the Legislature which called the convention, had no legal existence, it had no legal authority to pass any law; and it would follow, as of course, that the act passed calling a convention was without force and void, and the convention which convened in pursuance of its provisions had no legal existence, and all its acts were simply and absolutely void. Will any gentleman on the other side say that the free-State party, with Governor Stanton at their head, would act so unwisely as to have an extra session of the Legislature called for the purpose alone of passing an act submitting the Lecompton constitution to a vote of the people for ratification or rejection; if that constitution was a void instrument, as it certainly would be if the Legislature which passed the act calling the convention had no legal authority to pass such an act? It will not, I presume, be denied that the extra session of the Legislature was called at the instance of those who opposed the Lecompton constitution; and what was it called for, if the act which called the convention was an act passed by a body without legal existence or authority?

It seems to me, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that the parties in Kansas are estopped by their own acts from denying that the Legislature, which passed the act referred to, was a legally elected body, and if it was so, the laws passed by that Legislature, not conflicting with the Constitution of the United States, were valid and binding.

The second question, to an examination of which I will direct the attention of members, is, whether the Lecompton convention was a legally elected body, and if so, is the constitution framed by it a legal instrument?

It is said that the convention was not a legally constituted body, and the constitution framed by it a void instrument for two reasons. First, because a number of the counties of the Territory were not represented in the convention, and could not be represented for the reason that the qualified citizens of those counties were not registered and consequently could not vote for delegates to the convention; and secondly, because the delegates who did assemble in that convention were not legally elected.

Let us inquire whether or not these two positions are correct; and if they are correct, how the constitution framed at Lecompton would be affected by them.

By the nineteenth section of the territorial act organizing the counties therein, there were created thirty-seven counties. Three of these counties lie on the extreme western frontier, and are said to have no population to be either represented or disfranchised. These three counties are Washington, Clay, and Dickinson. It may be said that this assertion is an assumption without proof to sustain it. I would inquire, where is the evidence that there is a single citizen residing in either of these counties qualified to vote? At a time when, of all others, they would have voted, there was not a single vote given. On the 4th day of January last, when the constitution was submitted to a vote of the people, in the form in which the free-State party desired it to be submitted, not a single vote was cast in either of all of these three counties. Where were the qualified citizens at so important an election as this; an election at which, if there were any voters there, they could have voted and shown their opposition to the Lecompton constitution? The fair and legitimate inference—at least, until it is proved to be otherwise—is, that these counties were without population. This would leave thirty-four counties to be represented in the Lecompton convention. These were arranged by law into election districts for the election of delegates to the convention, as follows:

1st district, Doniphan county.
2d " Brown and Nemaha counties.
3d " Atchison county.
4th " Leavenworth county.
5th " Jefferson county.
6th " Calhoun county.
7th " Marshall county.
8th " Riley and Pottawatomie counties.
9th " Johnson county.
10th " Douglas county.
11th " Shawnee, Richardson, and Davis counties.
12th " Lykings county.
13th " Franklin county.
14th " Weller, Breckinridge, Wise, and Madison counties.
15th " Butler and Coffee counties.
16th " Lynn county.
17th " Anderson county.
18th " Bourbon, McGee, Dorn, and Allen counties.
19th " Woodson, Wilson, Godfrey, Greenwood, and Hunter counties.

There were, as the returns made to the Governor will show, nine thousand two hundred and fifty-one voters registered in twenty-one of these thirty-four counties. The names of these counties, and the number of voters registered in each, are as follows:

No. of district.	Names of counties.	No. of legal voters.
1. Doniphan.....		1,086
2. Brown.....		206
3. Nemaha.....		140
4. Atchison.....		804
5. Leavenworth.....		1,637
6. Jefferson.....		553
7. Calhoun.....		291
8. Marshall.....		206
9. Riley.....		353
10. Pottawatomie.....		205
11. Johnson.....		496
12. Douglas.....		1,318
13. Shawnee, Richardson, and Davis.....		283
14. Lykings.....		413
15. Franklin.....	no return
16. 4 counties.....	no return
17. 2 counties.....	no return
18. Lynn.....		413
19. 1 (Anderson).....	no return
20. Bourbon, McGee, Allen, and Dorn.....		645
21. 5 counties.....	no return
Total.....		9,251

Upon this registration being returned to Governor Stanton, he made an apportionment of representation in accordance with law. That apportionment is as follows:

1st district, Doniphan county.....	7 delegates.
2d " Brown and Nemaha.....	2 "
3d " Atchison.....	5 "
4th " Leavenworth.....	12 "
5th " Jefferson.....	4 "
6th " Calhoun.....	2 "
7th " Marshall.....	1 "
8th " Riley and Pottawatomie.....	4 "
9th " Johnson.....	3 "
10th " Douglas.....	3 "
11th " Shawnee, Richardson, and Davis.....	2 "
12th " Lykings.....	3 "
16th " Lynn.....	3 "
18th " Bourbon, McGee, Dorn, and Allen.....	4 "

It will be seen, by this apportionment, that twenty-one of the thirty-four counties were represented in the Lecompton convention, leaving sixteen not represented by their own delegates.

I have shown, I think, that in three of these sixteen counties there was no population to be represented. Let us see, then, how many delegates the remaining thirteen of the so-called disfranchised counties would have been entitled to if the citizens therein residing had been registered and entitled to vote for delegates.

At the election on the 4th of January last, when the Lecompton constitution was submitted for ratification or rejection to a vote of all the qualified citizens of Kansas, in the form desired by the free-State party, there were given in six of these thirteen counties one thousand two hundred and twenty-five votes, all told, and in the other seven not one vote was cast. I would ask again, where were the qualified citizens of these seven counties at this time when they could have voted, and, if opposed to the Lecompton constitution, had an opportunity to show that opposition? Were there qualified voters in these seven counties en-itled to be represented in the convention? If they were, their conduct was not only singularly strange, but it affords strong ground for a presumption that they were satisfied with what the convention had done, and approved the constitution. There is a trite adage, and one generally true, that silence gives consent. It is certainly so in elections.

Governor Walker assumed this position in his inaugural address to the people of Kansas. He says:

"The law has performed its entire appropriate function when it extends to the people the right of suffrage, but it cannot compel the performance of that duty. Throughout our whole Union, however, and wherever free government prevails, those who abstain from the exercise of the right of suffrage authorize those who do vote to act for them in that contingency, and the absentees are as much bound under the law and constitution, where there is no fraud or violence, by the act of the majority of those who do vote, as if all had participated in the election. Otherwise, as voting must be voluntary, self-government would be impracticable, and monarchy or despotism would remain as the only alternative."

I have not read this portion of the Governor's inaugural to show that the citizens of Kansas had a right to annul, by their votes on the 4th of January last, the constitution which had been adopted by a vote of the citizens on the 21st of December preceding. I only quote from this authority to establish the rule which I have laid down, because whatever the Governor says now is taken by my friends on the other side of the House as verity itself. If this rule be a correct one, does not a fair presumption arise, from the conduct of the citizens of these seven counties in not voting against the constitution on the 4th day of January, that they either approved it; or that they would not have voted for delegates if they could have done so? To my mind it is clear that, if they approved the constitution, or if they obstinately refused to vote when they had the opportunity, they would have refused to vote for delegates if they had been permitted so to do, and in either case they are in law without remedy, and the Lecompton constitution is to be taken as an expression of their will.

Let us inquire next to what number of delegates the remaining six of the disfranchised counties would have been entitled in the convention if they could have elected delegates? The convention, by legislative enactment, was to consist of sixty delegates. The number of voters registered in the counties represented in the convention was 9,251. Add to this number the whole number of votes given in these six counties on the 4th of January last, which was 1,225, and you have as the total, 10,476. This number divided by 60, (the number of delegates of which the convention was to be composed,) and it will show how many voters it required to elect a delegate. It will be seen that it required 174. If we divide 1,225 (the number of votes polled in the six counties referred to) by 174, it will show that the six counties were entitled to just seven delegates.

Now, sir, taking it as granted that all these counties would have elected free-State delegates, there would have been just that number of free-State delegates in the convention. But, sir, let us go further, and admit, for the sake of the argument, that the thirteen counties said to be disfranchised, (not taking in the account the three where nobody lived,) had been entitled to all the delegates, except those who took their seats as members of the convention, they would have been entitled to only sixteen delegates; for it will be observed that forty-four delegates from the other districts signed the constitution. What could have been done by these sixteen delegates? Could they have controlled the action of the convention? Would not the constitution have come from the convention precisely as it did? It is but fair to presume that it would.

The position assumed by some, that the delegates who did assemble in convention at Lecompton and frame a constitution, were not legally elected, is not, in my judgment, sustained by the facts, and is without support in law. I have never yet heard it asserted, here or elsewhere, that these delegates had not severally received a majority of all the legal votes polled at the delegate election. If such is the fact, I have not seen the proof. It is said, however, and perhaps truly said, that these delegates received a great many fraudulent votes. What effect would this have on their right to seats in the convention? If they received a majority of all legal votes polled, were they not legally elected? What is the inquiry before a committee appointed to ascertain the right of a member of Congress to his seat? Certainly it is not whether he has received fraudulent votes, but whether he has received a majority of all the legal votes polled. If he has, he is declared elected. I know of no difference in an election of a member of Congress and a delegate to a convention which would render the election of one void and not that of the other. If all the offices were to be vacated now in our Union, by those filling them, who have received illegal votes, there would be scarcely a corporal's guard of officials in all the land. I do not wish to be understood as approving the frauds committed in Kansas. I hate fraud at elections, and heartily despise the men who can commit them. But we must not be led to the other extreme, and pronounce all elections void because some illegal votes may be polled by bad men. This would destroy our Government itself, and leave us without law and all our rights insecure.

It is further urged as an argument against the Lecompton convention, that a large number of the qualified citizens of Kansas refused to vote at the election of delegates, because they apprehended violence on the part of the pro-slavery men, and that they would be outvoted by fraudulent votes; and that even if they did poll a majority of votes, false and fraudulent returns would have been made to defeat them. Would this plea answer in a court of justice if the question of the election of an officer was being inquired into before it? Certainly not. The mere apprehension of violence or fraud could not be alleged before a judicial tribunal so as to render void an election. It is the same here. We cannot inquire into the apprehensions of citizens of fraud or violence to invalidate an election. Governor Walker, when speaking of the act calling the convention, and entreating the citizens of Kansas to vote at the election of delegates, was right when he said:

"I see in this act calling the convention no improper or unconstitutional restrictions upon the right of suffrage. I see in it no test-oath, or other similar provisions objected to in relation to previous laws, but clearly repealed as repugnant to the provisions of this act, so far as regards the election of delegates to this convention. It is said that a fair and full vote will not be taken. Who can safely predict such a result? Nor is it just for a majority, as they allege, to throw the power into the hands of a minority from a mere apprehension (I trust entirely unfounded) that they will not be permitted to exercise the right of suffrage. If, by fraud or violence, a majority should not be permitted to vote, there is a remedy, it is hoped, in the wisdom and justice of the convention itself, acting under the obligations of an oath, and a proper responsibility to the tribunal of public opinion."

These people who refused to vote for this reason were badly instructed, and should have disobeyed their leaders, gone to the polls, offered to vote, at least; and if they had been turned away by violence, or defeated by fraudulent votes or returns, the convention would not have dared to sanction the outrage. By staying away from the polls they gave the right to those who did vote to secure a majority of the delegates to the convention, and that, too, in accordance with all the rules of law in such cases.

I have already quoted what Governor Walker said to the people of Kansas on this point, and agree with him that "those who abstain from the exercise of the right of suffrage authorize those who do vote to act for them in that contingency." If this rule was not to be observed, all free governments would soon be at an end.

But, sir, it is doubted by some eminent statesmen, as well as lawyers, whether we have any right to inquire into the right of a member of the Lecompton convention to his seat. They say that such a body is the sole judge of the qualifications of its own members; and that if fraud was committed in the election of one or more of the delegates, the convention alone could inquire into it. This is certainly the law with regard to members of Congress, and of all the legislative bodies in the Union. Whether it is the same with regard to the election of delegates to a territorial convention, I will not stop to inquire. I think I have shown that the delegates to the Lecompton convention were legally elected; and if they were, and once took their seats, it will not be denied that they had the right to frame a constitution for the people of Kansas.

The next question for discussion is, was the Lecompton convention bound by law, precedent, or otherwise, to submit the constitution there framed to a vote of the people for adoption or rejection?

I confess that I would have preferred a submission of that constitution altogether to a vote of the qualified citizens. I have every reason to believe that the President desired that submission; and we all know that Governor Walker preferred it. But, let me ask, what has my preference to do with the question? What had the desire of the President or of Governor Walker to do with it? Just nothing at all. The convention was independent of all control, let it be assumed by high or low. Governor Walker says to the people of Kansas:

"You should not console yourselves, my fellow-citizens, with the reflection that you may, by a subsequent vote, defeat the ratification of the constitution. Although most anxious to secure to you the exercise of that great constitutional right, and believing that the constitution is the servant and not the master of the people, yet I have no power to dictate the proceedings of that body."

Governor Walker was right. He had not, nor had any other human being outside of the convention, the power to dictate what its proceedings should be.

Was there any law requiring the convention to submit the constitution to a vote of the people? If there was, I have failed in my search for it.

The territorial act, under the authority of which the convention assembled, is in the words following:

"The delegates thus elected [to the convention] shall assemble in convention at the capital of said Territory on the first Monday of September next, and shall proceed to form its constitution and State government, which shall be republican in its form, for admission into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, by the name of the State of Kansas."

It will be observed that there is not one word, either in the organic law organizing the Territory, or in the territorial act calling the convention, requiring a submission of the constitution to a vote of the people, before it should become binding on them as the fundamental law of the State. By what law, then, was its submission required? By no law whatever.

Indeed, it is but fair to argue that the people of Kansas were opposed to the submission, for the reason that the act which was passed, calling the convention, was vetoed by the Governor because it did not require the convention to submit the constitution to a vote of the people, and it was afterwards passed, over the veto of the Governor, by a vote of two thirds of the members of the Legislature. If the members of the Legislature represented the views of their constituents, and it is generally supposed that legislators do so, the enactment of a law under such circumstances would be strong evidence to prove that the people were averse to a submission of the constitution, for adoption or rejection, to a vote of the citizens.

Did precedent require a submission of that constitution to a vote of the people of Kansas? Not one of the original States of this Union had submitted to a vote of the people its constitution before entering into the Union. Not one half of the remaining States which have entered the Union since, had their constitutions submitted before they were admitted. Two thirds, at least, of all our States, entered the Union without a submission of their constitutions. Are all these constitutions invalid because they were not submitted to a vote of the citizens? Who will dare assert such an absurdity? I wish not to be understood as opposing a submission of State constitutions to a vote. I am in favor of it. But I assert here that a constitution is valid and binding without it; and when the law calling a convention to frame or alter a constitution does not require such submission, the convention is not bound to submit it.

The last subject to which I shall direct the attention of the House, is the question so much controverted here and elsewhere: that is, whether or not the people of Kansas can alter, amend, change, or abolish the Lecompton constitution, at any time they may see proper so to do?

I hold the doctrine, Mr. Chairman, that if Kansas is admitted into the Union under the Lecompton constitution, the qualified citizens of that State can alter, amend, or abolish that constitution whenever they see proper. I am further of the opinion that the citizens of a State may change their constitution in any other way than that prescribed in the constitution itself; and that if they do, it will be binding upon the people of the State until it is changed again. In this opinion I am at least sustained by precedent, and I think by common sense. The people of the State of Maryland are at this hour governed by a constitution framed and adopted at a different time, and in a different mode, from that prescribed in the constitution changed.

The constitution of that State provided as follows:

"That this form of government, and the declaration of rights, and no part thereof, shall be altered, changed, or abolished, unless a bill so as to alter, change, or abolish the same, shall pass the General Assembly and be published at least three months before a new election, and shall be confirmed by the General Assembly after a new election of delegates in the first session after such new election."

It will be observed that this provides that two consecutive Legislatures shall approve the law providing for the alteration of the constitution. The Legislature at a single session passed an act authorizing the people to decide by vote whether a convention should be called to amend the constitution. The people decided that a convention should be called; the convention assembled; amended the constitution; the amended constitution was adopted by the people; and they are now living under, and observing as valid and binding, its provisions. Who dared say aught against it, or who deny them the right to live under that constitution, and to punish all who violate it? Can any people out of that State deny its validity? and if the citizens in the State are satisfied with it, who has any right to complain? I am informed that the present Legislature of Maryland, which has a majority of that party usually called "Know Nothings," have passed an act to amend their present constitution before the time fixed in the constitution itself for its change. If the people of Maryland, under this act, should change their constitution, is there any power or people outside of Maryland that can interfere and prevent its going into operation? Certainly not. I do not speak with certainty; but I am under the impression that the States of New York and Indiana changed their respective constitutions in a different manner, or at a different time, from that prescribed for so doing in the constitution changed. Will any one here say that the constitutions of these States are not valid, and can be violated with impunity? I think not. Is there anything more sacred and unchangeable in the constitution of Kansas than in those of Maryland, New York, and Indiana?

If the people of Kansas shall desire to alter, amend, or abolish the Lecompton constitution, if the State shall be admitted with that constitution, all they have to do is to get an act of the Legislature passed, calling a convention to alter or amend the same; and if the people, by a vote, either adopt or acquiesce in the constitution so altered or amended, no people in any other State of this Union can interfere. I will venture to say that there is not a member on the other side of the House who will say that if the Legislature, at its first session, shall pass an act calling a convention, and the act is approved by the Governor, and the convention should strike out all the Lecompton constitution, which recognizes slavery as one of the domestic institutions of Kansas, and if the people adopt the amended constitution, it would not be valid and binding on all people residing there. If this can be done, why not abolish the whole constitution and make an entire new one? If they do so, no power under heaven can interfere with them and their rights under that constitution as long as it remains unaltered. This may be called revolution. If it is, it is a peaceful revolution, under form of law, and destroys no man's rights.

I assume the position, also, that the people of Kansas have the right to alter, amend, or abolish their constitution at any time they may see proper, because that right is reserved to them in the bill of rights. There is a provision in the bill of rights in these words:

"2. All political power is inherent in the people, and all free governments are founded on their authority, and instituted for their benefit; and, therefore, they have at all times an inalienable and indefeasible right to alter, reform, or abolish their form of government in such manner as they may think proper."

It is said that a bill of rights in a constitution is the same as a preamble to a law. What is a preamble to a law but a statement of the necessity of a law to secure some right or redress some wrong? It simply shows that up to that time some right was left insecure, or some wrong unre-dressed, by reason of the want of a law. It does not reserve a right. It shows the necessity of taking away from some the right to injure their neighbors. But what does this section of the declaration of rights provide? That the right of the people to alter, reform, or abolish, their form of government, in such manner as they may think proper, is inalienable; is not given up; is reserved. If this right is inalienable it cannot be taken away by any other provision of the same constitution. If it is reserved in the people—not given up by them—it is a provision above all others, and must be observed before all others; because it is for the security of the rights of the people against oppression and wrong. The rights of the people cannot be taken away or curtailed except by an express provision of law; and when that provision comes in conflict with another provision in the same instrument, by which a certain right is reserved to and declared to be inalienable and indefeasible in the people, the former must give way to the latter.

And now, Mr. Chairman, I have discharged the duty I undertook, in the best manner I could. I will record my vote for the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, because I believe the laws of my country, which I am bound to support, demand it of me. The consequences to myself I have nothing to do with. I am in the hands of those who honored me with a seat on this floor. If they think I have misrepresented them, and that there is another more worthy or capable to represent them here, I believe in their right to send that person in my place. I will not complain. When I have done my duty in obedience to the dictates of my judgment, and, as I believe, in accordance with the laws of my country, I shall be contented, whatever may be my fate in the future. I would now willingly sacrifice my position, and all my political prospects in the future, whatever they may be, if, by so doing, I could secure peace and quiet among our people. I love my native land; I am proud of the past history and present greatness of my country; and I confidently look forward to the day when all nations shall acknowledge our superiority, and when, through the benign influence of our free institutions, the kingdoms of the earth shall be regenerated, and the whole human race disenfranchised. Let us cherish these institutions. Let us environ our Union with an impenetrable wall of strong arms and stout hearts. That Union! Who does not love it? The grandest edifice the world has ever beheld—erected by the wisdom of men of whom the world was not worthy—cemented by the blood of the purest patriots who ever lived in the tide of time, and bequeathed by them to us a priceless heritage—it has resisted all the rude shocks and angry waves which have heretofore threatened its destruction, and shall stand firm upon its base in all time to come, if we, and those coming after us, shall but guard it with half the vigilance exercised by those who spent their energies and lives to secure its perpetuity. I earnestly beseech my brethren of the North and of the South to act now, when our country is perhaps in its greatest peril, not as the Representatives of a divided and distracted people, but as the Representatives of the whole country. Let us abandon all sectional feeling, and rally around the standard of our common country. Let us keep our time-honored flag waving gallantly over our heads, no star obliterated, no stripe erased, until, as State after State shall be admitted into our Union, and star after star be added to that flag, all over the land, from North to South, from East to West, the cry shall be borne on every breeze, "still they come."

Mr. THAYER. It may be expected, Mr. Chairman, that at this time I should say something in defense of the Pilgrims, and of the State of Massachusetts; for they have been repeatedly assailed on this floor, within the last two weeks. But I shall make no defense. There are some things which I never attempt to defend. Among these are the Falls of Niagara, the White Mountains of New Hampshire, the Atlantic ocean, Plymouth Rock, Bunker Hill, and the history of Massachusetts. Any man may assail either or all of them with perfect impunity, so far as I am concerned. Any words of disparagement or vituperation directed against either of these objects by any assailant, excite in me feelings very different from those of indignation—whether the assailant comes with a bow as long as that of the bold Robin Hood, or with a bow of shorter range, like that of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. SHORTER.] [Laughter.] But I deprecate the disposition that impels these shafts against the sister States of this Confederacy. I deprecate this sectional animosity whenever and wherever I see it evinced. I have heard too much of the aggressions of the North and of the aggressions of the South in the past, to be very much in love with either of these ideas. I have never been accustomed to speak of the aggressions of the slave power, and I have no purpose of doing it now or hereafter. If the one hundredth part of the people of this country can make dangerous aggressions on the rights and interests of the other ninety-nine hundredth parts of the people, either by the force of strength or by the arts of diplomacy, I assure you that I will be the last man to complain of it. I think that this slavery question is altogether too small a question to disturb so great a people as inhabit the United States of America.

For myself, I was always in favor of popular sovereignty, rightly so called. I am ready, for one, to agree to-day that the Territories belonging to this Government shall be open to settlement at any time when Congress thinks fit to open them; and that the people of all parts of the country shall go into them with the assurance of absolute and complete non-intervention; with the assurance that whenever any chief Executive, official, or non-resident, shall interfere, by fraud or violence, in their affairs, he shall either be impeached or hanged; with the assurance that when the people shall have the ratio of representation required by law, and shall come to Congress with a constitution republican in form, they shall be admitted into the Union as a State. This, sir, is popular sovereignty, and it is what was practiced in this country two centuries ago.

The people of the Plymouth colony had the privilege of choosing their own Governor, and of making their own laws. The same was true of the New Haven colony, and of the colony of the Providence Plantations. They always did it. I believe the Crown of England never appointed a Governor for these colonies; certainly not for the last two. But were those people, without ever having exercised the right of self-government, better prepared to govern themselves than are our people, educated under our State governments, who go into our Territories? Why, then, should we continue to have an "Ahab to trouble Israel," while he lays the blame of his own misconduct upon the emigrant aid societies? Why not cut off these Territories from all connection with the General Government, legislative or executive? Then we shall have no more agitation in Congress, and no more contention in the Territories. But so long as this connection continues, so long as we have a President trying to bias, by his appointments, and perhaps by the United States troops, the will of the people, so long shall we have agitation, and we shall have enough of it.

Well, sir, I have nothing to find fault about. I am very well pleased with the present tendency of events. But, sir, there are those who are dissatisfied, and who are inclined to invoke a certain deity—I think a false deity—which presides over a portion of this Union; a deity which has been invoked by great men on great occasions, and by little men on little occasions, for a long time past—a deity in whose expected presence both the people and the politicians have sometimes stood aghast—"when he," in prospect only, "from his horrid hair shook pestilence and war." This sulphurous god is Disunion. This Capitol Hill has been a veritable Mount Carmel for the last quarter of a century, upon which experiments have been tried with this bogus deity. One day upon Mount Carmel was sufficient to determine the destiny of Baal and his prophets. But here, we, the most patient people in the world, witness these invocations year after year, with exemplary endurance, expecting that the great Is-to-be will some time come. And you and I, Mr. Chairman, even during the present session of Congress, have witnessed attempts to kindle here the fires upon the altar of southern rights. But the sacrifice, the altar, and the spectators, were as cold as alabaster. The prophets only were warm; but they were warm, not from the presence of the god, but from his absence. He does not make his appearance. The great Is-to-be does not come.

He has either gone on a very long journey, or else he is in a very deep sleep.

Well, sir, shall we have this deity of Disunion invoked forever? Who is to blame? If the North has given cause, what have we done? What cause of disunion has ever proceeded from us? Have you not had everything your own way? Have we not let you have the Democratic party to use as you please? [Laughter.] Have you not had the Government for a long time?—And have we not let you use it just as you had a mind to? We, sir, were busy about our commerce, extending it around the world; about our railroads; our internal improvements; our colleges, and all those things which interest our people. We knew that you had a taste for governing, and that by the indulgence you might be gratified without serious injury to us. For many years you have had your own way, but now you come here and cry out "disunion." Why; what more can we do?

Well, it may be that we have encouraged a mistake on your part. It may be that we have given you some reason to suppose that this temporary courtesy of governing, which we have extended, was a permanent right. However, if you have fallen into that error, we will, perhaps, at some future time disabuse and correct you. But whatever blame there is anywhere, whatever cause there is for disunion, must attach to the action of the slave power, commanding and controlling the Democratic party, and to no one else in the country. And, therefore, at this time, I come with exultation—not, to be sure, with malignant exultation—to speak for a few moments upon the decline and fall of slavery in this country—nay, sir, further, upon the suicide of slavery in this land. I will tell you how: by striking out from beneath the institution the two most important pillars of its support, the institution itself must fall. And these two events have been accomplished, if not by its direct agency, at least by the connivance of this same party, impelled by this same controlling agency.

I will first show you how the moral power of this institution has been destroyed, by what act, and then I will show you how and by what act its political power is forever doomed. But, sir, how did an institution like this ever have a moral power? is a question for us to examine. In the first place, we are told by southern men that we have a nation of heathen in our land; and we are told by the same authority that we have an institution here for their regeneration. Now, sir, if we have, from necessity, a nation of heathen in our land, and if slavery is an institution for their regeneration, it is very clear that slavery has a moral power. But, says the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. GARTRELL:] "They are idle, dissolute, improvident, lazy, unthrifty, who think not of to-morrow, who provide but scantily for to-day."

"Who would credit it, that in these years of benevolent and successful missionary effort, in this Christian Republic, there are over two millions of human beings in the condition of heathen, and in some respects in a worse condition? From long continued and close observation, we believe that their moral and religious condition is such that they may justly be regarded as the heathen of this Christian country."—Committee of Synod of South Carolina and Georgia, in 1833.

"After making all reasonable allowances, our colored population can be considered, at the best, but semi-heathens."—Kentucky Union's Circular to the Ministers of the Gospel in Kentucky, 1834.

"There seems to be almost an entire absence of moral principle among the mass of our colored population."—C. W. Gooch, Esq., Prize Essay on Agriculture in Virginia.

"There needs no stronger illustration of the doctrine of depravity than the state of human nature on plantations in general."—"Their advance in years is but a progression to the higher grades of iniquity."—Hon. C. C. Pinckney, Address before the South Carolina Agricultural Society, Charleston, 1829, second edition, pages 10, 12.

The Maryville (Tennessee) Intelligencer, of October 4, 1835, says of the slaves of the Southwest, that their "condition through time will be second only to that of the wretched creatures in Hell."

Here, then, is a field for great missionary labor; and it is fortunate that under these circumstances we happen to have an institution which is perfectly adapted to the regeneration of a lost and ruined race. I quote from the honorable member from the State of Virginia, in a speech delivered here, some time ago, in the House of Representatives:

"I believe that the institution of slavery is a noble one; that it is necessary for the good, the well-being of the negro race. Looking to history, I go further, and I say, in the presence of this assembly, and under all the imposing circumstances surrounding me, that I believe it is God's institution. Yes, sir, if there is anything in the action of the great Author of us all; if there is anything in the conduct of His chosen people; if there is anything in the conduct of Christ himself, who came upon this earth, and yielded up His life as a sacrifice, that all through His death might live; if there is anything in the conduct of His Apostles, who inculcated obedience on the part of slaves towards their masters as a Christian duty, then we must believe that the institution is from God."—Hon. William Smith, of Virginia, in a speech in the House of Representatives.

Again I quote from the speech of the honorable gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. GARTRELL,] in regard to this same sentiment:

"Every sentiment expressed in that eloquent extract meets my hearty approbation. As a Christian man, believing in the teachings of Holy Writ, I am here to-day before a Christian nation to reaffirm and reannounce the conclusion to which that distinguished gentleman came—that this institution, however much it may have been reviled, is of God."

Mr. Chairman, these are not the only authorities on this subject. You and I have heard from the other side, day after day, quotations from the Bible, intending to prove the same thing; and you and I know that there are honest men in the slave States who believe that this is the fact. I have seen such men myself, and have conversed with them. They have told me that slavery was an absolute curse; and that the only reason why they held their slaves a day was that they owed them certain religious duties, and must keep them to look after their spiritual welfare. They feared that if their slaves were cast loose upon the world, with nobody to look after their spiritual interests, they would be spiritually lost. I heard this from a gentleman from Kentucky, and again from a gentleman from Augusta, Georgia, and I believe in my heart that both of these gentlemen were honest in these views.

I am not here to impugn any man's motives. I put this upon the ground that is claimed by southern men; and when I listened to the gentlemen on the other side reading honestly from the sacred volume in defense of this institution, as coming from God, and as a means for the regeneration of a heathen race in our land, I felt impelled to use the language of the Apostle to the Gentiles, which he employed on Mars Hill: "Oh! Athenians, I perceive that in all things ye are exceedingly given to religion." [Laughter.] Now, sir, since this institution has done all it ever can in this capacity, and since it is now destroyed as a converting and regenerating power, I stand here to give it its proper place in ecclesiastical history, for its right place it has never yet had.

In order to understand what position it is entitled to, we must, to some extent, speak by comparison, because we cannot speak absolutely on these matters of religion. The religious journals of the free States have oftentimes most unreasonably exulted over their religious efforts, when they contrasted them with the efforts of their southern brethren. I have seen placed in parallel columns, in northern journals, the contributions of the free States and the contributions of the slave States; and there were mighty words of exultation, unbecoming a Christian journal or Christian people at any time, when it was shown that our contributions for foreign missions were a hundred-fold more than yours. It is true we make more contributions. The city of Boston gives, for foreign missions, perhaps more than all the slave States; and the city of New York, perhaps more than Boston. But what of that? We give a few cents apiece, and only a few cents, for foreign missions each year, which amounts to a great sum, because we are a great people. We send men to heathen nations far over the water, to tell them about their future destiny. We are careful not to send our best men; we keep our Notts and Waylands, and our Beechers and Cheevers, at home; but sometimes a Judson escapes from us before we know what he is. This is about the extent we submit to self-sacrifice for the sake of the heathen.

Is there any cause for exultation in this, when we see what our southern brethren have done and are doing? When have we ever taken the heathen to our hearth-stones and to our bosoms? When have we ever admitted the heathen to social communion with ourselves and our children? When have we ever taken the heathen to our large cities to show them the works of art, or to the watering places to show them fashionable society and beautiful scenery? Did you ever see a Yankee at the White Sulphur Springs shedding a benign religious influence over a little congregation of heathen companions? [Laughter.] We have pious women in the northern States, whose bright example has made attractive the paths of virtue and religion. Conspicuous among them, in every good work, are the wives of our ministers and deacons; but not one of these, within the range of my acquaintance, would consider herself qualified, either by nature or by grace, to be chambermaid, dry-nurse, and spiritual adviser, to ten or twenty heathen in her own family. But, sir, had these worthy dames been noble dames; had they come down to us from the blood of Norman kings, through the bounding pulses of sundry cavaliers, and then had been willing to assume these humble offices of Christian charity, we would have believed the time, so often prayed for, had already come, when kings should be fathers and queens nursing mothers in the church. Where, then, is the ground for this exultation on the part of the North? I tell you that it cannot be prompted by anything but a rotund, bulbous self-righteousness. So much, then, for the social sacrifices of our southern brethren. What other sacrifices have they made to regenerate this race? Great moral and intellectual sacrifices. I will read what southern men say on this subject:

Judge Tucker, of Virginia, said in 1801:

"I say nothing of the baneful effects of slavery on our moral character, because you know I have long been sensible of this point."

The Presbyterian Synod of South Carolina and Georgia said, in their report of 1834:

"Those only who have the management of these servants know what the hardening effect of it is upon their own feelings towards them."

Judge Summers, of Virginia, said in a speech in 1832, in almost the same words:

"A slave population produces the most pernicious effects upon the manners, habits, and character of those among whom it exists."

Judge Nichols, of Kentucky, in a speech in 1837, said:

"The deliberate convictions of my most matured consideration are, that the institution of slavery is a most serious injury to the habits, manners, and morals of our white population; that it leads to sloth, indolence, dissipation, and vice."

So said Jefferson:

"The man must be a prodigy who can retain his manners and morals uncontaminated" [in the midst of slavery.]

John Randolph, on the floor of Congress, said:

"Where are the tropics of this infernal traffic? The handcuff, the manacle, the blood-stained cowhide! What man is worse received in society for being a hard master? Who denies the hand of sister or daughter to such monsters?"

I might quote a hundred other southern authorities of the same kind showing the baneful effect of this institution upon the moral and intellectual character of the South. I might also quote from the United States census. I have the papers here, but time will not allow.

Now, in addition to these moral and intellectual sacrifices which our southern brethren admit, there are pecuniary sacrifices which you know to be very great; indeed, had Virginia been free fifty years ago, had she been exempt from this great tendency to Christianize the African race, she would have been worth more this day than are all the Atlantic States south of New Jersey. And should she by any chance become free, you will see her wealth and her population increase in proportion as this missionary spirit is diminished. [Laughter.] It is true, our southern brethren, impressed with this great idea of Christianizing the African race, having for their only ambition to present the souls of their negroes, without spot or blemish, before the throne of the Eternal, have sacrificed almost everything. I could quote from southern men upon this subject. The sagacious statesman who governs the Old Dominion, in a speech two years ago, said:

"But in all the four cardinal resources—wonderful to tell, disagreeable to tell, shameful to announce—but one source of all four, in time past, has been employed to produce wealth. We have had no work in manufacturing, and commerce has spread its wings and flown from us, and agriculture has only skimmed the surface of mother earth. Three out of the four cardinal virtues have been idle; our young men, over their cigars and toddy, have been talking politics, and the negroes have been left to themselves, until we have all grown poor together."

But trials, and tribulations, and poverty, have ever beset the pathway of the saints. In the earliest days, they "wandered about in sheep-skins and goat-skins, persecuted, afflicted, tormented." Even now, in the nineteenth century, the condition of our southern brethren is not much improved, since they are compelled "to chase the stump-tailed steer over sedge patches which outshine the sun, to get a tough steak," and to listen to the perpetual cry of "debts! debts!" "taxes! taxes!"

In this age of material progress, you have seen the North outstrip you; but, with true Christian patience and Christian devotion, you have adhered to the great work of regenerating the heathen. [Laughter.] Now, sir, when was there ever a class of men so devoted and so self-sacrificing? I have read the history of the Apostles; I have read the history of the Reformers, of the Scotch Covenanters, of the Huguenots, and of the Crusaders; and I tell you not in one or all of these have I seen any such heroic self-sacrifice for the good of another race, or for the good of other men, as I do see in the history of these slave States. I have seen Fox's Book of Martyrs, but there is nothing in that to compare at all with the martyrs of the South. The census of the United States is the greatest book of martyrs ever printed. [Laughter.] Other books treat of martyrs as individuals: the census of the United States treats of them by States. I can see how a man, impressed with a grand and noble sentiment, should perhaps, in excitement or in an emergency, give up his life in support of it; but I cannot see how a man can sacrifice his friends, his family, and his country, for a religious idea or an abstraction.

Here, then, sir, is the position of our southern brethren upon this subject. But the worst is yet to be told—the doleful conclusion of the whole matter. They have made sacrifices, and it seems to me that they were entitled to the rewards for them; and I doubt not that they have often consoled themselves in contemplating the rewards in the future which must await them for such good services in the present. I have no doubt, sir, that oftentimes, seeing they have not treasures laid up on earth, they supposed they had treasures laid up in heaven. [Laughter.] But just at that time when they seemed to be almost in the fruition of their labors, when the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. ANDERSON,] in great exultation of spirit, was speaking of the institution that had raised the negro from barbarism to Christianity and civilization, and when the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HUGHES] had caught the inspiration, and said, that although the body of the African might be toiling under the lash, "his soul was free and could converse on the sublimest principles of science and philosophy"—when faith had almost become sight—just then, sir, out comes the Supreme Court with the decision that A NEGRO HAS NO SOUL! [Laughter.] "Angels and ministers of grace defend us!" All these treasures that were supposed to have been laid up "where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal," have been, by the decision of the Supreme Court, scattered to the four winds of heaven. More than two centuries of prayers and tears, of heroic self-sacrifice and Christian devotion, of faith and hope, of temporal and spiritual agony, have come to this "lame and impotent conclusion." [Laughter.] The moral dignity of the grandest missionary enterprise of this age is annihilated. As a northern man, I stand here a disinterested spectator of these events. If I do not like the decision of the court, I have a higher law. The negro himself can appeal to the court of heaven; but what refuge has the southern church? [Renewed laughter.] None whatever. This decision is a blow, direct and terrible, falling with crushing violence upon our southern brethren. This Supreme Court, with cruel and relentless hostility, has persecuted the southern church as the dragon of the Apocalypse pursued the woman into the wilderness seeking to devour her offspring. [Much laughter.] What motives could have impelled the court to this act? I have no doubt a patriotic motive. I am not here to impugn the motives of any man, or of any set of men, much less of the highest judicial tribunal in this land. No doubt, sir, their motives were patriotic, for they had witnessed the devastation of this terrible religious fanaticism through the South. They had seen the ravages of this disastrous missionary monomania, and they determined that there must be an end of it; and how could they so effectually end it as by annihilating at once the object of its aims and aspirations. That, sir, they have done. Here, then, endeth the moral power of the institution of slavery.

I come now to the consideration of the event which just as surely has doomed to destruction the political power of that institution—I mean the repeal of the Missouri compromise measure in the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill. That act, sir, I will show to you—if it ever was committed by the slave power—to have been a suicidal act. What need was there for repealing that compromise, or of admitting slavery into Kansas? Was not the South sure enough of the Territory as it was before? I think—and this is my honest conviction—that had it not been for that act Kansas would have been inevitably a slave State. We of the North had no particular interest in that Territory. It was put down in our geographies as the great American desert. We had not considered it of much importance; but we relied on the law to keep slavery out of it, and to preserve it to freedom. We of the North have had too high an idea of the power of the General Government and of law, either for freedom or against freedom. Sir, this General Government has but little power over this question. It is not a motive power. It is only a registry, an exponent of power. It is the log-book of the ship of State, and not the steam-engine that propels the ship, or the wind that fills the canvas. We would like to have the log-book kept right, to show us our true position; but we do not now consider the Government as the motive power. The motive power of this nation, as of all nations, is the people in their homes, and as the people in their homes are, so is your progress. If the people in their homes in Kansas had been pro-slavery, what could the North have opposed to it? It was emigration, and emigration only, that could have made Kansas a State, either slave or free. The great law that governs emigration is this: that emigration follows the parallels of latitude. Under that law Kansas would have been settled entirely by a pro-slavery people, as was the southern part of Indiana, and as was the southern part of Illinois. We in the North, trusting in the protection of the law, would have had no remedy. People in favor of slavery would have gone there, and if they were compelled at first to adopt a free constitution in order to shape their institutions according to any law concerning the Territory, they might have soon reversed that position. In fact, the decision of the Supreme Court has now made any such thing unnecessary. They might have formed just such a constitution as they pleased. Well, then, we would thus, in all probability, have had Kansas a slave State without the Kansas-Nebraska bill. But the passage of that bill, if slavery had been certain before, seemed to the majority of the people in the North to make it almost inevitable. History warranted this fear. Judging from the case of Indiana, there seemed to be no chance whatever for freedom in Kansas, after the opportunity for slavery to enter there had been given. There was Missouri on the confines of the Territory—and the most densely peopled portion of Missouri, too. Freedom-loving men desiring to go to that Territory, would have had to travel hundreds and thousands of miles. The men who lived on the line of Kansas, as well as other southern men who entertained the same idea—though they did not express it then for fear of losing the bill—anticipated that the passage of the bill settled the question of slavery in Kansas forever. That was the evidence of the early history of Indiana. When that Territory was opened for settlement, a few slaveholders, perhaps a dozen or a score, went over from Kentucky, and, contrary to the wishes both of the President and Congress, contrary to the ordinance of 1787, established slavery; and they obtained such control over that young Territory that petitions, signed by many of the inhabitants, praying Congress to suspend the prohibition of slavery, were presented to Congress, and year after year from 1803 to 1807. These few slaveholders of the Territory of Indiana acquired such control over the inhabitants of that Territory because they were an organization, as slavery is everywhere and at all times an organization. It was a concentration of capital, a concentration of influence, and a concentration of power, which our emigrants from the free States, coming one by one, were unable to resist; and had it not been for the overwhelming population which poured in from the North in 1807 and 1808, the prohibition of slavery would have been suspended. Had it not been for John Randolph it would have been suspended in 1803; and had it not been for Mr. Franklin in the Senate, it might have been suspended in 1807; and both of these were southern men.

Well, sir, I have said that slaveholders are everywhere an organization. There is a community of interest, a bond of feeling and of sympathy, which combines and concentrates all efforts to defend slavery where it is, and to extend it to places where it is not. Then, what fault can be found with our efforts to organize freedom by means of our emigrant aid societies, that enable our citizens to go to the Territory in companies of twenty, fifty, one hundred, or two hundred, to take possession of the West, and to locate there the institutions under which they choose to live?

And here I come to the defense of this association. It has been assailed, time and again, on this floor, and I have never been allowed even the privilege of putting questions to its assailants. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ANDERSON] called it "illegal and unconstitutional." It has been so assailed by the successor of Millard Fillmore. But where is the proof? Which of its acts has been shown to be illegal or unconstitutional? If it was illegal and unconstitutional, why has not the organization been crushed by the courts? We contend that any organization which is allowed to continue its existence from year to year, and to carry on its business, has the presumption, at least, of a legal right to do so. We claim that for the Emigrant Aid Company.

But the gentleman from Missouri professes to have authority in regard to this matter. He has said that we may employ this emigrant aid society in promoting emigration to Central America and to foreign countries, but that we must "be ware" how we do so in colonizing the Territories of this Government. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Missouri has any authority in these premises, I hope he will exercise it. I ask him to publish a hand-book for emigrants, telling us how we may go into a Territory; whether we may ride or must go on foot; whether we may take our wives and children with us, or must leave them at home; whether we may take some of our neighbors with us, with their agricultural implements and steam-engines, or whether we must go into the Territories without any neighbors whatever; whether we may get horses and oxen from the free States, or whether we must content ourselves to take mules from the State of Missouri. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, let us have not only the book, but the reasons for it. Let us know how far we may go according to the law in this matter of emigration. I recommend the gentleman from Missouri to take some lessons from the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUITMAN] in this matter. I think he can get broader views upon this subject if he will consult that gentleman, and I think he will allow northern men to go to the places which they have a right to go to by the law of this land in such society, if it be law-abiding, as they may choose to select for themselves.

I have said that the great general law of emigration is, that the emigrants shall follow the parallels of latitude in this country. There are some exceptions to this. The gold in California led our emigrants from the extreme North across many parallels of latitude. That was a sufficient disturbing cause. The existence of slavery in the slave States of this country, has driven thirty-five out of every hundred emigrants across northern parallels to the free States of the Union. That was another great and powerful cause. But there is another cause sufficient to carry emigration southward over parallels of latitude. That is, the argument of cheap lands, with the additional advantage of organized emigration. The objections that have heretofore existed among northern men to settling in southern States are, by this mode of emigrating, entirely obviated. The northern man, with his family of children, would not heretofore go into a southern State, in the absence of schools and churches. But when, combined with one or two hundred, or one or two thousand, of his friends and neighbors, he goes into a slave State, he carries with him schools and churches, and the mechanic arts, all these difficulties are obviated; and besides, he has the inducement of going where the land can be bought at slave-State prices, in the expectation of finding it come up probably in a few years to free-State prices, which are five or six times greater than slave-State prices. Here is the great inducement of increasing wealth. Let a colony start from Massachusetts, and settle on almost any land in the State of Virginia—in Greenville, Southampton, Dinwiddie, or Accomac, where the lands do not average so high as three dollars an acre, by the census of 1850—and the very day they settle there the value of the land is more than doubled. There is better land for sale to-day in Tennessee and North Carolina, for fifty cents per acre, than can be bought for ten times that sum in any free State.

How can such an appeal to the migrating population of the North in favor of organized emigration to the slave States be resisted? I know of no means of resisting it. They do not come as your enemies; they come as your friends. They do not come to violate your laws, but to improve their own condition. This movement southward is destined to continue and to increase. Sir, if slavery were as sacred as the Ark of the Covenant, and if it were defended by angels, I doubt whether it could withstand the progress of this age and the money-making tendencies of the Yankee. But it is not as sacred as the Ark of the Covenant, and nobody believes that it is defended by angels.

But, sir, there begins to be an enlightened idea in these border slave States upon this subject. A year ago, when I proposed to plant a few colonies in Virginia, several journals in the Old Dominion threatened me with hemp and grape-vine if I should ever set foot in that Territory. Well, I thought I would make the experiment. I went into western Virginia and into eastern Kentucky. I addressed numerous audiences in both of those States, and everywhere where I asked the people if they had any objection to their land being worth four or five times what it was, they said "No." [Laughter.] I asked them if they had any objection to the manufacture of plows and wagons in Wayne county. There never had been a manufacturing establishment between the Big Sandy and the Guyandot. Everything was imported. There was not a newspaper published between the two rivers. I asked if they had any objection to a good, substantial, business newspaper published there, and to have schools and churches and the mechanic arts established in that county. With one voice they replied—"none, whatever."

"We welcome you to our country, and to all its advantages." At every meeting we were welcomed by the unanimous voice of the people; and now I believe that there are at least twelve newspapers in the State of Virginia advocating these colonies coming into the State. The sagacious statesman who is the Governor of the Old Dominion, gives us a most cordial welcome. Well, the prospect is very good and inviting; and if there is any danger of a dissolution of the Union—in fact, if there is any weak spot in the Union, I think it would be a good thing to patch it over with an additional layer of population. [Applause.] There never would be any disunion, if we could only attend to it, and see where the weak places are, and mend them in time.

But there is another exception to the rule I have laid down. Central America will prove abundantly sufficient to carry emigration southward, even across many parallels of latitude. We have already commenced to move, and what to some men seemed to be the umbilical cord of an embryo southern empire, is likely, by these means, to be cut off, if it is not cut off already. [Laughter.] Everybody knows the physiological consequences.

Well, sir, I wish now to say that there is a higher power than man's in relation to this matter of freedom in Kansas. It seemed at first to the whole North that the project of establishing slavery there would exclude freedom, and the whole North was intimidated by it. There was the greatest reluctance manifested to emigration in that direction, from the North. Everywhere there was fear; everywhere despair.

"There was silence deep as death,
While we floated on our path;
And the boldest held his breath
For a time."

Six months of persistent effort in writing and speaking were required, to induce the first colony of only thirty men to go to Kansas. The people had become impressed with the idea that Kansas was destined to be a slave State; but as soon as the first colony had reached that Territory, and had founded the famous city of Lawrence, the whole train of northern emigration was turned from Nebraska and from Minnesota to Kansas. And they have filled Kansas with free-State men—such men as are fitted for the high position they occupy; for Kansas is the geographical center of our possessions. Its position in itself makes it the arbiter of our fate in all coming time, destined to give law to all between the Missouri river and the golden gates of the Pacific, and to make its power felt all the way between the British possessions and the Gulf of Mexico. Never were more noble men needed for a more noble work. It was necessary that Plymouth Rock should repeat itself in Kansas. The Puritan character was needed there; but how could it be had, except by such discipline as made the Puritans; for if it was necessary that they should be raised like the Pilgrim fathers of New England, it was also necessary that they should have the training of the Pilgrim fathers. They were peculiar in their early history, and peculiar in their late history. They had their early education among the rocks and mountains of New England. I have known of great men in times past, who came from the forest, who came from hills and mountains; but I never have known them to be raised on Wilton carpets. These men received their early training among the rugged hills of New England, where they waged incessant war on ice and granite, on snow and gravel-stones. It is there where they acquire their energy and their power. And, sir, I think the Yankee race has at least an octave more compass than any other nation on earth. I know a Yankee doughface is half an octave meaner than any other man. [Laughter.]

Sir, some of the best of this Yankee race went to Kansas. They were stigmatized six months before they arrived there as thieves and paupers. Well, if such men as those who have built Lawrence, and Topeka, and Manhattan, and Osawatimie, and Quindaro, were thieves and paupers, what do you think those of us respectable, well-to-do people will accomplish in the Old Dominion, where we are now becoming acquainted with some of the "first families?" These men have been reviled by their inferiors at both ends of Pennsylvania avenue many times during the last three years. The other day, in the other end of this Capitol, such men were denominated slaves. Sir, we are slaves! I admit it; but our only master is the Great Jehovah. These heroes in Kansas having for their ancestors the Pilgrim fathers, "sons of sires who baffled crowned and mitred tyranny," disciplined in their early years by the rugged teachings of adversity, seem to have been well prepared for their high mission.

But the discipline of worthy examples, of New England education, and of poverty and adversity, were not enough. The discipline of tyranny was requisite for their perfection. This discipline has been of use in all ages of the world. David was not fit to rule over Israel until he had been hunted like a "partridge in the mountains" by the envious and malignant Saul. Brutus was not fitted to expel the Tarquins until after he had endured their tyranny for years. What would Moses have done but for Pharaoh? Where would have been the reformers of the sixteenth century, where the puritans in the seventeenth, and the patriots in the eighteenth, but for Leo the Tenth, Charles the First, and George the Third? But Charles the First lost his head, and George the Third his colonies, for less tyranny than has been practiced upon the people of Kansas by the two successors of Millard Fillmore. If we thank God for patriots, we should also thank him for tyrants, for what great achievements have patriots ever made without the stimulus of tyranny? Without vice, virtue itself must be insipid; and without wicked and mean men, there could be no heroes.

The brave man rejoices in the opposition of the enemy of his rights. Wicked and mean men are the stepping-stones on which the good and great ascend to Heaven and immortal fame.

These miscreants, cursed both by God and man, subvert important interests. The sacred volume which unfolds to us the life and sufferings of the Savior of men, makes record also of Pontius Pilate and of Judas Iscariot as necessary agencies in that great redemption.

So I will denounce no man who has fought against freedom in Kansas, as entirely useless in the grand result. But what a team to draw the chariot of freedom! Atchison and Stringfellow and John Calhoun, with the two successors of Millard Fillmore to lift at the wheels.

Mr. MOORE obtained the floor, but yielded to Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I announce, for the information of both sides of the House, that, on Thursday next at one o'clock, I shall move to take up the bill for the admission of Kansas.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. Is this the agreement of all parties?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. All that could be consulted.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. Has it been agreed to by both sides?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The gentleman from Ohio can answer that.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I believe the arrangement is as generally understood and agreed to as any arrangement could be under the circumstances. It is, that this debate shall be continued in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; that there shall be night sessions, if necessary, for that purpose; and that, on Thursday next, at one o'clock, the Senate bill for the admission of Kansas into the Union, shall be taken from the Speaker's table and voted on under the rules.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. And without any dilatory motions.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Who does the gentleman from Ohio speak for?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am not authorized to speak for my side of the House, but it is generally understood by those with whom I have consulted that this arrangement is mutually acceptable.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Our understanding of the matter was this: on Monday the bill was to be taken up and it was to be subject to discussion and amendment until Thursday at one o'clock, when the vote was to be taken.

Mr. GROW. I suppose that this statement must be made by unanimous consent, to be of any force. I have no objection to gentlemen indicating that at such a time they will ask for a vote on this question—that is as far as gentlemen can go. I object to any time being fixed when we are to come to a vote, and the mode fixed in which the vote is to be taken.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The question must be taken on Monday, and if then there is not a two-thirds vote in favor of the proposition to take up the bill, then it will fall.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. What the gentleman from Pennsylvania says, is right. What I want is, that no motion shall be made until the time I have stated—next Thursday at one o'clock.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It is understood, and gentlemen will admit the fact, that this arrangement is not obligatory upon either side, unless on Monday next a resolution shall pass the House to that effect by a two-thirds vote. So that gentlemen need not be alarmed, as no advantage will be taken of either side.

Mr. CURTIS. We are not alarmed, and we do not intend to be. There has been no general consultation on this side of the House, and we are not ready to decide on a matter of such importance until there has been a consultation. I have no objection myself to taking this matter up on Thursday.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. All I have done is to give notice that the bill will be taken up on Thursday next, in order that gentlemen who may wish to go home between now and then may know that no motion will be made on the subject before that day. That is all.

Mr. CAMPBELL. All I desire to say is, that on conference with as many gentlemen as I could see, this arrangement was agreed to.

Mr. QUITMAN. I, for one, may desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The arrangement does not preclude amendments.

Mr. FLORENCE. I confess, sir, that I do not quite understand this arrangement. The gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Ohio seem to think that it will require a two-thirds vote on next Monday to fix next Thursday as the time at which this vote is to be taken. The gentleman from Georgia says that gentlemen may go home if they choose, and be here next Thursday. There are, therefore, two statements, and I do not quite understand which one is right. I have not been consulted, and I did not care to be. I only desire to be here when the vote is to be taken. I want to know, therefore, what these high contracting parties have agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I understand that on Monday next this bill is to be taken up in the House, and that the discussion is to go on until Thursday, when a final vote is to be taken. My friend from Pennsylvania so understands; and this point I wish made certain.

Mr. FLORENCE. Yes, sir; there is a difference of statement between the gentleman from Georgia and the gentleman from Ohio. Let us know exactly what the arrangement is?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. FLORENCE. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. It is nothing but this: that on Thursday next, at one o'clock, I shall move to take the Kansas bill from the Speaker's table.

Mr. FLORENCE. And nothing is to be done before that?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. And nothing before that. No motion is to be made in reference to it but that it will be taken up then by general consent.

Mr. GROW. There is no consent about anything.

Mr. FLORENCE. My colleague will consent to nothing where his objection will prevent it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. If I understand it, discussion is to go on in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union until Thursday. Then the gentleman will move to take up this bill.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. If the House chooses to go into committee, that is their privilege. I only announce that, on next Thursday, at one o'clock, and not before—and the other side will not make a motion before—I shall move to take up the Kansas bill from the Speaker's table. It is my desire that the House should go into committee and discuss this question every day between now and then.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. There is no objection to that, so far as I am concerned, and those with whom I act.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Is that bill to be taken up for the purpose of discussion, or is it at that time to be attempted to put it on its passage?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. It is to be under the operation of the rules of the House. My intention is to call for the previous question. Then it is under the control of the majority whether the call shall be seconded or not. If a majority be so disposed, they can vote down the call for the previous question.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. What I wanted to understand was whether the previous question would then be called.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The process is very simple, and ought to be readily understood by members. This discussion will probably go on in Committee of the Whole until Thursday next. At one o'clock on that day, the gentleman from Georgia, under the rules, will propose to take the Senate bill from the Speaker's table. He may move to commit it to the committee of which he is chairman, and demand the previous question. If that be voted down, the bill will be open for amendment, and for discussion at the pleasure of the House. We all understand that the opponents of the bill, or those who wish to amend it, can vote down the gentleman's proposition, should he make such a one. The bill will then be open for amendment, and the previous question can be called after amendments have been introduced. The thing is very plain. There is no attempt, I think, on the part of the gentleman from Georgia, and there is certainly none on my part, or on the part of those I represent, to take advantage either of those with whom I act or of those whom I expect to oppose throughout this whole fight.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I desire to say one word.

Mr. MORGAN. I call for the regular order of business. We have had enough of this.

The CHAIRMAN. This debate has only been permitted by courtesy, and cannot continue, as objection is made. The gentleman from Alabama is entitled to the floor, and will proceed.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, the message of the President, the reports of the committees of the two Houses, and the many able speeches which have been already made in favor of the admission of Kansas, have fully exhausted the subject, and swept away all the flimsy pretexts and excuses of those who oppose that measure.

Some have the candor to admit, what all know to be true, that if her constitution did not tolerate domestic slavery, no serious opposition would have been made to her admission. Those who advocated the adoption of the Topeka constitution, as the Black Republicans all did, cannot, without the grossest hypocrisy, pretend to have serious scruples on account of any irregularities in this of Lecompton. I should not, at this late period, have engaged in the discussion of this question, important as I regard its decision, but for the allusions which have been repeatedly made to Alabama, and more especially in the speech of the honorable gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] the other day, who, not satisfied with indulging in the tirade against the institution of slavery, which has been heard from day to day from that side of the Chamber, saw fit to single out Alabama, and, with a view to disparage her people, instituted a comparison between that State and his own.

First, he says, Alabama has not increased as rapidly as Illinois in population. Is not that easily explained? The census returns show that Illinois had, in 1850, of her then population, 111,860 foreigners, while Alabama had but 7,498. The former being in close proximity to the old and densely populated States of the North, would also account in part for this.

Next, as to the number of children at school: he says, in Alabama there are 62,846 pupils and students at school; while in Illinois there were, at the same time, 182,292. Out of about 190,000 white persons between five and twenty years of age, Alabama had, in fact, 100,000 at school; while in Illinois there were 350,000 white persons between five and twenty, and of these only 140,000 at school. But the gentleman, very adroitly, dropped the comparison between Alabama and Illinois when he came to speak of the number of persons over twenty-one years who could not read or write, and then contrasts Alabama with Massachusetts. I prefer to continue the comparison which he commenced with Illinois. In 1850, there were in Alabama 33,757 persons over twenty-one who could not read or write, while in Illinois there were 40,000. In Illinois there were 978,855 acres of public land appropriated for educational purposes, while in Alabama there were 902,775; and the lands of Illinois, it is well known, were far richer. Alabama had, in 1850, 1,375 churches, while Illinois had but 1,223.

The gentleman from Illinois sneeringly comments upon these results of the census as to the education of the masses in Alabama, and asserts that there are multitudes in all the slaveholding States who "cannot even read their ballots, nor sign their names to a poll-book." Does he not know that a large portion of the population of many of the States, at the period of our Revolution, were unlettered men? And yet what nobler examples of heroism and intelligent appreciation of popular rights has history anywhere afforded us? Was Rome much indebted to the literary cultivation of her masses for the sturdy virtues and practical wisdom which secured to her, for so many ages, the conquest and government of the world? Many, even, of the feudal barons who wrested the great charter from King John, made their marks, being unable to append their signatures.

The gentleman ventures these sneers against the hardy yeomanry of the South, with whom it is at other times the favorite policy of his party to claim an affiliation against what they call the slaveholding aristocracy of the South. The scorn with which the masses of the South have ever rejected these insidious appeals is a sufficient proof of the intelligent and unselfish patriotism of those free and independent citizens. If they were denied the advantages of early education, by living in a new and sparsely-settled country, as many were, or by other causes, this comparative want of education and of book-learning is not to be regretted by them, if, with it, they had fallen into the follies of free-love associations, of spiritualism, and the thousand infidelities which prevail in New England. Remote from crowded cities, engaged in agricultural pursuits, compelled, in their solitude, to study the great book of nature, gathering information at church, in the jury-box, at the political hustings, and in the practical business of life, their store of knowledge is not always scant; but this above all, they have not been contaminated even by the suspicion of corruption, and always make the best, the bravest soldiers in the world.

The gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. THAYER] taunts us with the want of that commerce and manufacturing industry which we have so long assisted the North in establishing. It is another illustration of our freedom in the past from sectional jealousies, as it is also of our fond illusion that we had yet a part in David, and an inheritance in the son of Jesse.

And why, let me ask, should there be perpetual strife between us? Why should this relentless war be waged against the South? Does not the chief product of our slave labor keep in motion the spindles of Massachusetts, and create there an increased demand for your labor? We offer you a market for your manufactured goods, employment for your ships, and encouragement to your ship-builders. Every additional plow which is driven into the soil of Alabama, and each cargo that is landed at Mobile, give an increased impetus to your various manufactures.

The time was, Mr. Chairman, and at no remote period in our history, when the Representatives of the people, from the various sections of this Union, were wont to meet together to consult, to deliberate for the welfare of a common country. Party feeling might, at times, run high; differences might arise as to questions of domestic or foreign policy, or as to the true construction of the Constitution; but in these things all were agreed—namely, in recognizing the binding obligations of the Constitution in all its parts, in attachment for the Union, and in reverence for the decisions of our judicial tribunals. What a change has taken place in a few years! Ranged on opposite sides and pitted like gladiators, the Representatives of one section are arrayed against those of the other. But little has been heard during the four months of the session save violent philippics, day after day, against the South, her people, and her institutions, and occasionally re-creation and retaliation on the other side. The stormy sessions of the National Assembly of France scarcely indicated more hostile feeling between the different parties than has been manifested here.

If what we see here is a reflex of the state of feeling among the masses of the North, then it requires no prophet to tell that this Union cannot much longer endure. The crusade so long preached against the South has, it seems, maddened and estranged the North, and has at last aroused the South to the dangers that menace her.

What a change here, too, in a few short years! A little while ago, and the young adventurer from the North would often seek his home in the South, and, when deserving, never failed to meet with friends, with promotion, and advancement. The distinguished gentleman who sits before me, [Mr. QUITMAN]—the Chevalier Bayard—"without fear and without reproach," and whose military and civil services have won for him a national fame, stands a shining example of this; so do the honorable gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. CRAIG], and the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD], and many in distinguished positions all over the South.

Then the southern man and the northern man could kneel at the same altars and meet around the same communion table; but now the slaveholder is accursed in the estimation of these Pharisees who "have stolen the livery of the court of Heaven to serve the Devil in," and his presence would pollute their altars. Then kindly intercourse existed, and the mutual interchange of friendly, if not fraternal feeling. In those days, we of the South felt that the Hancocks, the Otises, and the Warrens of the North, belonged alike to us; and that their glory was also a part of our inheritance. Our youths then went to your renowned institutions of learning, without feeling, as they now would have too much cause to do, in some of them, at least, that they were the veriest hot-beds of treason and fanaticism. Then the southern man felt, as he stepped his foot upon the free soil of the North, that he was still within his own land and among his brethren. He wandered over her battle-fields, read the monuments of her heroes, and exulted in their glorious achievements.

Our pulpits, our work-shops, our factories, our legal and medical professions, our school-houses, all were open to, and many were filled by men from the North. They often married and dwelt among us, thus adding new links to the chain that bound the Union together. Some, after being treated with kindness and hospitality, encouragement and patronage, in their youth, have returned to the North to stir up strife and ill-will between the sections. Prominent among these is a distinguished Senator of New York, who in early life was thus kindly treated and patronized while pursuing the honorable profession of a teacher in a rural district in Georgia. But all kindly recollections of his early days, if any he ever had, have long since been effaced from his memory; and his life has been spent in fomenting sectional strife and ill-will, and in seeking to overturn the institution of slavery, which, he knows, if successful, would result in ruin to the black as well as the white race, and in a disruption of the ties that bind together the States of this Union.

I chanced to hear him recently exulting that there was a North side and a South side in that Chamber and in this—a northern party and southern party. Sir, no love of country prompted that exultation; for he knew too well that, wherever tried, emancipation had proved to be a failure; either bringing speedy destruction and ruin upon the land where they had been thus emancipated, resulting in the massacre of both races, regardless of age or sex, or, by their slower but not less sure, decay and ruin in the lapse of time. His motive was not prompted by patriotism, but by reckless ambition. I never see him, with his bland smile and Oily Gammon manner, that I am not reminded of Milton's description of one of the fallen angels:

"Belial, in act more graceful and humane;"

 For dignity composed and high exploit:
 But all was false and hollow; though his tongue
 Dropt manna, and could make the worse appear
 The better reason, to perplex and dash
 Mature counsels; for his thoughts were low;
 To vice industrious, but to nobler deeds
 Timorous and slothful."

A few persons, like the ill-used individual mentioned by the gentleman from Illinois the other day, who was banished from the city of Mobile, abuse the kindness which has been extended to them. How well it becomes that gentleman to express such heartfelt sympathy for the slaves of the South, when his State will not even allow a free negro to tread upon her soil! If one should do so, he may be seized and sold into servitude. He sympathizes deeply with the hard lot of our own sleek, well-fed, contented, and happy slaves! But the free black can say of that gentleman and his State: "I was an hungred, and ye gave me no meat; I was thirsty, and ye gave me no drink; I was a stranger, and ye took me not in; naked, and ye clothed me not; sick and in prison, and ye visited me not."

What has brought about this great change to which I have before alluded? Upon whom rests the heavy responsibility? Is it upon those who wage this unjust, unholy, sectional war against their own countrymen? Or is it upon those who have stood up and defended their section when assailed, opposing argument to argument, meeting taunts and insults with scorn, and threats with defiance?

The Abolition party was for years few in numbers and altogether contemptible. But wicked and ambitious men united with it, and drew together in one solid mass the odds and ends of all the old parties—proclaiming for their watchword hostility to the South and her institutions. They seek to array one section against the other, hoping, when that is accomplished, from being superior in numbers, to get the control of the Government and hold the South in complete subjection. To effect their unholy purposes, the South is abused and misrepresented. Their orators, their presses, and even their pulpits, are employed in fomenting strife and ill-will by continual denunciation, ridicule, taunts and threats, towards the South; a fair sample of which we have just heard from the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. THAYER.]

These bad men, to gain their ends, have shown that they do not hesitate to trample under foot the Constitution, and nullify the solemn enactments of Congress made to carry out its express provisions, and wholly indifferent to the consequences which may flow from their rashness. The President of the United States, for daring to oppose their unholy designs, notwithstanding his venerable years, his eminent position, his unsullied public and private character, is traduced and vilified, his motives aspersed, his patriotism questioned, and he openly and falsely charged with resorting to corruption and bribery, to influence the legislation of Congress. The Supreme Court, too, of the United States—the highest judicial tribunal known in our country—composed of men distinguished for their learning, their exalted wisdom and virtue, whose luminous decisions have added to the national reputation; whom the people reverence and respect for their firmness, their impartiality, and the unsullied purity of their lives, because they will not perjure themselves and mold their decisions to suit this fanatical party, is to be annihilated, or reformed, as they say; while the individual members, including the venerable Chief Justice, are denounced as vile, corrupt, and debased.

For years we of the South have patiently borne these wrongs and injuries. We have warned the people of the North of the inevitable consequences which must follow these attacks; but, with reckless indifference, they still pursue their course of madness, folly, and wickedness. They pretend to think that we of the South will tamely submit; but say, if we should resist, that they will whip us into submission. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] intimated the other day that hemp would be used to crush out this spirit of resistance, if any should be manifested. Great Britain threatened this against the thirteen Colonies, all of them, be it remembered, at that time holding slaves; and the gallant Hayne, of South Carolina, was actually hung; but was the proud spirit of the Colonies thereby subdued?

Talk about subduing a sovereign State of this Confederacy! of whipping her into submission! What folly! What kind of a Republic would that be, I should like to know, where one portion of it had to hold the other in subjection by force? A Republic it might be in name, but in fact it would be a pure, unmitigated despotism.

Mr. GILMAN begged to interrupt Mr. MOORE, by asking how it happened that all the threats of separation have proceeded from the South?

Mr. MOORE. Sir, I deny the correctness of this assertion, and point to the fact of the Hartford convention, assembled during a war waged for the protection of New England citizens, and in the face of an enemy threatening our coasts. It has never been under such circumstances that the South has chosen to vindicate her violated rights. When the defense of your country, the honor and glory of your empire, were involved, you have nowhere found more obedient and more emulously patriotic citizens. Do you ask me for instances of northern insubordination? Look to the nullification of the laws of Congress by Massachusetts and her surrounding States. When South Carolina threatened to resort to this remedy, she was to be dragooned into submission; when the boasted land of the Pilgrims exerts it, it is perfectly consistent with law, order, and constitutional obligations.

It is openly proclaimed that they intend, under no circumstances, to vote for another slave State. They would crib and confine us to our present limits, saying to us, "thus far shalt thou go, and no further;" knowing that ruin must thereby, if not speedily, yet sooner or later, overtake our fair land. Growing more insolent of late, they boldly proclaim that they intend to rule and govern the South, and thus allow her people none save a mere nominal participation in the administration and control of public affairs. Some, more daring than the rest, openly declare that their purpose is to crush out the South; destroy the institution of slavery, and make her a dependent province—make her sons "hewers of wood and drawers of water" for northern task-masters. And this is to be the doom, if their designs are consummated, not only of the slave owners, but of all the freemen of the South.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, MARCH 26, 1858.

NEW SERIES....No. 85.

James Watson Webb, who conducts one of the leading Republican presses at the North, hitherto claiming to be moderate and conservative, in his paper of February 20, says:

"If any State should attempt to secede, she will be whipped into subjection. Should they continue refractory, the United States would be compelled ultimately to hold such refractory States as colonies—just as Spain and other European Powers hold their slave colonies—until such time as it might be safe to rely upon their obedience."

And, again, listen to his fierce bombast. It is rich. He says:

"If a southern State should attempt to resist, she will be made to submit, and bear herself with deference and respect thereafter to those who are morally and socially her equals, and politically and physically her superiors, and when provoked to demonstrate it, if needs be, her masters."

Such is the language now employed by the Black Republican presses throughout the North—seemingly to verify the old adage, "whom the gods wish to destroy, they first make mad."

Contrast this insolent bravado with the wisdom of Edmund Burke:

"Your instructions and your suspending clauses are the things that hold together the great texture of this mysterious whole. These things do not make your Government. Dead instruments, passive tools as they are, it is the spirit of the English Constitution which, infused through the mighty mass, pervades, feeds, unites, invigorates, vivifies every part of the empire, even down to the minutest member. It is the love of the people; it is their attachment to their government—from the sense of the deep stake they have in such a glorious institution—which gives you your Army and your Navy, and infuses into both that liberal obedience without which your Army would be a base rabble, and your Navy nothing but rotten timber."

That gentleman [Mr. FARNSWORTH] spoke sneeringly of the republic of Alabama. Let me tell him that Alabama has not yet decided upon her course. She has indulged in no threats; but by the unanimous voice of her Legislature has determined, in case Kansas is rejected, to hold a convention to determine what her honor, her safety, and independence may seem to require. She came into the Union as an equal, and her equality she will never surrender.

Mr. PALMER wished to know by what process it was proposed that Alabama should be withdrawn from the Union.

Mr. MOORE. She has decided, sir, in a contingency which involves the loss of her equality and honor, to assemble a convention to decide upon her course. It is not for me to anticipate that decision; but, if she deem it necessary to dissolve a compact, of which it is openly declared that she shall no longer participate in the advantages, I have no fear that she will not have the intelligence and unanimity to devise the means of her long deferred, reluctant, but compelled withdrawal.

But she still cherishes the hope that her constitutional rights may be respected; that Kansas may be admitted, and peace and quiet restored to the country. I know the sentiments of her people, and especially of those who have honored me with a seat on this floor. They are a law-abiding though proud-spirited people, content with the Constitution and Union which were made and handed down to them by their fathers—attachment to that Union having been a cherished principle of political faith throughout the South. What but this caused her people to submit for so many years to a high protective tariff, by which her industry was taxed to enrich the North? What but this caused her to submit to be robbed of her slaves annually to the value of thousands of dollars? What but this induced her to acquiesce in those measures by which the North obtained all of those vast territories which we acquired from Mexico by, to say the least, an equal expenditure of blood and treasure on her part.

I tell these Black Republican leaders, I tell the North, that they may, when it is too late, exclaim, as a celebrated English historian did in reviewing the causes that led to the loss of America to Great Britain: "What demon of folly got possession of our councils? What malignant star shed its influence on our arms? Where were our statesmen?" All we ask is to be let alone; to be permitted to manage our own affairs; to be protected in the enjoyment of equal rights and equal privileges with the people of the other States of this Union, as well in the Territories as in the States. Believing that all the signs around us point to revolution, that the danger of a dissolution is imminent, and ardently desiring to preserve it, if it can be done consistently with the honor, self-respect, and independence of the people with whom, for good or ill, my lot is cast, I should have a serious responsibility to discharge to my constituents if I did not warn you of the Black Republican party on this floor; and if my humble voice could penetrate even the furthest extremity of the North, I would warn her people not to be deceived by those bold, bad men, who, to gratify their insatiate ambition, would subvert this Government and deluge this land in blood. The people of the South see the dangers that menace them, and they are ready to meet them as becomes the sons of noble sires.

The sentiment, the conviction of the South, is that their safety consists in their unity. Seeing how fiercely they are assailed; that their property, their equality and independence are boldly threatened, they have, day by day, forgetful of past differences, been drawn more closely together, until they now present to the world the proud spectacle of a free, intelligent people all united as a band of brothers, in the unalterable determination to stand or fall together in defense of their rights. And this I may say, without boasting, that if the madness of fanaticism shall at last compel the South, in defense of all she holds most dear, to imitate the example of our great forefathers, when chains and slavery were forged for them, she will so act her part that her future historians will not be ashamed to record the exploits of her sons.

By what standard do they judge us? by what examples in our past history, in that of the Anglo-Saxon race, do they conclude that the South will tamely submit to occupy, in this Union, the position of inferiority and degradation to which the Black Republicans would subject her? We are the descendants of that sturdy race of patriots who were willing to expose "their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor," rather than submit to so much as a tax of threepence per pound on tea. But you think, perhaps, that we are degenerated. It did not appear so in the war of 1812. It did not appear so with that little band of Texans, who, in defense of their rights and liberties, bravely dared to meet the powerful armies of Mexico. What though we be few in numbers, we still possess all the elements of strength to sustain ourselves in peace or in war; and the experience of the past in history, as well as Holy Writ itself, teaches us that the race is not always to the swift, nor the battle to the strong.

The North is as much, if not more, interested in preserving this Union than are we of the South. Its destiny is in her hands. She now threatens to conquer and subdue us if we dare resist her encroachments. Remember that the same was done by Lord North and his minions towards our forefathers. See what that old Tory, Dr. Johnson, said in an article, "Taxation no Tyranny," written about that time:

"When subordinate committees oppose the decrees of the general Legislature with defiance thus audacious and malignity thus acrimonious, nothing remains but to conquer or yield; to allow their independence, or reduce them by force." * * * "It seems determined by the Legislature that force shall be tried. I would wish that the rebels may be subdued by terror, rather than by violence; that such a force may be tried as might take away not only the power but the hope of resistance. Their obstinacy may perhaps be mollified by turning the soldiers to free quarters, forbidding any personal cruelty or hurt." * * * "Since the Americans have made it necessary to subdue them, may they be subdued with the least injury possible to their persons and possessions."

You of the North ridicule the idea of a dissolution for any cause. So did, then, the ministers of England. You presume upon your strength and our supposed weakness. So did they with the colonies. The tyrants of old England sought to tax them while they had no voice, no representatives in Parliament. Our brave forefathers determined to put all to the hazard rather than submit even to the smallest tax thus imposed. The Black Republican party proclaim their determination to rule the South by their overwhelming sectional majorities. We, it is true, might have a nominal participation in the legislation of the country, but would be powerless to protect ourselves, and the heaviest burdens might, and, judging by the past, would be imposed upon us. Would the South submit? Would freemen ever submit to occupy such a position?

We do not believe that the North would submit to this under similar circumstances. We have the opinion of Mr. Fillmore, that they would not, and in his opinion they ought not. I have much mistaken the proud spirit of those with whom I dwell, if they shall prove themselves more submissive. Our fathers were loyal to the mother country—so have we ever proven to this Government, discharging all of our constitutional obligations.

The tyrants whom our fathers then opposed, sought to excite insurrection among our slaves—it is so declared in the Declaration of Independence. So do these Black Republicans. Our fathers bore long the oppressions of the mother country. The minions of power fondly dreamed that as they had submitted so long, they would never resist. So think our enemies now. Says the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] why do not these braggarts put their threats in execution? It is gasconade—all threat. Sir, we make no threat—it is not our aim to frighten anybody; nor can you frighten us, or deter us from doing our duty. Our fathers met to consult in the first American Congress in 1774. They separated with no movement made for independence. Again they met, consulted, and went to their several homes, and still no serious talk of independence. Blood had then been shed, too, at Concord, Lexington, and Bunker Hill. They met again in 1776, deliberated, and at last determined on that memorable Declaration of Independence. The Abolitionists and Black Republicans repeat in our ears every day one passage contained in that instrument, and affect to believe that it was intended to include the slaves as well as whites; and therefore sustains their nefarious purposes. I beg to call their attention to another passage, which has not, perhaps, wholly lost its significance:

"That whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, (for which it was created,) it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute a new government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing it in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness."

In times like these, Mr. Chairman, when sectional feeling is so intensely excited, it is impossible to tell what a day may bring forth. And what does all this portend? Is it, or not, the beginning of revolution? We short-sighted mortals are not permitted to lift the veil and see what the future has in store for us. Could we do so now, it might serve to check those who are rushing headlong upon unseen dangers. If "coming events cast their shadows before"—if effects still follow causes—if history, that tells us how other republics have risen, flourished for a time, and then passed away; how empires, once hoary with age, and mighty in prowess, at last fell—if she teaches any lessons for our guidance in the story of the past, then ought we to be warned.

Our forefathers were not unsustained in the trying times of the Revolution. They had friends in England who boldly and eloquently defended their cause, and warned the British ministers of the consequences of their rashness. Among them were Lord Chatham, Burke, Fox, Pownall, and Colonel Barré.

Said the latter gentleman, on the floor of Parliament:

"I prophesied, on passing the stamp act, in 1765, what would happen thereon; and I now, in March, 1769, I now fear I can prophesy further troubles; that if the whole people were made desperate, finding no remedy from Parliament, the whole continent will be in arms immediately, and perhaps these provinces lost to England forever."

In February, 1769, said Governor Pownall in Parliament:

"The Americans do universally, unitedly, and unalterably declare, as I have before told the House, that they ought not to submit. The slightest circumstance will now, in a moment, throw everything into confusion and bloodshed. That spirit which led their ancestors to break off from everything which is near and dear to the human heart, has but a slight sacrifice to make at this time; they have not to quit their native country, but defend it; not to forsake their friends and relations, but to unite with and stand by them in one common union. They will abominate as sincerely as they now love you. In one word, if this spirit of fanaticism should once arise upon the idea of persecuting these people, you will not, for the future, be able to govern with a rod of iron.

"If it be not the humor of the House to believe this at present, I only beg they will remember that it has been said, and that they were forewarned of it."

How applicable to our own times!

Lord Chatham said:

"When the resolution was taken in this House to tax America, I was ill in bed; if I could have endured to have been carried in my bed, so great was the agitation of my mind for the consequences, I would have solicited some kind hand to have laid me down on this floor, to have borne my testimony against it."

Again spoke Lord Chatham:

"America, if she falls, will fall like the strong man. She would embrace the pillars of the State and pull down the constitution along with her."

Again, when he spoke those words that made the tyrants tremble:

"America (says he) is almost in open rebellion. I rejoice that America has resisted."

But all these warnings were unheeded to the last.

I know not upon what to rest the hope that the North will at last yield to wiser and more moderate counsels. All the old national parties are broken up, save the Democratic party, and that is weakened by desertion and torn by divisions. I do yet fondly hope that this old party will be found strong enough, patriotic and self-sacrificing enough, to meet boldly this question, upon which its fate and the fate of the Union depends, and once more restore peace and quiet to a distracted country. It has received accessions of late from the old Whig and the American parties, and forms a nucleus around which the conservative men of the whole country may still rally. Though deserted by those once recognized as its leaders, a portion of the old guard, the true-hearted northern Democracy, still stands firm. Though their motives may be maligned, their names threatened to be cast out as despised, and public honors denied them, still, unmoved, they go on to the discharge of their duty to their country. I listened with delight to the manly and eloquent speech of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. BISHOP,] the other day. While the spirit which he exhibited survives among the northern Democracy, though they may, for a time, be in a minority, we may yet have hope for the perpetuity of our institutions. All honor to them! They will yet be honored and sustained at home, cherished and respected at the South; while they will be ever cheered with the pleasing consciousness of having, like patriots, discharged their duty boldly, notwithstanding the desertion of the Douglasses, the Walkers, the Forneys, the Bancrofts, and others, once honored leaders. One of these was, but yesterday, the idol of every southern heart; the hero of many a forensic contest; the example first on the lips to refute the charge that the northern Democracy were not to be trusted. All remember how, like Saladin's, his keen Damascus blade shone so brightly on many a field in defense of the constitutional rights of the South. Admiring friends looked forward to the day when they could elevate him to the Presidency of the nation—an honor which had only been delayed yet a little while, as they deemed, for an older, though not, as we then knew, a better soldier. That he should so suddenly turn his back upon his ancient friends, and join his long embittered foes, is strange, unnatural, unaccountable.

A striking example in our early history is recalled to my mind. It is of one who was among the boldest and bravest in the early days of our Revolution—daring, resolute, and zealous in the cause of liberty. His blood was freely shed for the great cause. The Father of his Country trusted him, leaned upon him; and yet he at last, from ambition or some secret griefs, proved himself a traitor to his country. Remembering the past as I do, I will not call him to whom I have referred by so harsh a name; but from present indications from the quick nomination for the Presidency, with R. J. Walker on the same ticket for the Vice Presidency, the indications given out by his organ at Chicago, and by his late speech in opposition to the South—to make friends, as it seemed with the Black Republicans, by misrepresenting the positions and sentiments of that section, and then attacking those falsely-attributed positions—it will not surprise me to see, very soon, the mask thrown off, and this nameless chief fighting in the ranks of his late revilers.

We of the South are falsely represented at the North, by these Black Republican presses, as being desirous of extending slavery to the free territory of the North. A distinguished Senator pretended to charge upon the South a desire to convey slaves into northern free States. This is not so. We claim the right to carry our slaves into territory belonging to all the States alike. The gentleman from Illinois says he admits this principle as regards all property save that of slaves. He denies that slavery exists by the common law, but contends that it is by statute law only; and denies that they should go to any of the Territories of the Union.

I tell that gentleman that this is no longer a question for dispute. It is the law of the land, so pronounced by the highest judicial tribunal in our country. It was also decided by twelve of the ablest judges in England—among whom was Lord Holt—"that negroes were merchandise." I refer the gentleman to Burges's Commentaries, vol. 1, p. 735; Chalmers's Opinions of Eminent Lawyers, vol. 2, pp. 262, 263, 364; and Colquhoun on Roman and Civil Law, not having time to read them now.

We do not ask you to regard slavery as we regard it. It is not suited to your northern clime, but it is suited to ours. We of the South believe that it is recognized and sanctioned by the Almighty in his revealed Word. We think their introduction into our country has been the efficient means of civilizing and Christianizing the African race. We know they are more happy and contented. Agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, have all derived benefits incalculable from this institution. By it the world has been clothed and fed. Think of it as you will, but deny to us none of our constitutional rights; cease to molest us, and we may yet live on in peace. We are content to assume all its responsibilities, both here and hereafter, and willing to abide the enlightened public opinion of the world. And may we not hope that there is sufficient virtue, intelligence, and patriotism, left at the North to correct this unsound public sentiment? or shall treason, folly, and fanaticism, be permitted to rule the day, and this Republic, with all its present greatness, and its glorious promises, be destroyed, merely to gratify the thirst for power of those Black Republican leaders, in whose hearts, as I believe, there lurks treason as dark as ever actuated the oath-bound associates of Catiline's conspiracy. They, too, meditated an insurrection of the slaves in the Roman territories, as one of their means of effecting their unholy purposes. Cicero, after detecting their plot and arresting their persons, boldly asked, if they deserve praise who laid the foundation of the republic, do not they also who preserved it from its enemies? May not those now (and I allude particularly to those residing in the North, who unite to restore peace to this distracted country, by preventing the triumphs of treason and rebellion in Kansas, and by thwarting the designs of the enemies of the Constitution and the Union) ask in the same spirit if they, too, have not deserved well of their country?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman: Representing that congressional district in this House which in the last presidential election gave to the Republican candidate for President the largest majority of any district in the United States, and which elected me to this Congress by a majority exceeding twelve thousand votes, I wish to be heard in behalf of my constituency on the great question which now so deeply agitates the country.

In 1850 the country was convulsed with agitation on the slavery question, growing out of the acquisition of territory from Mexico; but when I took my seat in the Thirty-Third Congress I was told that all the questions connected with the institution of slavery had been finally adjusted and settled by the adoption of what was called the "compromise measures of 1850;" that these measures had been acquiesced in by the people generally, and sanctified by the triumphant election of Franklin Pierce as President of the United States in 1852. It was said that the people had lost all interest in the subject, and had become tired of the continued agitation involved in its discussion. It was dead, and buried so deep that there was no resurrection for it. There was no disguising the fact that in the election of Pierce the slave power achieved a most signal advantage. His nomination was secured by that power; and when elected he was thoroughly and completely devoted to its interest. Both branches of Congress, by majorities of more than two to one, were in harmony with the Executive on that subject. The Supreme Court was then, as now, ready for any service which the interest of the power demanded. Hence, every branch of the Government, executive, legislative, and judicial, was in concord on the slavery question. To the casual observer of events it would have been supposed that, so far as the whole machinery of government was concerned, nothing further was left to be desired by the South; and the aggression so soon disclosed in the proposed repeal of the Missouri compromise could not have been anticipated. Sir, it is not my purpose to-day to go over the history of the repeal of the Missouri compromise, that outrage upon the public honor and the plighted faith of the nation. That history has been written in the annals of the country for the last four years, and there are yet other chapters to be written in that connection.

By false issues, dodges, evasions, and frauds, the election of Mr. Buchanan was secured. No single speech can do justice to the history of that remarkable campaign, and I certainly shall not attempt it in the few remarks I propose making while I occupy the floor. I believe I can say, with truth, that almost everywhere in the North Mr. Buchanan was unblushingly claimed as a friend to freedom in Kansas, and in proportion as his chances were thought to be desperate did his friends clamor for him as the peculiar champion of the free-State cause. But all professions favorable to Kansas being a free State, made by him or his friends, were doomed to falsification, and the prediction of his opponents in that regard have become history.

Mr. SHAW, of Illinois. Do I understand my colleague to say that Mr. Buchanan was claimed as a free-Kansas man in Illinois?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I said I believed he was so claimed almost everywhere in the North, and I know he was so claimed by his supporters in that part of Illinois I represent.

The history of events in Kansas up to the time of the election of the present Chief Magistrate, is but too well known. From the time the repeal of the Missouri compromise was first broached, there has been a concerted, systematic, and determined effort to make a slave State out of territory which had hitherto been consecrated to freedom. That effort has been aided in every possible way by the Government, which has intervened in every instance to prevent the people thereof from being left "perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way." The office-holders who have been sent to Kansas who have not lent the influence of their official position to uphold fraud, violence, and outrage, have felt the weight of the displeasure of the Government officials in Washington; while those who were most active in the pro-slavery cause, and have committed inhuman crimes have been, and are yet, retained in office. The Pierce administration looked with indifference upon the first invasion from Missouri, which foisted upon the Territory a foreign Legislature. It had no words of denunciation for the lawless and revolutionary acts of the Atchisons and Stringfellow who plotted in their midnight conclaves their usurpations of power in Kansas, and the destruction of the most sacred rights of American freemen, but it addressed itself to the falsest and most vehement accusations against the emigrants from the free States who sought free homes there. The administrations of both Pierce and Buchanan have ever been in the interest of slavery and hostile to freedom; and, while the former deserves the contempt, the latter merits the execration of posterity. The history of the outrages in Kansas for the last three years is a blot upon the escutcheon of the nation, and were it not for the official proofs, an account of them would, in after times, be considered merely as a "romance of rascality."

A record of the official evidence in regard to all of these outrages has been filed in the archives of this House and spread before the nation. Two members of the present House [Messrs. HOWARD, and SHERMAN of Ohio,] are deserving the thanks of the country for their successful efforts in exposing that atrocious conspiracy against the elective franchise. The Blue Lodges of Missouri vomited forth their bands of adventurers and terrorists to overrun and confiscate, as it were, an entire Territory, trampling under foot all law, justice, and right. The subsequent horrors in Kansas naturally flowed from this first irruption of the border ruffians. It was these same men who afterwards, in the Territory, lighted the torch of civil war; who murdered the free-State men in cold blood; who covered the smiling prairies with bones and corpses, and who sundered all the ties which usually unite men. But time will have its revenges; and the authors and participants in these great offenses will perish before time shall have effaced from their foreheads the stigma which the hand of crime has there imprinted.

A peculiar fate has attended the Governors of Kansas—they have all fallen under the hatchet of the guillotine, worked by the administrations that appointed them. It should be observed that these Governors were all appointed as friends of the Nebraska bill, and good "national Democrats," who went to the Territory to carry out the "principles of the bill" so called. They have all been removed from office, or compelled to resign. Like Saturn devouring successively all his children, the Government devours successively all the Governors it sends to Kansas.

But, to go back a little, you determined to get rid of the Missouri compromise, you determined to break down the barrier which, by a solemn compact, our fathers had interposed against the further extension of slavery. Without pursuing this matter further at this time, let us see how you stand on the record. The Kansas-Nebraska bill provides that it is—

"The intent and meaning of this bill not to 'legislate slavery into any Territory or State, nor exclude it therefrom; but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject to the Constitution of the United States.'"

Then the resolution of the Cincinnati convention declared that the party recognized—

"The right of the people of all the Territories, including Kansas and Nebraska, acting through the legally and fairly expressed will of a majority of actual residents, and whenever the number of their inhabitants justifies it, to form a constitution, with or without domestic slavery, and be admitted into the Union upon terms of perfect equality with the other States."

While this resolution, fairly interpreted, explodes the humbug of popular sovereignty, and takes away the right of the people of the Territory to act upon the slavery question until they shall come to form a constitution, yet it conceded that the people of Kansas had a right to act through "the legally and fairly expressed will of a majority of the actual residents," &c., whenever they "come to form a constitution."

And, sir, what does the President say in his inaugural? Here it is:

"What a conception, then, was it for Congress to apply this simple rule—that the will of the majority shall govern—to the settlement of the domestic question of slavery in the Territories!"

"But be this as it may, it is the imperative and indispensable duty of the Government of the United States to secure to every resident inhabitant the free and independent expression of his opinion by his vote. This sacred right of each individual must be preserved!"

Such are the declarations of the President—"the will of the majority must govern;" and, further, that it is the indispensable and imperative duty of the Government to secure to every resident inhabitant the free and independent expression of his opinion by his vote. These are the declarations of the same President who is now attempting to wield the whole power of the Government to force a constitution upon a people notoriously against the "will of the majority"—an instrument conceived in crime, and brought forth in fraud and violence.

The country was promised that with the advent of the present Administration the Kansas question should be speedily settled; that a new order of things was to be inaugurated there, and that peace should soon reign throughout all her borders; that the President would call to the executive posts in the Territory men of high character and distinguished ability—men who would have the entire confidence of the Administration, and who would challenge the respect of the country. Robert J. Walker was appointed Governor, and Frederick P. Stanton Secretary, of the Territory. They were both southern men, and of course, "national Democrats," who had efficiently and successfully labored to elevate Mr. Buchanan to the Presidency, and who were ardent supporters of his Administration. Their appointment implied the fullest indorsement and confidence of the President and his Cabinet. They were held out to the world as honest, competent, and just men, who could be relied upon to administer the affairs of the distracted Territory fairly, honorably, legally; holding the scales of justice even between contending parties. All their acts would be entitled to full faith and credit, and implicit confidence could be reposed in all their statements in relation to matters connected with their official duties. They entered upon the duties of their respective offices with a thorough and complete understanding with the Administration as to the general course of policy to be pursued. Governor Walker, in his letter to the President accepting his appointment, said:

"I understand that you and your Cabinet cordially concur in the opinion expressed by me, that the actual bona fide residents of the Territory of Kansas, by a fair and regular vote, unaffected by fraud or violence, must be permitted, in adopting their State constitution, to decide for themselves what shall be their social institutions. This is the great fundamental principle of the act of Congress organizing that Territory, affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, and is in accordance with the views uniformly expressed by me throughout my public career. I contemplate a peaceful solution of this question by an appeal to the intelligence and patriotism of the people of Kansas, who should all participate freely and fully in this decision, and by a majority of whose votes the decision must be made, as the only and constitutional mode of adjustment.

"I will go and endeavor to adjust these difficulties, in the full confidence, as strongly expressed by you, that I will be sustained by all your own high authority, with the cordial cooperation of all your Cabinet."

After Walker's acceptance of the office, in the language used in the extract just read, the following instructions were issued to him by the Administration, emanating from the Department of State:

"There are two great objects connected with the present excitement growing out of the affairs of Kansas, and the attainment of which will bring it to a speedy termination. These were clearly and succinctly stated in the President's recent inaugural address, and I embody the paragraphs in the communication, asking your special attention to them. It is declared in that instrument to be the imperative and indispensable duty of the Government of the United States to secure to every resident inhabitant the free and independent expression of his opinion by his vote. This sacred right of each individual must be preserved; and that being accomplished, nothing can be fairer than to leave the people of a Territory free from all foreign interference to decide their own destiny for themselves, subject only to the Constitution of the United States.

"Upon these great rights of individual action and of public decision rest the foundations of American institutions; and if they are faithfully secured to the people of Kansas, the political condition of the country will soon become quiet and satisfactory. The institutions of Kansas should be established by the votes of the people of Kansas, unawed and uninterrupted by force or fraud. And foreign voters must be excluded, come whence they may, and every attempt to overawe or interrupt the free exercise of the right of voting must be promptly repelled and punished. Freedom and safety for the legal voter, and exclusion and punishment for the illegal one—these should be the great principles of your administration."

And here again we find the declaration of the Administration, that the institutions of Kansas should be established by the votes of the people of Kansas, unawed and uninterrupted "by force or fraud." The people, uninfluenced and uncontrolled, were to shape and mold their own form of government, and decide their own destiny for themselves, without foreign interference, and in their own way, "subject," in the cant phrase of the day, "only to the Constitution of the United States."

A programme having been arranged and agreed upon between the Administration and Walker, the Governor issues his inaugural address to the people of Kansas, which is approved by the President and Cabinet. In that address he says:

"Unless the convention submit the constitution to a vote of all the actual resident settlers of Kansas, and the election be fairly and justly conducted, the constitution will be, and ought to be, rejected by Congress."

Now, sir, upon the face of this record, I submit that this Administration was committed, by its official action and declarations, by its plighted faith, by every obligation of honor, to a full, fair, and complete submission of any constitution that might be formed to the whole people of Kansas, at an election fairly and justly conducted, where all the actual resident settlers might peaceably vote. And still further, when Governor Walker reached Kansas he made a speech to the people, at Topeka, to persuade them, if the opportunity were offered, to participate in the election. In that speech he said:

"I will say, then, to you, gentlemen, that if they do not appoint a fair and impartial mode by which the majority of the actual bona fide resident settlers of Kansas shall vote, through the instrumentality of impartial judges, I will join you in all lawful opposition to their doings, and the President and Congress will reject the constitution."

"I say to you, that unless a full and fair opportunity is given to the people of Kansas to decide for themselves what shall be their form of government, including the sectional question which has so long divided you—unless, I repeat, they grant you such an opportunity, I have one power of which no man or set of men can deprive me, and to which I shall unhesitatingly resort, and that is to join you in lawful opposition to their acts."

As late as July last, the Washington Union, the official Administration organ, contended that the will of the people of Kansas, in regard to their constitution, must have "a direct expression at the polls." It said:

"A constitution not subjected to that test, no matter what it contains, will never be acknowledged by its opponents as containing anything but fraud."

Mind you, sir, "a constitution," a whole constitution, not a particular provision, to be voted for or against, yet voting for the instrument all the time. The "organ" continues:

"A plausible color might be given to this assertion by the argument that members of the convention could have no motive for refusing to submit their work to their constituents, except a consciousness that the majority would condemn it. We confess that we should find some difficulty in answering this. What other motive could they have?"

"We do most devoutly believe that, unless the constitution of Kansas be submitted to the direct vote of the people, the unhappy controversy which has heretofore raged in that Territory will be prolonged for an indefinite time to come. We are equally well convinced that the will of the majority, whether it be for or against slavery, will finally triumph, though it may be after years of strife, disastrous to the best interests of the country, and dangerous, it may be, to the peace and safety of the whole Union."

"Again: this movement of the territorial authorities to form a constitution is made, not in the regular way, in pursuance of an enabling and authorizing act of Congress, but in the mere motion of the Territorial Legislature itself. Nay, it has been begun and carried on in the teeth of a refusal by Congress to pass such an act. This irregularity is not fatal. There are other cases in which it was overlooked. But it can be waived only in consideration of the fact that the people have expressed their will in unmistakable language. If we dispense with the legal forums of proceedings we must have the substance."

"We think, for these reasons, that Governor Walker, in advocating a submission of the constitution to a vote of the people, acted with wisdom and justice, and followed the only line of policy which promises to settle this vexed question, either rightly or satisfactorily. In this respect, at least, he has done nothing worthy of death or bonds."

Even John Calhoun, and his seven confidères, pro-slavery candidates for delegates to the convention from Douglas county, were obliged to come out with a card just before the election, pledging themselves, in the strongest terms, to submit the constitution of the future State of Kansas, for adoption or rejection, to every bona fide actual citizen of Kansas. In view of events that have since transpired, I want to call attention to that card:

To the Democratic voters of Douglas county:

It having been stated by that abolition newspaper, the Herald of Freedom, and by some disaffected bogus Democrats, who have got up an independent ticket for the purpose of securing the vote of the Black Republicans, that the regular nominees of the Democratic convention were opposed to submitting the constitution to the people, we, the candidates of the Democratic party, submit the following resolution, which was adopted by the Democratic convention which placed us in nomination, and which we fully and heartily indorse, as a complete refutation of the slanders above referred to.

JOHN CALHOUN, A. W. JONES,
W. S. WELLS, H. BUTCHER,
L. S. BOLING, JOHN M. WALLACE,
W. T. SPICELY, L. A. PRATHER.

LECOMPTON, Kansas Territory, June 15, 1857.
Resolved, That we will support no man as a delegate to the constitutional convention, whose duties it will be to frame the constitution of the future State of Kansas, and to mold the political institutions under which we, as a people, are to live, unless he pledges himself, fully, freely, and without reservation, to use every honorable means to submit the same to every bona fide actual citizen of Kansas, at the proper time for the vote being taken upon the adoption by the people, in order that the said constitution may be adopted or rejected by the actual settlers of this Territory, as the majority of voters shall decide."

Having thus shown the pledges of the Administration and its officials, and others, that the people of Kansas should have the opportunity fairly and freely to pass upon their constitution, I want to trace action on the question, and show how shamefully all these pledges and obligations have been violated; to show how utterly faithless the Administration has been in this regard, and how it is now lending itself to trample down all the principles it had professed to cherish; and to impose a hated and odious constitution upon a people against their will. But let me say here that this Lecompton convention had no legal basis at all. There had been no enabling act passed by Congress. Though President Pierce had recommended the passage of such an act by the last Congress, yet Congress did not act on his recommendation. The Legislature of Kansas had, therefore, no authority to call any convention to form a constitution. That is a proposition which, in principle, cannot be controverted. No Territorial Legislature, which is a mere creature of Congress, can abrogate its government, which has been established by a law of Congress. However, as Congress has full power over the subject of the admission of a new State, it can accept any constitution, republican in form, however it may be framed; provided, always, it embody the will of the people seeking admission as a State. During the administration of General Jackson, the Territorial Legislature of Arkansas undertook, without any authority from Congress, to call a convention to adopt a constitution preparatory to admission of that Territory into the Union. A question as to the power of the Legislature to do that act was submitted to the Attorney General, B. F. Butler, and he decided that any law passed by the Territorial Legislature of Arkansas calling a convention would be utterly null and void. When, subsequently, the subject of the admission of Michigan was up in the Senate, Mr. Buchanan then being a member of that body, said:

"No Senator will pretend that their Territorial Legislature had any right whatever to pass laws enabling the people to elect delegates to a convention for the purpose of forming a State constitution. It was an act of usurpation on their part."

Hence, we have the authority of General Jackson's administration, and of Mr. Buchanan himself, that this Lecompton convention was entirely without foundation of law. This does not imply, however, that the people would not have the right peaceably to assemble, without an act of Congress, and form a constitution to be presented to Congress, as a petition to be admitted into the Union. The Topeka constitution was the act of the people of Kansas, and undoubtedly embodied their will, as they ratified it by an almost unanimous vote; and it is to be regretted that Congress had not conformed to that will, and admitted Kansas as a sovereign State.

In July, 1855, the bogus and usurping Legislature of Kansas, without any authority from Congress, even had it been a legal Legislature instead of an imported mob, passed an act to take the sense of the people on the question of calling a convention to form a constitution. The free-State people, being a vast majority—denying then and ever, the binding force and validity of the acts of that Legislature—took no part in the election, one way or the other. Some others voted, and the proposition to call a convention was declared carried. Though Congress had expressly refused to pass an enabling act for Kansas; yet, on the 19th day of February, 1857, the Legislature of that Territory passed a law providing for the call of a convention to frame a constitution preparatory to her admission into the Union. The scope of the act was in full and complete harmony with the entire previous history of the pro-slavery party in Kansas. It conformed to the general purpose to which all their efforts had been directed; that of fastening slavery upon the State, regardless of the popular sentiment, and indeed, against the vehement protest of the people. The bogus Legislature retained in itself the power to supervise all the returns, excluding the United States officers, the Governor and Secretary, from any control over them. The whole machinery for taking the census, and registering the voters, as provided for by the act, was placed in the hands of the pro-slavery party, in order that it might be so arranged that the principal voting might be done in the pro-slavery districts. Even at that time fearing that any constitution that might be made by their convention would be voted down, they purposely failed to provide in their act for any submission to the people. For that vital omission, and for other reasons, Governor Geary very properly vetoed the bill, but it was, however, passed over his head by the requisite two-third vote.

Now, sir, let me proceed to an examination of this election of delegates, that we may ascertain how far that election approximated towards an expression of the will of the people of the Territory. Setting aside the illegal character of the Legislature which enacted the law, let us look for a moment to the practical operation of things under it. Section eight of this territorial act provides, that at the election for members of the convention no man shall vote unless his name shall have been registered. As I have stated, all this machinery for taking the census and registering the votes, was in the hands of the pro-slavery sheriffs and probate judges, and their deputies, and they performed their duties in their "own way." And what was done? Was the census fairly taken? Was a full, fair, and complete registry of all the voters in the Territory made, so they might participate in the formation of their government? The law was not complied with; the voters were not registered; they could not vote for members of the convention under the law. Here is the testimony of Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton on that subject; and they may be called the Administration's own witnesses. Governor Walker, in his letter to the President, says:

"That [the Lecompton] convention, had vital, not technical defects, in the very substance of its organization, under the territorial law, which could only be cured, in my judgment—as set forth in my inaugural and other addresses—by the submission of the constitution for ratification or rejection by the people. On reference to the territorial law under which the convention was assembled, thirty-four regularly organized counties were named as election districts for delegates to the convention. In each and all of these counties it was required by law that a census should be taken, and the voters registered; and, when this was completed, the delegates to the convention should be apportioned accordingly. In nineteen of these counties there was no census; and, therefore, there could be no such apportionment there of delegates based upon such census. And in fifteen of these counties there was no registry of voters."

"These fifteen counties, including many of the oldest organized counties in the Territory, were entirely disfranchised, and did not give, and (by no fault of their own) could not give, a solitary vote for delegates to the convention." "Nor could it be said these counties acquiesced; for, wherever they endeavored by a subsequent census or registry of their own to supply this defect, occasioned by the previous neglect of the territorial officers, the delegates thus chosen were rejected by the convention."

"I repeat, that in nineteen counties out of thirty-four there was no census. In fifteen counties out of thirty-four there was no registry; and not a solitary vote was given, or could be given, for delegates to the convention in any one of these counties. Surely, then, it cannot be said that such a convention, chosen by scarcely more than one tenth of the present voters in Kansas, represented the people of that Territory, and could rightfully impose a constitution upon them without their consent."

Mr. Secretary Stanton corroborates Governor Walker, and says:

"The census therein provided for was imperfectly obtained from an unwilling people in nineteen counties of the Territory, while in the remaining counties, being also nineteen in number, from various causes, no attempt was made to comply with the law. In some instances people and officers were alike averse to the proceedings; in others, the officers neglected or refused to act; and in some, there was but a small population and no efficient organization, enabling the people to secure a representation in the convention."

Thus, it will be seen that, without any fault of their own, but in consequence of the premeditated neglect or refusal of the pro-slavery officers in the Territory to properly take the census and register the voters in one half of the whole number of counties, the free-State men were unable to vote for members of the convention. And yet, in face of this fact, we hear it alleged everywhere by the friends of the Lecompton instrument from the President down to the postmaster of the smallest degree, that this whole trouble has grown out of that "refusal to submit to lawful authority, and vote at the election of delegates." It is made a grave charge against these free-State men, that they did not vote, when under the law they were prohibited from voting; and it is said that they are now estopped from making any complaint.

In some of the counties, which were in effect disfranchised in the manner I have stated, the people undertook to elect delegates to the convention, in order to have a representation there, but the elections were declared irregular and the members thus elected ousted from their seats.

I now come to what took place at the election of members to the convention, which occurred on the third Monday of June, 1857. As we are looking to the will of the people in this matter of forming a government by the people in "their own way," let us see what proportion of the people participated in this election. There were nine thousand two hundred and fifty-one votes registered, and there was undoubtedly a large number of voters who were not registered in the nineteen omitted counties. Out of this whole number of voters in the Territory, only two thousand two hundred voted in all; and the average aggregate vote for the successful candidates was about one thousand eight hundred. Although there were large numbers who were excluded from voting, there were many who did not vote, being satisfied that the pro-slavery candidates would be "counted in" with the usual frauds, and others who were indifferent on the subject, as they had been promised by the highest authority an opportunity for a full and fair vote, on the adoption or rejection of any constitution that might be made.

This convention of sixty delegates, thus elected by a handful of votes, and which would give an average of thirty voters, good and bad, to each delegate, went to work and formed a constitution in "their own way." The convention was adjourned over from September to October. In the mean time there was an election for members to the Legislature, and the free-State men carried it overwhelmingly, notwithstanding the prodigious frauds that were perpetrated. It was thought that when the convention came together again, in October, its action would be palsied by the power of public opinion. Many of the most reputable members elected to it, becoming satisfied of its dishonest and fraudulent purposes, refused to attend. Forty-three out of the sixty was the highest number participating in the work, and the most important questions were passed upon without a quorum. Violence, debauchery, and profanity characterized its proceedings. The lowest revolutionary club that ever plotted under cover of darkness in the faubourgs of Paris, during the reign of terror, could not come up to the standard of the Lecompton conspirators.

The constitution made was a fitting instrument to emanate from such a body. The October election, and other evidences, had shown that the free-State men were largely in the ascendant in the Territory, and that any constitution submitted by the Lecompton convention would be overwhelmingly voted down. As every possible committal had been made that there should be a submission of the instrument, ingenuity was taxed to the utmost for some specious pretext of submission which would accomplish the end of the conspirators, and yet cheat the public. It is unnecessary for me to dwell long on the scandalous provisions of the seventh section of the schedule, in regard to the submission. It is, in fact, no submission at all, for no man could vote against the constitution. It is all pro, and no con. If, according to section nine of this same schedule, the voter would take a test oath to support that constitution under "the pains and penalties of perjury," he was graciously permitted by the supreme law-makers to put in a ballot for the "constitution with slavery," or "constitution with no slavery," which was in fact construed to be voting for the constitution, and either for or against the further introduction of slavery into Kansas. The whole thing was a disgraceful swindle and contrivance, and the farce of voting upon it was gone through with on the 21st of December last, and the requisite number of votes were returned for the "constitution with slavery,"—6,143 being the number deemed necessary and proper in that election. It was also thought, under the circumstances, that a few votes should be returned for the "constitution with no slavery," and accordingly 569 votes were returned in that way. The Legislature of Kansas, elected in October last, appointed a commission of competent and reliable men to examine into the frauds committed at the various elections. This commission reports in regard to the election of the 21st of December, as follows:

"The board report that of the votes returned of the election of the 21st December, 1857, on the slavery clause of the constitution framed at Lecompton, held at the precincts of Kickapoo, Delaware, Oxford, and Shawnee, about the following numbers were illegal and fraudulent:

At Kickapoo.....	700
At Delaware City.....	145
At Oxford.....	1,200
At Shawnee.....	675
Total.....	2,720

Thus it will be seen that of the 6,143 votes counted in the "official returns," 2,720 were fraudulent, which being deducted, leave but 3,423 votes for the Lecompton constitution; and many of these were doubtless of the same character as those of Kickapoo and Oxford.

As there could be no vote given against the constitution, the instrument was of course declared to be adopted by a man whom the President calls "J. Calhoun, Esq.," and who was president of the convention, and made by it dictator generally in all the Territory.

The Legislature elected in October, in order to ascertain the true sense of the people of Kansas, passed an act submitting the Lecompton constitution to a fair vote of the people for or against it, for it with slavery, and for it without slavery, to be taken on the 4th day of January last. This election was a fair one; and none but legal votes were cast; and the proper officers, including General Denver, the Secretary and acting Governor, certify to a majority of over ten thousand votes as being given against the constitution.

But the instrument, such as it is, and framed in the manner it was, is now before us, and a bill for the admission of Kansas under its provisions has come down from the Senate, and now confronts us on the Speaker's table. The President recommends its admission; "thus," in his own language, "terminating the Kansas question," by "localizing the question of slavery." Idle expectation this, of terminating the controversy and localizing the question of slavery, by foisting an execrated institution upon a people who revolt at and loathe it. Let the President beware how he attempts much further to oppress that people, and to "crush out" their most sacred rights. He will find that there is a point beyond which forbearance is no longer a virtue; and that his bayonets, his patronage, his power and authority, will form but a feeble barrier against that storm of popular indignation which must be awakened, wherever liberty has a votary, or a representative government a friend.

There are some other matters to which I must refer. An honorable Senator [Mr. TOOMBS] was understood to remark the other night, in reply to the distinguished Senator from my own State, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] that no Senator or Representative from the South had ever advanced the doctrine that slaves could be held in the free States in defiance of their laws or constitutions. I think the Senator from Georgia mistaken. I well remember the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. KEITT] used the following language, in a speech which he made on this floor in 1856:

"The South should establish in the platform the principle that the right of a southern man to his slaves is equal, in its length and breadth, to the right of a northern man to his horse. She should make the recognition of the right full, complete, and indisputable."

Sir, there is abundant evidence that this claim is quite generally set up in the South. To say nothing of the claim made by a citizen of North Carolina, a Mr. Wheeler, a few years ago in the United States district court of Pennsylvania, or that of Lemmon, now pending in the courts of New York, I beg to call the attention of the committee to the dicta of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Dred Scott case, where the doctrine is expressly affirmed that slaves may be held in the Territories of the United States under the Constitution of the United States, because the Constitution regards them as property. And Mr. Buchanan, in stating in his letter to Professor Siliman and others, what he understood to be the opinion of the court, says it is a mystery how it could ever have been doubted that the Constitution carries slavery into the Territories. Why? Because slaves are property under the provisions of the Federal Constitution. Now, sir, if this be true, they are property wherever the Constitution operates; and no lesser authority, no mere State law or constitution, can make them anything but property. No State can say that shall not be property which the Constitution of the United States says shall be. The inference is logical and irresistible; and hence the President, in his recent message, informs us that Kansas is already a slave State, as much so as Georgia or South Carolina.

Now, if it had happened that the Senator from Georgia was literally correct in his statement, how very far would he have been from stating what is actually claimed by the South! For, is there any man who denies that the slaveholding members of the Supreme Court, who read opinions from which these doctrines necessarily result, in doing so acted in conformity to the opinions of the slaveholders? Is there a southern gentleman on this floor who denies the doctrines enunciated by those opinions, or who disputes the President's interpretation of them? Not one. No, sir, not one. And since this denial of the Senator, he and his associates from the South have, in the most formal manner, in the Senate of the United States, by voting for the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, set up this very claim that slaves may be held in all the free States, their own laws and constitutions to the contrary notwithstanding.

As this constitution is before us, I would like to allude further to some of its provisions if I had the time. While the Constitution of the United States only requires that a Senator in Congress should be a citizen of the United States for nine years, no man can be Governor of the State of Kansas unless he has been a citizen for twenty years; yet I hear no complaints of this provision from the "Democracy," who have professed to be the peculiar champions of the adopted citizen. I cannot, however, pass over the extraordinary first section of the seventh article, in regard to slavery, which declares that—

"The right of property is before and higher than any constitutional sanction, and the right of the owner of a slave to such slave and its increase is the same, and as inviolable as the right of the owner of any property whatever."

Here is a declaration that the Congress of the United States is called upon to indorse by voting in Kansas as a State, as is now proposed, under the Lecompton constitution, that property in slaves is higher than any constitutional sanction; and every Senator or Representative who votes for Kansas with this constitution must be held as admitting that there is nothing in that constitution incompatible with the proper institutions and just policy of a State. This provision, it must be perceived, is fundamental, and goes to the very foundation of civil polity of the inchoate State. If the proposition contained in it be correct, there can be no objection in admitting a State under it; but if incorrect and unsound, it is so important and vital as to form an insuperable objection to its admission. By voting to receive the State, we declare it is not objectionable, and that we do recognize the correctness of the declaration of the principle enunciated in the section. It is not like the ordinary provisions of a constitution, which we might deem impolitic and unwise, and over which we cannot control, as being entirely within the province of the people of the new State; but it is of that description which goes to the very foundation of the State and determines its character, and recognizes a principle which, if sound, affects the people of every State in the Union: for if we admit that it is true in Kansas, it is true in and for every State in the Union. We cannot admit Kansas as a State without thereby asserting that slavery is sanctioned by an authority transcending that of the people of the States, and which it is not competent for them practically to deny. The Senator from Georgia votes to admit Kansas, and he thereby declares that it is the right of Kansas to build its institutions upon this central idea. This idea is well founded, or otherwise. If well founded, the State may properly be admitted under it; but if not, it is so great an error, of such sweep and importance, that no man can be justified in voting for it. It is manifest, therefore, from what I have said, that a vote for the bill does, in effect, affirm the doctrines which are contained in the Lecompton constitution.

Therefore it is that I say that all who vote for this bill affirm that slaves may be held in all the States of this Union, in defiance of their constitutions and laws. I maintain, sir, that we have no right to admit Kansas under this constitution. It is admitted on all sides that we may look into a constitution to see if it provides for a republican form of government. The provision referred to in the Kansas constitution determines its character, whether republican or not. It asserts, in the most unqualified terms, that slavery is established by the law of nature; that its foundations are so strongly laid in the eternal and absolute fitness of things, that they cannot be shaken by any human enactments. If this right to hold slaves be sacred and inviolable, constitutions denying it are, in that regard, merely void; and governments built on such denial are false. A government established upon the principle, or recognizing as fundamental the idea, that the right to own slaves under it does and must exist, and cannot be impaired, assumes that every true and legitimate government must be founded upon the existence of classes—a privileged class and a degraded class. Such government is not republican, but oligarchal. A republican form of government, if the principles of this constitution be acknowledged, is false and impossible; and every attempt to institute a government on the principle of the equality of men, on the assertion that there shall be no inferiors before the law, no slaves, will, in the end, prove a failure; for the great central and efficient law, written by God himself, has laid the basis of all government in the truth that men are created unequal—part to be masters, and part slaves. Admit Kansas, give your sanction to her constitution, and you declare that the Declaration of Independence was a work, not only of "glittering generalities," but of false generalities, and the Constitution of the United States a stupendous cheat; and the nation, instead of being a Union of republican States, is but a Confederation of oligarchies. No State, at the time of its admission, ever contained such a provision as this slavery section in the Lecompton constitution; and Congress has never before been called upon to give such an indorsement as is now required in voting for the Kansas bill.

In regard to the schedule: one peculiar feature of the schedule of this constitution will be observed in the provision which takes the entire management of the election for State officers, Legislature, &c., held on the 4th of January last, out of the hands of the territorial officers, and placed it virtually in the hands of King Calhoun, the president of the convention, acting without any law for the punishment of the offense of getting up fraudulent, spurious, and forged returns. The stupendous and unblushing frauds by which Calhoun attempted to get possession of the Legislature elected on the 4th of January last, have been fully exposed. The commissioners to examine into these frauds, to whom I have before referred, state, in regard to one precinct, that—

"From the evidence taken before them, the board state that the returns from the Delaware Agency precinct were honestly made out by the officers of the election; and subsequently three hundred and thirty-six names were forged upon them by or with the knowledge of John D. Henderson; and that John Calhoun was particeps criminis after the fact."

This is the same John Calhoun, or "J. Calhoun, Esq.," as the President calls him, who has so long been holding the destinies of the Kansas Legislature in his breeches pocket here in Washington. This is the man to whom this Lecompton convention confided solely the grave and responsible duty of conducting the elections in Kansas in his "own way," and I think it will be admitted that he stands unrivaled in that line; his natural talent in that direction has been improved by long and extensive practice. Indeed, he may now be considered the ablest bodied voté counter "in this or any other country." But he has recently been induced, either by the pressure of public opinion, or for the purpose of influencing action here, to write a letter to the editor of a newspaper in this city, recognizing the fraud at the "Delaware Crossing" precinct, and stating that "certificates of election will accordingly issue" to the free-State candidates of Leavenworth county. Now, sir, in view of the practices in Kansas for the last few years, in view of the peculiar provisions of the schedule of the constitution, which provides that—

"In case of removal, absence or disability of the president of this convention to discharge the duties herein imposed on him, the president pro tempore of this convention shall perform said duties, and in case of absence, refusal, or disability of the president pro tempore, a committee consisting of seven, or a majority of them, shall discharge the duties required of the president of this convention."

And, in view of the further fact that Calhoun, the president of the convention, is now "absent" from the Territory, and is here in Washington, and, therefore, has no power or authority to act in the premises, I must confess I have my misgivings on the subject. While he has words of apparent fairness on his lips, I fear he has convenience in his heart.

There are, Mr. Chairman, a great many other topics I would like to discuss, connected with Kansas and outside of Kansas, but my limited time forbids. Many extraordinary things have been said, during the discussion of this question, in both Houses of Congress. A distinguished member of the Senate [Mr. HAMMOND, of South Carolina] has told us, in a late speech, that the slaveholders of the South have ruled the country for sixty out of the seventy years of her existence. This is extraordinary, but it is nevertheless true; and the North must acknowledge, with humiliation, the fact that she has so long submitted to the rule of an oligarchy, comparatively insignificant in numbers and weak in actual power. The history of this rule of sixty years is a history of aggression upon the rights of the North, sometimes vigorously resisted, but oftener feebly opposed and then finally acquiesced in, until another still greater outrage should be committed, to be again submitted to. This continued submission, this eternal acquiescence, has dulled the sensibilities of the people of the North to that extent, that too many of them confound the surrender of sacred rights with the dictates of an honest patriotism. No sooner has one wrong been committed and acquiesced in than another is attempted; and it might be said of this power, which has ruled us in the North for sixty years, as was said of the controlling power in the French Revolution, that it "marched from crimes to amnesties, and from amnesties to crimes."

But, sir, there is another portion of the honorable Senator's speech to which I beg leave to allude just here. In speaking of the contingency of separate organizations, and of the territory and resources which the South would then have, he says:

"But in this territory lies the great valley of the Mississippi, now the real, and soon to be the acknowledged, seat of the empire of the world. The sway of that valley will be as great as ever the Nile knew in the earlier ages of mankind. We own the most of it. The most valuable part of it belongs to us now; and although those who have settled above us are now opposed to us, another generation will tell a different tale. They are ours by all the laws of nature; slave labor will go over every foot of this great valley where it will be found profitable to use it, and some of those who may not use it are soon to be united with us by such ties as will make us one and inseparable."

In one thing the Senator is right. "The great valley of the Mississippi" will be the "acknowledged seat of the empire of the world," and the great and glorious and FREE STATE, which I have the honor to represent in part on this floor, will be the heart and center of that empire. And it will never belong to any southern confederacy; but it will belong to the Union as it exists under the Constitution, now and forever, and hereafter, by an awakened and just public sentiment, to be interpreted and carried out in the spirit and according to the intent of the fathers who framed it. But, let me say further, profitable or not, slavery will never curse another foot of the soil of that great valley. That which is now free must be protected for the free white men of our own country, and of other nations who seek an asylum upon our shores. They may be called "hirelings," or "slaves," in the language of the Senator; but they are "slaves" that know no masters on earth, and acknowledge no superiors; "slaves" who break up the prairies, hew down the forests, cut through the mountains, build up cities, towns, and villages, and lay the foundations for empires on the eternal basis of virtue, intelligence, and truth.

I have ever felt proud of the State of my adoption; yet the exalted position she occupies to-day on the great question of forcing a bastard constitution on an unwilling people, makes my heart to swell with still more lively emotions of pride. It is, indeed, a noble spectacle to see the people of that great and powerful State, and all its representatives in both Houses of Congress, standing up in defense of the great principles upon which our republican Government was formed. The people of Illinois, of all parties, rise up in mutiny against your attempts to fasten slavery upon Kansas against the expressed and determined will of her people.

Threats, persuasions, appeals to party spirit, are equally powerless to induce assent to the admission of Kansas under that hideous deformity, the Lecompton constitution. That people stand like a wall of fire against all your appliances, and will forever condemn the outrage,

"Unawed by influence and unbribed by gain."

For thirty thousand of my own constituents I enter here a solemn protest against the perpetration of this gigantic wrong.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, on no occasion in my life have I risen to speak so reluctantly as on the present. I feel the utter impossibility of advancing anything new by way of argument or statement of facts respecting the matter I am to discuss, and yet I am under an obligation of duty to present my views and defend my position.

From the time of the introduction of the Kansas-Nebraska bill in Congress, in 1854, to the present, it has been the theme of constant discussion, not only in the national Legislature, but throughout the length and breadth of the whole country. No question of public concernment, within my recollection, has been so thoroughly and ably discussed. This is by no means marvelous when we consider the magnitude of the principles involved in its solution and settlement; and whatever excitement it may have occasioned, the lights which have been shed upon all aspects of the question in the course of this discussion have not been without their beneficial influence.

You will remember, sir, that I was a member of this House when that bill passed and became the law of the land. You will remember, too, the long and exciting struggle through which it bore itself along to its final passage. You will not fail to remember, also, that it had no truer or more devoted friend than myself. In looking back over my career, as a member of this House, no act gives me more pleasure, or brings with it fewer regrets, than my constant and unwavering support of that great measure. I believed then, I believe yet, that the principles of popular sovereignty, as then enunciated, are just and right; and, if faithfully carried out, will forever settle, upon an honorable, fair, and equitable basis, not only the question of slavery, but every other question of domestic policy properly and of right belonging to the States and Territories. But, on the contrary, if its letter and spirit, its true intent and meaning shall not be respected, its high purpose will have failed; civil discord, fraternal strife, sectional collisions, and the more fatal evils which these will occasion, may be the unfortunate consequences. No man on this floor, to whatever party he may belong, would deplore this more deeply than myself; but whatever may come, whatever troubles or difficulties may arise in the fateful future, consequent upon the admission of Kansas into the Union under the Lecompton constitution—if, by possibility, it shall be so admitted—must not be charged to the fair and legitimate workings of the provisions of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, but only to the violation and perversion of its principles.

In the examination of this question, it will become necessary for me to refer to the views of the President as set forth in his annual message and in his late special message, from certain of which I am reluctantly compelled to dissent. I shall do so; and shall express my dissent with all proper respect, but firmly and distinctly. I entertain a high respect for the honesty and integrity of Mr. Buchanan. He was my first choice for the high position he now occupies. I aided, to the full extent of my influence, in securing his nomination. After his nomination, I devoted my time, and whatever energy and ability I possessed, in securing for him the suffrage of the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent. In that contest, the most exciting through which it had ever passed, a glorious triumph crowned the efforts of our Democracy in the State election, and did much towards securing that still more signal triumph which soon followed, and by which Mr. Buchanan was borne into the presidential office. I have no feeling of hostility towards the President; no disappointments to grieve over, and no resentments to gratify; nothing but duty to my constituents and to the country to influence my action here.

Sir, I think the President has committed a great political mistake, a fundamental error; and, so believing, I would be unworthy of a seat here, derelect in duty, and unfaithful to my constituents, were I to falsify, or fail to avow, my sentiments.

What is the issue? In 1854, Congress passed an act for the organization of the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska, commonly called the Kansas-Nebraska bill, in and by which it is, among other things, provided:

"That nothing herein contained should be so construed as to legislate slavery into or out of any State or Territory, but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States."

The President contends that the constitution formed at Lecompton, in the Territory of Kansas, and which he has submitted to Congress for its sanction, and with an earnest recommendation that Kansas shall, under it, be admitted into the Union, has been legally formed; that it is the embodiment of the will of the people, and is in perfect accordance with the provisions of the organic act to which I have alluded.

I, and those with whom I act, dissent from these views of the President; and it is to the issue, as thus presented to the country, that I shall direct my remarks on this occasion. I take the ground, with every confidence that I shall be able triumphantly to maintain it, that the so-called Lecompton constitution, which the President has invoked us to stamp with the solemn seal of our approbation, is a flagrant violation of the letter and spirit of the Kansas-Nebraska act; in direct conflict with the doctrine of popular sovereignty as enunciated by the Democratic party in the platform of principles adopted by the national convention at Cincinnati, in 1856; in the letter of Mr. Buchanan, accepting the nomination for the Presidency; in his inaugural address; and in his instructions to Governor Walker; and further, Mr. Chairman, that this so-called constitution was conceived in fraud, and is now, by trick and stratagem, attempted to be forced upon an unwilling people, against the solemn protest of four fifths of the legal voters of that Territory. I have full confidence that I shall be able, in the course of my arguments, to show all this and more.

I know, sir, that the course which I have seen proper to mark out for myself, on this question, will subject me—nay, has already subjected me—to animadversions, and my motives to misrepresentation; but I care not for that. It shall not deter me from following the dictates of my own conscience and the lights of my own judgment; and especially when I have abundant assurance that, in thus conscientiously performing my duty, I am reflecting, in the national Legislature, the almost unanimous will of my constituents.

Gentlemen from the South attribute the opposition of myself and other northern Democrats to the Lecompton constitution to the fact that it tolerates slavery. I take this occasion to say that my opposition arises from no such cause; I place it upon other and higher grounds. I am a native of a slaveholding State. I have no prejudices against the South, nor against the institution of slavery where it exists. I make no war upon the rights of the people of the South. I have defended those rights more frequently than southern gentlemen themselves; because my position, as a public man, and as a national Democrat of the North, has required it at my hands. I am again ready to defend the South whenever she is in the right; and, sir, I here, in my place to-day, make this solemn declaration, that, if Kansas or any other Territory of the United States were here, asking admission into the Union, honestly, fairly, and with a fundamental law recognizing the institution, I would vote for her admission cheerfully, and without a moment's hesitation; provided that fundamental law was republican in form, emanated from, and embodied the will of the people for whose government it was formed. I would not stop to inquire one word beyond that; and, with equal solemnity, I declare that no constitution tainted with fraud, as this is, and which is known to be condemned by an overwhelming majority of the people for whom it is made, shall ever receive my sanction, in any manner whatever. These, sir, have ever been my principles. I have proclaimed them publicly ever since I have been in public life. After my vote for the Kansas-Nebraska bill, I returned home, and was defeated for the seat I now occupy upon these principles; and, upon the strength of these principles, I was triumphantly reelected to the present Congress. I trust, therefore, that, so far, at least, as I am concerned, I shall hear no more of the charge made against northern Democrats of opposition to this constitution because of the slavery clause. Gentlemen may regard me as serious or not; it matters not to me. I have neither favor nor indulgence to ask from any quarter.

But, sir, to the question. It is said by the President and others, that the election which was held for delegates to form the Lecompton constitution, in June 1857, was a legal election; and that those who failed to vote at that election have no right to complain, and are bound by the voice of those who did exercise that right. I admit, only that the election was held under the forms of law; but, sir, was it a fair election; and had all the voters an opportunity to vote? It has been asserted by Governor Walker and Governor Stanton, and stands uncontradicted by the President or any other respectable authority, that the census and registration, which by the act of the Territorial Legislature were required to be made prior to the election, were imperfectly made in all the counties where made at all; and "that in nineteen counties out of thirty-four, there was no registry, and in fifteen counties of thirty-four, there was no census, and not a solitary vote was given, or could be given, for delegates to the convention in any one of those counties." If the people of those disfranchised counties were disposed to vote, they were positively prohibited from so doing; not by any act of theirs, but because the provisions of the law had not been executed in those counties, either through negligence of the officers or want of means to defray the expenses attendant upon the performance of their duties. And it is a fact not denied, that scarcely one tenth of the then voters of the Territory did vote at that election. I ask gentlemen, I ask Democrats from the South, if this was a fair election; if this comes up to their notions of popular sovereignty? If this is consonant with the principles enunciated at Cincinnati? and if, by this beggarly verdict, they seek, upon a mere technicality, to fix the destinies of the whole people of Kansas until 1864, and perhaps forever? Again, sir, we have the positive evidence before us, that, in many of these disfranchised counties, the people went on, under the advice of Governor Walker, and elected delegates to the convention, under the supposition that inasmuch as they had, by no act or omission of theirs, been debarred the right of voting at the regular election, their franchise was not thereby annihilated, and that the delegates of their choice would be entitled to seats in the convention; but the doors of the convention were closed against them by the sixty delegates chosen at the regular election.

But, sir, independent of this, I go a step further. No advantage can justly be taken of any voter who staid away from the polls on that occasion; and, although I think that they ought to have voted, yet, I repeat that they had a right to stay away from the polls without losing the right to pass upon the constitution when formed. They had the right to look to the Democratic party of the States to redeem their pledges everywhere made. They had the right to look to the pro-slavery party of the Territory to redeem their pledges made in the convention which nominated Ransom for Congress. They had the right to look to the President, acting for the Democratic party and reflecting its will, to redeem his repeated pledges. They had the right to look to Governor Walker, acting for the President, and under his instructions, to redeem his pledges so often and so solemnly made; and they had the right to look to the convention delegates chosen at the June election to carry into effect their public and solemn pledge that the constitution, when framed, should be submitted to the whole people for ratification or rejection. I need not go back to show that the very letter and essence of the Cincinnati platform was, that in establishing a constitution it could only be done "through the legally-expressed will of a majority of the actual residents" of the Territory. I need not go back and hunt up the speeches made, and the resolutions passed, during the canvass of 1856. I need not go back and pile, mountain high, the expressions of the public meetings and editorial articles, North and South, eulogizing the President and

Governor Walker for the high Democratic stand they had taken in urging the submission of this constitution to the people. It would occupy too much of my time. But, sir, if I were to do it, it would overwhelm gentlemen who have so suddenly and mysteriously changed front on this question. It will be sufficient for my present purpose to refer, first, to the pledge made by John Calhoun and his associates, candidates for delegates for the Lecompton convention. Here it is:

To the Democratic voters of Douglas county:

It having been stated by that Abolition newspaper, the Herald of Freedom, and by some disaffected bogus Democrats, who have got up an independent ticket, for the purpose of securing the vote of the Black Republicans, that the regular nominees of the Democratic convention were opposed to submitting the constitution to the people, we, the candidates of the Democratic party, submit the following resolutions, which were adopted by the Democratic convention which placed us in nomination, and which we fully and heartily indorse, as a complete refutation of the slanders above referred to.

JOHN CALHOUN, A. W. JONES,
W. S. WELLS, H. BUTCHER,
L. S. BOLLING, JOHN M. WALLACE,
WM. T. SPICELY, L. A. PRATHER.

LECOMPTON, Kansas Territory, June 13, 1857.

"Resolved, That we will support no man as a delegate to the constitutional convention, whose duty it will be to frame the constitution of the future State of Kansas, and to mold the political institutions under which we, as a people, are to live, unless he pledges himself fully, freely, and without reservation, to use every honorable means to submit the same to every bona fide actual citizen of Kansas, at the proper time for the vote being taken upon the adoption by the people, in order that the said constitution may be adopted or rejected by the actual settlers in this Territory, as the majority of the voters shall decide."

This man Calhoun and his associate candidates were elected on this pledge; and yet, in the face of that pledge, basely betrayed the people, and refused to submit the constitution to them, and are now here (at least some of them) urging the immediate ratification of it by Congress, and the admission of Kansas into the Union under it. Has such infamous betrayal of public trust a parallel in the political history of this country? And if it were committed in your State, sir, the guilty culprits would suffer the penalty of their treachery by summary punishment at the hands of an outraged constituency.

But again, sir, the President, in his letter of acceptance, says:

"What a conception, then, was it for Congress to apply this simple rule: that the will of the majority shall govern, to the settlement of the question of domestic slavery in the Territories!"

And in the same address, the President, after referring to the question of the time of admission of a State as unimportant, uses this emphatic language:

"This is, happily, a matter of but little practical importance. Besides, it is a judicial question which legitimately belongs to the Supreme Court of the United States, before whom it is now pending, and will, it is understood, be speedily and finally settled. To their decision, in common with all good citizens, I shall cheerfully submit, whatever this may be, though it has ever been my individual opinion that, under the Nebraska-Kansas act, the appropriate period will be when the number of actual residents in the Territory shall justify the formation of a constitution with a view to its admission as a State into the Union. But be this as it may, it is the imperative and indispensable duty of the Government of the United States to secure to every resident inhabitant the free and independent expression of his opinion by his vote. This sacred right of each individual must be preserved."

Again he says, in his instructions to Governor Walker:

"The institutions of Kansas should be established by the votes of the people of Kansas, unawed and uninterrupted by force and fraud.

"The regular Legislature of the Territory having authorized the assembling of a convention to frame a constitution, to be accepted or rejected by Congress, under the provisions of the Federal Constitution, the people of Kansas have the right to be protected in the peaceful election of delegates for such a purpose, under such authority; and the convention itself has a right to similar protection in the opportunity for tranquil and undisturbed deliberations. When such a constitution shall be submitted to the people of a Territory, they must be protected in the exercise of their right to vote for or against the instrument, and the fair expression of the popular will must not be interrupted by fraud or violence."

And again, in his letter to Professor Silliman and others, he says:

"The convention will soon assemble to perform the solemn duty of framing a constitution for themselves and their posterity; and, in the state of incipient rebellion which still exists in Kansas, it is my imperative duty to employ the troops of the United States, should this become necessary, in defending the convention against violence while framing the constitution, and in protecting the 'bona fide inhabitants' qualified to vote under the provisions of this instrument, in the free exercise of the right of suffrage, when it shall be submitted to them for approbation or rejection."

After Governor Walker had refused to accept the office, the President again tendered it to him, and urged him to accept it, which he finally did, with the perfect understanding with the President that the people, the bona fide residents, of Kansas should be protected in the formation of their domestic institutions, and in the adoption or rejection of their constitution, against both fraud and violence. But I cannot as well express the understanding between them as by quoting the following paragraph from the letter of Governor Walker to the President accepting the appointment, under date of March 30, 1857, and published in the Union while Governor Walker was yet here, before taking his leave for Kansas:

"I understand that you and your Cabinet cordially concur in the opinion expressed by me, that the actual bona fide residents of the Territory of Kansas, by a fair and regular vote, unaffected by fraud or violence, must be permitted, in adopting their State constitution, to decide for themselves what shall be their social institutions. This is the great fundamental principle of the act of Congress organizing that Territory, affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, and is in accordance with the views uniformly expressed by me throughout my public career. I contemplate a peaceful solution of this question by an appeal to the intelligence and patriotism of the people of Kansas, who should all participate freely and fully in this decision, and by a majority of whose votes the decision must be made, as the only and constitutional mode of adjustment."

"I will go, then, and endeavor to adjust these difficulties, in the full confidence, as expressed by you, that I will be sustained by all your own high authority, with the cordial cooperation of all your Cabinet."

In pursuance of these instructions and this perfect understanding, Mr. Walker accepted the office of Governor, repaired to the Territory, and, as a faithful representative of the views of the President and his entire Cabinet, entered upon the discharge of his delicate and responsible duties in the month of June; and, as the first act of his administration, issued his proclamation to the people of Kansas; in which he says:

"Is it not infinitely better that slavery should be abolished or established in Kansas, rather than that we should become slaves, and not be permitted to govern ourselves? Is the absence or existence of slavery in Kansas paramount to the great question of State sovereignty, self-government, and of the Union?"

"If patriotism, if devotion to the Constitution, and love of the Union, should not induce the minority to yield to the majority on this question, let them reflect that, in no event, can the minority successfully determine the question permanently; and in no contingency will Congress admit Kansas as a slave or as a free State, unless a majority of the people of Kansas shall first fairly and freely decide the question for themselves by a direct vote on the adoption of the constitution, excluding all fraud or violence."

"The minority, in resisting the will of the majority, may involve Kansas again in civil war; they may bring upon her reproach and obloquy, and destroy her progress and prosperity; they may keep her for years out of the Union, and, in the whirlwind of agitation, sweep away the government itself; but Kansas never can be brought into the Union, with or without slavery, except by a previous solemn decision, fully, freely, and fairly made by a majority of her people, in voting for or against the adoption of the State constitution."

The course of Governor Walker met the approbation of the President and his Cabinet—an approbation frequently enough repeated in the columns of the Union newspaper, the organ of the Administration, and known to reflect implicitly their views on all important affairs. In that organ, in that mouth-piece of the Administration, of the 7th of June last, after the delegates to the Lecompton convention had been chosen, the following editorial article appeared:

"When there is no serious dispute upon the constitution, either in the convention or among the people, the power of the delegates alone may put it in operation. But such is not the case in Kansas. The most violent struggle this country ever saw, upon the most important issue which the constitution is to determine, has been going on there for several years, between parties so evenly balanced that both claim the majority, and so hostile to one another that numerous lives have been lost in the contest. Under these circumstances there can be no such thing as a certain clearly, and without doubt, the will of the people in any way except by their own direct expression of it at the polls. A constitution not subjected to that test, no matter what it contains, will never be acknowledged by its opponents to be anything but a fraud."

"A plausible color might be given to this assertion by the argument that the members of the convention could have no motive for refusing to submit their work to their constituents, except a consciousness that the majority would condemn it. We confess that we should find some difficulty in answering this. What other motive could they have? We do most devoutly believe that, unless the constitution of Kansas should be submitted to a direct vote of the people, the unhappy controversy which has heretofore raged in that Territory will be prolonged for an indefinite time to come."

And again, sir, in the same paper of July last, the editor, speaking for the Administration, says:

"Until recently, and in a few quarters, no one has questioned the propriety of such submission, while its wisdom is too apparent to be doubted, where the will of the people is the acknowledged source of all power." * * *

"The Constitutionalist insists that Governor Walker was wrong in declaring that the constitution, if not submitted to the popular vote, would be, and ought to be, rejected by Congress; and we are asked to answer whether this is not a presumptuous interference. We answer, that it was no Federal interference with the slavery question for the Governor to express the opinion that a constitution not submitted to a popular vote would be rejected by Congress. Congress have no power to reject a constitution framed by the people of a new State for anything that is put into or left out of it, provided it be republican. But whether it does or does not express the popular sentiment, is a question of fact, which Congress must determine on evidence. The best evidence which the nature of the case admits of, is the vote of the people upon it, after it is framed. If that evidence should be withheld in the case of Kansas, with all its peculiar circumstances, the chances are a thousand to one that Congress will not be satisfied with any other evidence. The prediction of Governor Walker was therefore true, in all human probability, and his warning timely and just."

No complaint was uttered by them as to any part of his policy, until a change in their own policy began to be indicated, in the month of November last. Then it was determined that popular sovereignty was a thing of convenience; well enough to use as a mere name, in election time, but not of sufficient moment to amount to an obstruction, when a question of expediency was concerned. Instead of the momentous significance we had all (the President inclusive) professed to attach to it, it was construed to admit of the interpretation that the pitiful minority who actually voted for the constitution, by permission of Calhoun and his associates, really meant the majority of the people; while the overwhelming majority who voted against the constitution, under the equally lawful authority of the Territorial Legislature, were not the people, but only a band of rebels! Popular sovereignty might mean that the minority in Kansas should rule the majority, inasmuch as the majority could not and would not vote to suit that, under the rule of this minority, the Representatives of thirty-one States must be called upon to force into the Union, as a State, a Territory, four fifths of whose citizens have protested, in every possible form, against its admission upon the terms proposed!

Sir, I have listened with more than ordinary interest to this discussion, waiting anxiously to hear some gentleman on the other side explain away or reconcile this sudden change—this, to me, strange inconsistency in the President's present and past position; but waiting in vain. They have not attempted the task. I am sure they cannot accomplish it; but steadily keeping this point out of view, and ever evading the true question, content themselves with vague legal technicalities, or still more vague generalities.

It is true, sir, that it is no crime for men to change their opinions; but can the Administration regard a portion of us as out of the party, because we, too, have not changed in this instance, but stand firmly where we have ever stood, and where the Administration stood with us so recently?

It has been stated here, in debate, that we oppose the constitution because it has not been formed under the permissive provisions of an enabling act passed by Congress. I maintain no such ground. That Congress has power to pass such an act, and has, on many occasions, exercised this power, I admit. I believe that course to be strictly legal and proper, and perhaps the most regular; and should the Leecompton constitution be defeated, I hold myself in readiness to vote for an enabling act for the Territory of Kansas. If my recollection is not at fault, every Democratic member of both branches of Congress voted for the bill of Senator Toombs, to enable Kansas to form a constitution and come into the Union, during the first session of the last Congress, and their course was universally approved by the Democratic party North and South. It was regarded as the olive branch of peace held out by our party to the Opposition, and was an element of strength in the contest of 1856. If it was then right, I cannot see why it should be wrong now. But I care not by what authority the people of a Territory may form a constitution; it may be under an enabling act; it may be under an act of the Territorial Legislature; or it may be by the spontaneous act of the sovereign people themselves, in their primary assemblies. I care not for the mode; all I want to know is, that it is republican in form, and embodies the will of the people for whose government it is intended; then, sir, it will receive my hearty approbation, but without these essential and life-giving qualities, never!

Again: gentlemen impute our opposition to the fact that this constitution has not been submitted to the people for their approval or disapproval. I do not contend that such submission is legally essential. This is, certainly, the surest method of ascertaining the fact that it embodies the will of the people, and is the safest and most desirable rule in practice. I know, that in the early history of this Republic, States were admitted without such submission. It might still be done where the evidences were palpable that there were no controversies about it; that the people approve it. But, sir, is this the case with the Leecompton contrivance? No, sir; we have the positive evidence before us to-day, of its disapproval by four fifths of the voters of the Territory; a disapproval expressed with all the needful forms of law, and as peacefully and decorously expressed as the previous meager approval. The science of government is progressive like everything else in human affairs; and now, I believe, every State in the Union has submitted its constitution to the people for ratification, either originally or when subsequently amended.

I maintain that the constitution of Kansas has been submitted to the people and rejected, and I ask why are we here discussing the propriety of recognizing it? It is assumed that the vote taken in the manner prescribed by the constitutional convention was final, and that by that vote the constitution became the paramount law of Kansas; and this assumption is necessary to make the position of the friends of this constitution tenable for a moment. Now we have the authority of Mr. Buchanan himself for the proposition that, without an enabling act, the machinery by which the people of a Territory attempt to gain admission as a State, being in derogation of the territorial authorities, legislative and executive, has no force in law; and the acts of the people in this behalf only amount to a petition to Congress; that the modes of application are immaterial, and the forms of proceeding are like the scaffolding of a building, to be removed when the edifice is complete; and that the sanction of Congress is what gives vitality to the constitution. In the Leecompton constitution it is thrice repeated that the constitution is to be submitted to the people for "ratification or rejection." If Mr. Buchanan's theory is true, the authority of the Kansas Territorial Legislature is not yet abrogated; and as the constitution itself provides that it must be submitted for ratification or rejection, and the convention which framed it did not provide a mode whereby it should be submitted for ratification or rejection, the act of the Legislature in providing the mode is in harmony with the requirements of the Constitution itself, and has not only such force of lawful authority as existed in the Legislature, but also whatever legal sanction the very essence of the Constitution itself could give. The right to petition includes the right to remonstrate; and if Congress is in duty bound to regard the petition of the voters on the 21st of December, under how much greater obligation are they placed to regard the remonstrance of those who voted on the 4th of January? Why, sir, not only does this very constitution assert the inherent right of the people to change their constitutions at will, and whenever they please, but many of you echo this doctrine. If this right inheres in the people, whether in a State or Territory, it includes the right to abrogate; and as the people are sovereign, their act is law, under whatever forms it is done. If, then, I grant your proposition, that this constitution became the law paramount of Kansas in December last, it ceased to be so in January. So much for the technical legal sophistries by which the friends of this constitution attempt to prop its rottenness, and give consistency to its tottering foundations.

But the President says in his annual message:

"The convention were not bound by its terms [the terms of the Nebraska-Kansas bill] to submit any other portion of that instrument [the constitution] to an election, except that which relates to the 'domestic institution' of slavery."

This is a remarkable assumption. What gave rise to the provision in the Kansas-Nebraska act "that the people should be left free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way?" Why, Congress had, from time to time, legislated on the subject of domestic slavery, but had never assumed the authority to legislate upon any other of the domestic institutions of the States or Territories. Hence Congress ignored the right it had before assumed to legislate on that institution, and left it on the same footing with all other domestic institutions of the States and Territories, to be controlled, like them, by the people whom they directly concerned; and I think it would be difficult, indeed, to make any well-informed person give it a different construction. Again the President says:

"Domestic institutions are limited to the family. The relation between master and slave, and a few others, are 'domestic institutions,' and are entirely distinct from institutions of a political character. Reside, there was no question then before Congress, nor indeed has there since been any serious question before the people of Kansas or the country, except that which relates to the 'domestic institution' of slavery."

This assumption is still more novel and remarkable. If domestic institutions are limited to "the relation of master and slave, and a few others," the "few others" may be as important to the people as "the relation of master and slave," and they, by the President's own showing, are included in the terms of the act, and should have been submitted to the people; and why, let me ask, not submit the few others, as well as that one? Until this ingenious discovery of the President, I venture the assertion that nobody dreamed of giving to the phrase "domestic institutions," as used in the Kansas-Nebraska act, a narrower scope than that of embracing all institutions belonging to a Territory or a State, as contradistinguished from those placed under the control of Congress by the Federal Constitution.

I must insist that the President is mistaken when he says there was no question before Congress, when the Kansas-Nebraska bill passed, but that of slavery. It is true that was the engrossing and exciting question; but it will not do to say that Congress had no other object in view, when they said the people should be left free "to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way," and that they intended to concede to them the power to form and regulate slavery, and nothing else. Sir, the terms used are too broad and comprehensive for that. No man can mistake what are domestic institutions as applied to a State or Territory. Banks, revenue laws, courts of judicature, and, in fine, everything which is local to the State or Territory, and not national, is embraced under the term "domestic institutions." But suppose the position of the President to be true, that "domestic institutions" has reference to slavery alone, and that by the terms of the Kansas-Nebraska bill the convention were not bound to submit any other portion of the constitution but that in reference to slavery to an election of the people: has even that question been fairly submitted to a vote of the people of Kansas? This is an important inquiry. The President says it was "clearly and distinctly presented to the people at the election held on the 21st of December last, by virtue of the schedule to the Leecompton constitution." I think it was not. This schedule, in defining the mode of submission, says, "the ballots cast at said election shall be indorsed 'constitution with slavery,' or 'constitution without slavery.'" Hence, for the privilege of voting on this single question, the voter was compelled to vote for the constitution, whether he approved it or not. Yes, sir, he was bound to swallow it all, whether it was good or bad, just or unjust, in his estimation, or be excluded from the privilege of taking any part in the settlement of the question of slavery. This is the "clear and distinct" manner in which, as the President assures us, the question of slavery has been presented to the people of Kansas. This is the President's mode of "leaving the people perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way." Is this carrying out in good faith the pledge of the President "that when such a constitution shall be submitted to the people, they must be protected in the exercise of their right to vote for or against that instrument, and the fair expression of the popular will must not be interrupted by fraud or violence?" I think not. It may come up to the President's present views of justice and fairness, but will, I opine, fall far short of satisfying independent freemen. The President was doubly pledged to maintain, in letter and spirit, the Kansas-Nebraska act; pledged voluntarily to the Democratic party, and the whole American people, by his ex-for their ratification, with the full belief that such submission was the just and proper mode of subduing this spirit of rebellion, and restoring peace to the country; but he now informs us that the admission of Kansas without a submission of the constitution to the people for their ratification or rejection would "restore peace and quiet to the whole country." I confess my inability to reconcile and harmonize these views of the President. If a submission of the whole constitution to the people in June last would have subdued this rebellion, why is it that the admission of Kansas now, without such submission, will restore peace and quiet, I cannot comprehend; and would be thankful to some friend of the Lecompton constitution on this floor to inform me.

Again, sir, if it be true that a large portion of the people of Kansas are in a state of rebellion against the government, are they fit subjects to be trusted with the high and responsible privileges of State sovereignty? Is it not a powerful argument against their admission until they shall become good and loyal citizens, and can truly appreciate their obligations to the constitution and the laws? And, sir, is it not a novel and unsafe mode of quelling this rebellious spirit on the part of any portion of our people? The people of Utah are known to be in open rebellion against the authority and laws of the United States. Would it not, sir, be a dangerous expedient, to say the least of it, to admit Utah into the Union for the purpose of quelling that rebellion? The President does not recommend this remedy in that case; then why should it be adopted in the case of Kansas?

Sir, I cannot pursue this argument further; the whole of this transaction against which I protest has fraud! written upon it from the beginning to the present time. Here, sir, is John Calhoun, the immaculate president of the Lecompton convention, in this city, a fugitive from justice, with the returns of the election for State officers and Senators and Representative of Kansas in his pocket, a sealed book—the result unknown—until within a few days past; held back, in case of necessity, to "sugar-coat" the Lecompton contrivance that it may be the more readily swallowed by some fastidious gentlemen on this floor; or, perhaps, until further returns should be exhumed from his prolific "candle-box" under the wood-pile.

Sir, the corpse of the Topeka constitution has been exhumed, and made to stand before us in its most hideous and ghastly form; for what purpose, I cannot conceive, unless it be to frighten us into the support of the Lecompton fraud. What connection can it have with the present question? The Democracy of the North opposed the Topeka constitution as one man, because it was irregular and revolutionary—because it was the work of a faction, and not of the people, and because it did not embody their will. These were the causes which made that instrument so odious that the Democratic Senate would not dignify it with a reading in that body. Sir, these same reasons apply with remarkable force against the Lecompton constitution. Topeka is dead; its friends and originators are dead; no sane man, even in Kansas, dreams of galvanizing the corpse; let it sleep in an unhonored grave; and let us hope that the Lecompton fraud may soon follow its predecessor to the same tomb of infamy and disgrace, where it shall know no waking.

Yes, sir, the northern Democracy opposed Topeka from its incipency, for the reasons I have already assigned, notwithstanding it forever prohibited slavery; and I ask southern gentlemen if this is not a complete vindication of northern Democrats against the charge so often made against them of opposition to Lecompton, solely on account of the slavery clause?

My colleague, [Mr. ENGLISH,] in his remarks the other day, expressed a hope that some compromise might be agreed upon, so as to make this proposition of admitting Kansas acceptable to us all, and thereby restore harmony in our party, and protect its honor and integrity. I know not what was the character of the compromise my colleague had in his mind when he spoke; I know of no form which the Lecompton contrivance can assume, in which it will be acceptable to me, unless it shall be returned to the people of Kansas and approved by a majority of their votes at a fair election, or evidence of a conclusive character produced to me that it embodies their will.

In this opposition I have the support of a vast majority of my own constituents; and I have not so far lost sight of the true doctrine of popular sovereignty as to do, or contemplate doing, aught contrary to their will. The Democratic convention that assembled at Indianapolis on the 8th of January last have declared against it. The Democratic mass convention that assembled at the same place on the 23d of February repudiated it; and last of all, my own soul and conscience rebel at this flagitious outrage against all I have ever learned to regard as most sacred and indefeasible in the great principles that lie at the foundation of human rights and political prosperity.

And now, sir, let me turn to my Democratic friends of the South—for I will still call you Democrats, notwithstanding your threatened repudiation of that nationality which has been our bond of union, and the chief element of our strength—and let me ask what you expect to gain, if you should succeed in forcing upon the people of Kansas, in the face of the solemn protest of four fifths of their number, this monstrous abortion of a constitution, polluted with fraud from its inception to the last syllable of its disgraceful history? Some of you admit that slavery cannot be permanently planted there. You say that although this constitution recognizes slavery, the people have the right to change it and prohibit slavery, and that they will so change it. If, then, you are sincere, and your declarations are true, I ask what do you win? Nothing but an empty victory, a gratification for the hour. Have you coolly calculated the cost of that victory? If not, let me implore you, in the name of the Democratic party of the North, to pause; to weigh well the consequences that may result from the step. You will "crush out," for the time being, at least, the national Democracy of the North, your stay and dependence in every hour of trial. You will "crush out" your friends who have stood by you with armor on in the darkest periods of your troubles, breasting and beating back the representatives of northern fanaticism that have assailed your institutions, to the end that you might, under the Constitution and laws, enjoy in peace and unmolested your rights of property. Yes, sir, you will do more. You will strike down a great principle, the principle which underlies the whole system of free government, and which has hitherto been your shield against all aggressors—the right of the people of every State and section, by a majority of their own number, to govern themselves; to make their own laws and mold their own domestic institutions without congressional intervention. You will fill this Hall with Republicans, your common enemy, to whose tender mercies you are about so willingly to consign yourselves. If such shall be the result, as I sincerely believe it will, your momentary boast of victory will turn to bitterness on your lips. When that hour shall come, as come it must, if you persist in your suicidal policy, you cannot, and must not, reproach your true and tried friends of the North with bringing this calamity upon you. You must not say that you were not forewarned of the result inevitably consequent upon your own act. Let me implore you to look beyond the hour of barren and temporary triumph, before you take the irretrievable step you contemplate.

A great portion of the speeches of gentlemen who have advocated the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution consists of denunciation of the Republican party. I have as little regard for the principles advocated, in the main, by that party, as any gentleman on this floor. I have fought that party as long, if not as ably, and have encountered as full a measure of their opposition, as any gentleman here. But let me warn gentlemen that they cannot answer before the country for the commission of a great wrong, for the violation of a great principle—a principle dearer to the hearts of the Democracy of the country than all others—by indulgence in the abuse and denunciation of the Republican party, the Know Nothing party, or any other party. The discriminating mind of the people will well understand the attempted evasion. They will well understand that denunciation of another party for their many wrongs and sins can constitute no valid justification for the violation of a great principle of our own party. Do not deceive yourselves, gentlemen, with such delusions.

But, Mr. Chairman, those of us who differ with the President on this single measure of his Administration are charged with acting with the Republican party; in fact, that we have gone over to that party, and are no longer to be regarded as within the pale of the Democratic organization. Such charges are of daily occurrence, and are sometimes fulminated by gentlemen recently converted to the faith they presume to expound, and whose minds the pure light of Democracy has hardly had time to purge of their former errors. Yes, sir, no paper can publish an article, no citizen can talk, no member here from the North can speak against this attempted fraud, without being charged from certain quarters with having gone over to the Republican party, and branded as being, to all intents, a "Black Republican." What sanction does truth afford to this bold and shameless assumption? What, sir, were the principles advocated by the two parties in the contest of 1856 on the slavery question? There is no way of determining this question so accurately as by a reference to their respective platforms. The platform established by the Democratic party at Cincinnati, in June, 1856, in the convention which nominated Mr. Buchanan, on the subject of slavery and the Kansas issue, is in these words:

"Resolved, That we recognize the right of the people of all the Territories, including Kansas and Nebraska, acting through the legally and fairly expressed will of a majority of actual residents, and, whenever the number of their inhabitants justifies it, to form a constitution, with or without domestic slavery, and be admitted into the Union upon terms of perfect equality with the other States."

This expresses, in its fullest and broadest sense, the doctrine of the right of the people of Kansas, "acting through the legally and fairly expressed will of the majority of actual residents" to form a constitution, and be admitted into the fraternity of States, and negatives the right of congressional intervention. Now, sir, let us turn to the platform of principles adopted by the Republican party in the convention which assembled at Philadelphia, on the question of slavery. Here it is:

"Resolved, That the Constitution confers upon Congress sovereign power over the Territories of the United States for their government; and that, in the exercise of this power, it is both the right and duty of Congress to prohibit in the Territories those twin relics of barbarism, polygamy and slavery."

Thus the issue was fairly made up between the parties, the Democratic party taking the high conservative ground of non-intervention by Congress with the subject of slavery in the States and Territories, and leaving the same to be settled by the people for themselves, through the fairly and legally expressed will of a majority of the actual residents; and that, as they should settle it, so thus should they be admitted into the Union. The platform was not only freely accepted by Mr. Buchanan, as our standard-bearer, but, in his letter of acceptance, he says:

"The recent legislation by Congress respecting domestic slavery, derived, as it has been, from the original and pure fountain of legislative political power, the will of the majority, promises, ere long, to allay the dangerous excitement."

Not only did Mr. Buchanan, but the Democratic party, North, South, East, and West, accept and indorse that platform as the main plank in their party creed. We fought the Republicans, and conquered, on the principles thus enunciated and thus accepted, and on the issue thus presented; and because we still fight under the same banner, sustained in our course of rectitude by the same principle, are we to be stigmatized as renegades, Black Republicans, and deserters from the Democratic faith?

The platform of the Republican party, which I have presented, is in palpable conflict with that of the Democratic party. It justifies and counsels direct intervention of Congress with the institution of slavery; and, to-day, it meets my unqualified disapprobation and hostility, as it ever did. I condemn it in theory, in principle, and in practice. I should regard its enforcement as unwise, inexpedient, and dangerous to the peace of the country, and to the integrity of the Union of these States. Then, sir, if I stand where I have always stood, in an attitude of open hostility to the avowed principles of the Republican party, who shall dare accuse me of deserting the Democratic faith for the Republican faith? Does the accusation come with a good grace from those who have so far conceded to the Republican doctrine as to attempt to stifle the voice of the majority, and who are intervening to force upon them a constitution against their "legally and fairly expressed will?" Party names are but names that may be changed as interest or fancy may dictate, but principles are unchangeable; they give to parties all their vigor and virtue, and without them names are worthless. Desert your principles if you will, and retain your name; it will not avail you. It will not be the first time that the sacred name of Democracy has been assumed by its enemies; but public opinion has stripped the maskers of their disguise, and covered them with merited obloquy. What though the Republican party should see proper to abandon their platform upon which they have suffered defeat and overthrow in the canvass of 1856, as I sincerely trust they have; it is their business, not mine. If the Republican members on this floor, in the discharge of their high duties as Representatives of their own constituents, see proper to abandon their former doctrines of congressional intervention in the domestic affairs of the people of the Territories, and to vote as I vote, and thus sustain my long-cherished principles of non-intervention and popular sovereignty, it is their right to do so. They are answerable to their constituents, as I am to mine. I shall not complain of their action, nor will I desert my principles because former friends desert them, nor because former enemies come to their support.

But, sir, it is said that we are to be read out of the Democratic party. Who is to be the executioner? I want to see his authority, his warrant. I want to know from what tribunal it issues, and whose sign manual it bears. We have a right to demand of him who attempts to exercise this omnipotent power to produce a clear, untarnished, and consistent political record. I protest against gentlemen who failed to vote for, or voted against the fugitive slave law; who voted for the Wilmot proviso in all its forms; who voted to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia; who failed to vote for the Kansas-Nebraska bill; who have advocated the abolition of the inter slave trade; who have favored the removal of this Capitol to free territory; and who opposed the last Administration from the first month of its existence to its close; who followed Mr. Van Buren in his apostasy to the Democratic party—I repeat, sir, I protest against the exercise of this omnipotent authority and establishment of political tests for me, by gentlemen of this type, either in Congress or out of it.

Certainly, the President will not assume this delicate and responsible function, so long as we firmly and persistently advocate the very principles that brought him into power, and which are found as clearly recognized in his inaugural address, and in his instructions to Governor Walker, as in the Cincinnati platform. If any gentleman here is clothed with any such power, let him avow it. Sir, such threats can have no influence upon my action here. My life has been spent in the service of the Democratic cause. I have been true to its principles, rejoiced in its successes, and mourned in its defeats. I have followed its flag through evil as well as good report; and I intend to stand by its time-honored principles, let what may come. I will not change at the behest of another. If you shall attempt to ostracize me, I will hurl defiance in your teeth. The pure fountain of political power is in the people. To them I will appeal for the rectitude of my purpose, the fidelity of my action. There is a majesty in their voice that will make it heard; and to their fiat the most censorious and dictatorial are constrained to bow.

Sir, this process of reading gentlemen out of the party is no trifling matter. Are you prepared to read out of the party such men as Douglas, Walker, Stanton, Bancroft, twenty or thirty gentlemen on this floor, and the rank and file of the party in every northern State? Are you strong enough to stand alone? Strike down the national Democracy of the North, and there will be no national Democracy. There will be a party at the South, or rather parties; and there will be parties at the North. There will be Democrats; national Democrats at the South, and national Democrats at the North; but there will be no national Democratic party. You, gentlemen of the South, think you are striking at the leaders, but your blows will fall upon the masses. You may scatter and defeat our majorities, but they will rally again. Think you they will come together animated by the same generous enthusiasm with which they have heretofore espoused your cause? Do you believe the idle tale of those who would persuade you that because the North stood by you when you were in the right; they will, with equal zeal, defend you in the wrong? Believe me, you do injustice equally to the intelligence and to the conscience of the North.

Sir, I repeat, I respect the President. I know of no other policy of his Administration upon which I shall differ with him. It may be there will arise other occasions of difference, but I am not now aware of any. If there should be such an occasion during my service here, I shall be frank, open, manly, in that difference. If the time has come, that we must think as the President thinks, and act as the President may dictate, the necessity for a Congress has ceased. We had better surrender, at once, all power into the hands of the Executive, and talk no more of coming fresh from the people to reflect their will. Is it so, that if the President changes we must change, and quickly, too, or come under the ban of his displeasure? Away with such a doctrine. I do not subscribe to it; I repudiate it. It wars with the spirit and genius of our form of free government; it is something more than party discipline, it is political despotism; and if tolerated, must inevitably result in a central oligarchy, rob the people and the States of their rights under our federative system, and the Representative of his honor and his manhood. The President may, nay, it is his duty, under the Constitution, to advise me; but when I permit him to command me, I change masters and cease to be a Representative of the people.

But, sir, some of us seem to forget that the people are the masters of us all, both Executive and Representatives. Suppose that, pending the presidential canvass of 1856, Kansas had stood in the same attitude she does to-day, asking admission into the Union under a constitution spurned by four fifths of her people at a fair and legal election, and Mr. Buchanan had avowed his intention, if elected, to press her unconditional admission into the Union: what would have been the result? Would he have been your President to-day? Would he have received the vote of a single northern State? Would our party have had the ascendancy on this floor? No, sir; none of it. Then, why, after we have received the popular approbation; after we have been snugly ensconced in power in all Departments of the Government; why presume to disappoint the just expectations of those who placed us here, and do what we dared not do before the election; and which, if you had then done, would have resulted in our certain defeat and overthrow? Others may; I cannot, I will not do it.

Suppose I should support the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, and on my return to my constituents, an old and tried friend should approach me thus: "Did you vote for the Lecompton constitution?" "Yes, sir." "Was that constitution approved by a majority of the legal voters of Kansas?" "No, sir; four fifths of the legal voters voted against it." "Is that popular sovereignty, on the strength of which I voted for you, and on which you were elected to Congress?" "No, sir, it is not; but the President changed his position on that question. You know I am a Democrat, and I was compelled to change my opinions, stultify myself, and misrepresent you, in order to sustain the President." Sir, would this be a valid excuse for my treachery? Would this justify my conduct before an honest and intelligent constituency? Never! and I should be totally unworthy a seat in this Hall, if I were capable of meditating such an act of perfidy.

Again, sir, if this Lecompton constitution is to be made the test of orthodoxy in the Democratic faith, and the patronage of the Government is to be bestowed accordingly—and I do not know how this is; I have not stopped to inquire; I do not care to know, for it would not change my course in the least degree. But there are other questions of grave and commanding importance before Congress, some of which involve high questions of international law; others involve questions of constitutional power; and others questions of expediency and policy; all of which have been referred to by the President in his message, and on which he has fully committed himself. I allude to the Paulding and Walker affair, the construction of a railroad to the Pacific ocean, the system of banking and paper currency, the Utah troubles, and the tariff question. In looking around me, sir, I see many Democrats from the North and the South, who differ widely and radically on all those questions, not only among themselves, but with the President; and I find these dissentients supported sometimes, and sometimes opposed, by Know Nothings and Republicans. Differences on these important measures from the views of the President and with each other seem to be tolerated, as they should be; and no test of Democracy seems to be required in regard to them. Then why, Mr. Chairman, should the Lecompton constitution be made a test of party faith, and the patronage of the Government, if such be the intention of the Executive, bestowed accordingly? The country will ask this question in due time, and exact a categorical answer.

It is contended by the President, and a few of his friends here, that the people have a right to make and unmake constitutions at pleasure, and that although the Lecompton constitution provides expressly that it cannot be changed until 1864, it can be done at any time by the people, under this general right of making and unmaking constitutions. Now, sir, it is clear to me that there are but two modes of changing constitutions. One is by and through the means pointed out in the Constitution itself; this is the lawful, legal mode; by this process the constitution of Kansas cannot be changed until 1864, and then only by a vote of two thirds of the Legislature. It is likely that even then, either party can command two thirds of the Legislature to initiate steps to change that constitution? The other mode of changing a constitution is by revolution. That revolution may be bloodless—peaceful; nevertheless, being in violation of the fundamental law, it is a revolution. These, sir, are the only modes of changing a constitution, and any declaration by Congress of the right of the people of Kansas to change their constitution after being admitted into the Union is a nullity.

Mr. DEAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit a few remarks which have been very hastily prepared. Such is the aggressive nature of slavery that it was the early policy of our Government to confine it within mates and bounds. Confessed by correct jurists of every age to be a creature of positive municipal law, in defiance of the laws of nature, and of the laws of God, it was the deliberate judgment of the venerated sires of our revolutionary history that it should sustain its existence—if existence it should have—by the statute laws of the independent States. While this policy was pursued, the people of the non-slaveholding States washed their hands in innocence of this (to them) crime against the laws of God, and the rights of man. Hedged in by State sovereignty, it was as clearly beyond the jurisdiction of the other States as though it were a foreign government in some island of the sea. When the man was transformed into a chattel, a brute, a thing, by the law of force, or what is its equivalent—a statute law embodying the power of a sovereign State, he could do no less than submit to the prisoner's chain, unless by a successful revolution he emancipated himself. But when he passed the barriers of that law, then by the higher law of nature and of God his chains of servitude fell off and he walked the earth a freeman. I understand this to have been the settled doctrine of the country until a very recent period.

In the instrument which confederated the thirteen States, and made them an empire of sovereigns, a single clause was admitted providing for the rendition of persons who should, by flight, defraud others of labor or service which was their rightful due. Beyond this single point, tortured of late into an implied power in one man to claim another as a slave upon soil foreign to his State, the Constitution is silent, and guiltless of the barbarous and unchristian doctrine that one man can rightfully chattelize another. Like the several free-State sovereignties, it stood, with the Declaration of Independence, the embodiment of the doctrine of universal freedom, the practical expounder of the great, primal, God-given, "self-evident truth that all men were created free and equal," having an impartial endowment of rights. These were asserted to be the glorious trinity—life, liberty, and the pursuit of that happiness which is the desire of all.

Such, sir, from the nature of those instruments, and from contemporaneous testimony, I understand to be the great principles which underlie our system of government. The people of my State, sir, hold those views to-day. Taught them by their revolutionary sires, and by that written history of the country with which almost every youth among us is as familiar as is any gentleman upon this floor, they cherish them, and will abide by them. Anti-slavery they are; anti-slavery they glory in being; unbought by the offers of political sycophants; unsullied by the seductions of cotton and commerce, and the wealth which they impart; uninfluenced by the crazy threats of fratricidal fanatics who proclaim disunion, or unsubdued by any fear.

Sir, my constituents and the State which I have the pride of representing in part, ask nothing more of their sister sovereignties than that they abide by the terms of the original compact. Their history is a life-long pledge of their fealty to it. But with the crazy scheme of the slavery-extendors of this day they have no sympathy, and to the doctrine they will grant no quarter. They have from time to time acquiesced in those compromise measures which have been adopted, with the expectation that each one was to be the last. When the black tide of slavery has thrown another, and still another surge far up upon the free shore of our confederated dominion, they have protested against the sacrilege in language becoming to freemen, and demanded a cessation of these attacks. But when the leading spirits of the nation have, through expediency, proposed a mutual yielding, in order to give a common repose, the citizens of my State have been the first to acquiesce, while at the same time they changed not, in a single iota, their views of the nature of this evil, or its true municipal position in this country. No single step has been taken in this aggressive march of slavery towards a national existence, or the founding of an empire whose base should be the bowed necks and crushed souls of men whom God made a portion of the human brotherhood, which has not met the stern, opposing judgment and conscience of my constituents. Loving freedom at the first, they broke every manacle within the State. Before you can force them into an acknowledgment of its existence there, you must turn the army of a Xerxes upon them, and crush the wall of living hearts, which, flying from the cottages and palaces within its borders, will close up in solid column for the defense of their sovereign rights. Sir, man-stealing is a crime of magnitude in our State. Even the making of a claim to the possession of another human body, containing a living soul, subjects the claimant to arrest and trial under our statute. Such is the love of liberty and the sense of equal justice in the bosoms of our people. I esteem it one of the proudest acts of my life, that by the suffrages of my own townsmen I was enabled, by my vote in the Legislature, to give that spirit vitality in a statute law; and that, too, because, in common with my fellow-citizens, I believe that the rights of all men are the gift of God, and the claims of property are not to be mentioned in the same breath.

Sir, when the convention which framed our Federal Constitution had under advisement that portion of the report of the committee of detail which recommended a tax upon the importation of certain persons, (meaning slaves,) one of the brightest lights of our State—whose legal power was second to none in the country—of whose name and fame every son of Connecticut is proud, arose in his place in opposition to the measure, simply upon the ground "that it implied they were property." Not that it was asserted in the provision, but simply that it might thereafter be implied. Who, sir, rises up to convict the pure-hearted, clear-headed Roger Sherman, in these utterances of the sentiments of the people of our State, so long ago as 1787? When, in the furtherance of the mad schemes of slavery propagandists, in 1814, the broad acres of the Louisiana purchase were devoted to chattel servitude, and when, in 1819, the peninsula of Florida was added as a slave State to our confederation, the people of Connecticut stood in opposition. And in the exciting scenes which convulsed the country, over the admission of Missouri as a slave State, and which finally culminated in what was supposed to be a permanent barrier to the extension of slavery northward, the citizens of my State, were not second in their hostility to this scheme for the extension of the slave system, even though a hunker portion of their Representatives upon this floor betrayed their principles. When slavery rested temporarily from "its goings to and fro" in the country, seeking an avenue for extension, and assailed the sacred right of petition in these Halls, from 1835 to 1838, my constituents were no indifferent spectators of that great struggle. And when the same power, under the "gag resolutions" brought "the venerable sage of Quincy" to the bar of this House for the presentation of a petition, the slumbering spirit of even our staid conservatives was aroused.

In 1844 you opened up the propagandist scheme afresh; and expended millions of the money of the people to take "The Lone Star Republic" into the bosom of the Confederacy; providing that from this prolific political womb should be born, at times suitable for the future emergencies which might arise in the slavery extending scheme, four slaveholding sovereignties. Did Connecticut tamely and silently acquiesce in this wholesale barter of those principles enunciated by Roger Sherman and his compeers of the constitutional convention? She has a history upon that transaction, and it is written.

In 1850 you enacted a man-hunting, heaven-defying law, which abrogated the Divine precept "to feed the hungry, clothe the naked, and shelter the oppressed;" turned every acre of our land into a Federal hunting-ground for men; made our citizens blood hounds by law to reclaim captives under the pains and penalties of a forfeiture of our hard-earned property and imprisonment in a felon's cell. Did we bow and cringe and swear allegiance in the loss of our principles and manhood? Sir, you cannot get a corporal's guard in the whole State to enforce the edict, not even of that so-called Democratic conservative portion of our citizens, who swear by James Buchanan and the Lecompton constitution, the Federal patronage of course included. You but stirred up our yeomanry to the contemplation of how they could best preserve their sovereignty as a State, and their rights as individuals, against the aggressions of that slavery propagandism which then, as it has since, held complete control over the general Administration. The action of the two great national conventions, ignoring all discussion of a question which involved our dearest rights, and promising, by all the force of party machinery, "to crush out" discussion, buried in a sepulcher too deep for the ghost of a chance of resurrection, the old Whig party in the State, and passed the Democratic party, its opponent, through the damp vaults leading to its final sepulcher—hanging a dark and murky pall over its prospects of ever becoming a victorious political organization there, unless by a division of the anti-slavery forces upon local questions. The repeal of the Missouri restriction—the prolific dam of this whole brood of villainies against the people of Kansas, from Atchison's invasion to the consummation of the scheme in the presentation of the pro-slavery Lecompton instrument—has decimated the already broken ranks of the Administration party in the State. The Dred Scott decision of the supreme judicial bench of the country has shown them that even the sanctity of our highest judicial seats has been invaded by this rabid spirit of slavery extension, and that the robe of the judge is no proof against the partisan madness of the day.

Sir, the people of Connecticut are not slaves, nor the sons of slaves. They are not vassals of the South, nor the children of vassals. They are as a body, legitimate in descent from the pilgrims of Plymouth, and glory in their puritanic character and ancestry. Their early laws recognized, and were based upon, those Divine precepts which they believed and practiced. Their code of statutory obligations, from the founding of their first colony down to the present time, will gather fresh luster by a comparison with the contemporaneous code of any other colony or country. She will blush for the weakness of a son of hers who, in the presence of the nation's Representatives, asserts as fact what has no foundation in her legal history, but was the jeer of the infidel in consequence of her puritanic character. I allude, sir, to that remarkable feature in the speech of my colleague from the fourth district, [Mr. Bishop,] asserting the former existence of a fabulous law, and passing in review the statutes of our State, against the violations of the moral law, to excite the jeers and laughter of Representatives whom it would not injure to be brought under their restraining influence. Sir, we have a "Sabbath law," a "gambling law," a law against "profanity," and a Connecticut "liquor law," with their pains and penalties. The atmosphere of this corrupt Federal city would be much purer if those laws were a portion of the code of this District, and had Connecticut men to enforce them. We have also a law against "bearing false witness," or slander; and I much mistake the spirit of the citizens of my colleague's district, if they do not enter up the judgment of an overwhelming majority against him in the election which is to come.

Sir, a majority of the citizens of my State occupy that happy social position which is a medium between a wealthy aristocracy on the one hand, and a poverty, which is generally wedded to ignorance, upon the other. Our farmers cultivate their limited acres; our artisans and mechanics, by their intelligence and skill, always find employment at a remunerative compensation, unless the fountain of labor dries up; our merchants are second to none in the commerce chambers of the country; and our "school-masters are always abroad." There are but few who do not acquire a sufficiency of wealth to educate their sons and daughters for any walk of life which they select, and to grant them sufficient assistance with which to commence their career. The result is, they are virtuous; for, as a general rule, the idlers are the vicious ones of a community. They are intelligent, and thoroughly posted in all the principles, history, and present operations of our Government. They are political thinkers from their youth. What passes in these Halls, what is spoken in debate here, is read in their daily papers, and commented upon at their evening firesides. With such a people for a constituency—acknowledging the dignity and rights of labor, scorning the coarse taunts uttered against them, and loathing the system which holds a fellow-laborer in the most abject vassalage, as a chattel, a thing, harling back in your teeth the pronunciamiento which seeks to debase and degrade them—I do not wonder that the small remnant of your slavery-extending party in Connecticut lifts up its prayer that you cease the utterance of such comparisons and such slanders, for its very existence sake.

I counsel no such silence. No party good, no party existence, shall ever humiliate me enough to ask the South, or any section or party, to play the hypocrite in order to sustain my political life. If the spirit of aristocracy is in the South; if, in its narrow judgment, the great laboring class of the North is yoked with the abject servitude of the slaves of the South, to form "the mud-sills" of our political edifice, out with it, then, with all that openness of character with which you are accredited! You will soon find these despised "mud-sills" of the North rising up your peers, and towering above you in the future history of this Government, even now being regenerated by their awakening.

Sir, my colleague may speak for the party when he beseeches his southern allies to believe what they please, but to keep their counsel from the northern public ear. I speak for the people when I ask you to make a clean breast of your views and designs. As reasoners, if they cannot answer your sophistries; as politicians, if they cannot go as deep as the profoundest of you in the science of government; as readers of our own history, if they cannot rebut and overthrow your assumptions concerning the nature and extent of the powers of our federative Government; then, sir, they will, in the spirit of a true manhood, take their seats at your feet as pupils. But, sir, you can never blot out their hatred to slavery, or seduce them into crediting its morality and beneficence as a system. Born upon free soil; inhaling a free air; educated in free schools, and taught a free gospel, it is beyond any earthly power to make them love the system of a forced servitude, much more submit to the dietum of its masters. If the working-men of Connecticut were the only slaves in this Confederacy, it would be annihilated in a few short hours by a revolution which would be decisive and final.

Sir, it is true that we have a term of political reproach in use among us which is significant, and utters its own meaning when pronounced. A

"dough-face" is peculiar to northern latitudes. The race has flourished somewhat extensively in the past, but at present "is growing small by degrees and beautifully less." Our citizens may entertain great respect for a man born upon a southern plantation and reared amid the influences of the chattel system, taught in infancy, and strengthened in his rising manhood, in the belief that it is the best social system for all communities; taught to demand even its acknowledgment as an equal to a free system. I say our people may entertain a great respect for such a man, but none at all for his principles upon that question. But they have small respect, and instinctively inquire for a cause, when a son of their State, or of the North, becomes plastic, and susceptible of being molded into the image and likeness of a southern partisan chattel in the political market. Such seem to take the name of "dough-face," as you would take an epidemic disease, that is—"in the natural way." I do not deny but some honest men, who honestly entertain opinions favorable to the expansion of the slave system—who see in "King Cotton" the pride and glory, as well as the savior of their country, may have this badge applied to them unjustly. But it is their misfortune, and they must wait until the final judgment exposes their motives, when they will certainly be righted. It is a compound word of such significance in its application, that it will be hard to crowd it out of the northern political vocabulary while a single case of applicability remains.

My colleague admits that the Democracy of Connecticut "accord to the South the right to move into the Territories of the United States with their property, whenever and wherever they please, so long as they are Territories," (I quote his language,) and then coolly asserts, in the face of history, that this was one of "the compromises of the Constitution!" Sir, he has studied that instrument, and the history of the convention which framed it, to little purpose if he has not yet learned that the claimed rights, nay, more, the legal existence of slavery under that Constitution, were denied a place in the instrument. He would have been correct had he stated that it was one of the late compromises of the boasted national Democratic party. He may be pardoned if, like many of his political friends, he esteems the pro-slavery Democratic platform his own and his party's constitution. But the people of Connecticut do not accord that right either by an interpolation of our national charter, or at the dictum of party leaders.

Sir, the Democratic party of my State has furnished its full quota of dough-faces to aid this system of slave propaganda. In times of high party excitement over local questions, they have thrown a crop of this political seed to the surface; but almost invariably it has been with the protestations of opposition to slavery extension rolling like oil from their tongues. When the repeal of the Missouri restriction was consummated, many of its prominent men were staggered, and a majority of its representation upon this floor recorded their votes against it; but they soon succumbed to southern dictation, and took their old places in the ranks. But they have persistently deceived their people in relation to their true position upon this question. Their political pettifoggers, in the last presidential election, made flaming appeals to the Democracy to sustain "Buchanan, Breckinridge, and Free Kansas," under the workings of this new light of the party, named "popular sovereignty." They coolly argued that under the new system, slavery had met its last foe, had occupied its last inch of virgin soil in this country, and that the national Democracy had effectually checked its advancing tide. That was the local doctrine fitted for the latitude of Connecticut, and the campaign in which it was used. Now that "Buchanan, Breckinridge, and Free Kansas" has culminated in "Lecompton," and in forcing the system of slavery upon a people contrary to their will, my colleague, speaking for the party which he represents, coolly proclaims that "they concede the right to the South to move into the Territories of the United States with their property, (i. e. slaves,) whenever and wherever they please, so long as they are Territories," but most pitifully begs, as a boon in return, that the South shall not institute unhealthy comparisons between their chattel slaves and the free mechanics of the North, to prove that they occupy the same social and relative position in political society. Further than this, he entreats them to cease attempting to prove that it is a Divine system, for it really hurts the feelings of the party in Connecticut.

The Democratic press of my State is completely under the control of this pro-slavery Administration, without a single exception of which I am aware. Every publisher or editor has one of the tears of the national udder between his lips, and, with his mouth full of the golden milk of executive patronage, pitifully moans the request to his southern brethren, to suppress the common sentiment held between them for the party's sake. The proposition of my colleague for the extinction of slavery in the Territory of Kansas, by the purchase of the slaves taken there under this Democratic doctrine, is perfectly consistent with those commerce principles which admit the right of traffic in human flesh, and which characterize the hunker portion of that party. It is the utterance of a doctrine, and the recommendation of a "speculation," so cold-blooded and godless in its character, that it will shock the religious portion of his State; while among the infidels it will, as it did here, provoke laughter under the very ribs of the moral death which it proclaims.

I sicken, sir, over the recital of those outrages against freedom which have characterized the so-called Democratic party. The child has changed its nature as a chameleon does its hues, and having become, if not black, at least tawny in color, should receive a new christening. Whatever measure it proposes, whatever act it performs, or whatever platform its changing necessities require it to inaugurate, in all these "the nigger" is prominent. Asserting that "the slave has no rights which a white man is bound to respect," it still insists that the slave system shall be the head and front, the Alpha and Omega of party allegiance and constitutional obligation. When the President of the United States stooped from his high position and entered the partisan arena to attempt a public answer to a modest petition from some of the first citizens of my State, he acted consistently, judging him by the measures of the modern Democracy. Sir, the doctrine of political ethics taught in that ancient and world-renowned Alma Mater, in New Haven, does not tally with the bald assumptions of the political Hotspurs of today. Her learned professors are of the school of the Shermans, the Wolcotts, and the Dwights; and the partisan fulminations of the President fell harmlessly at the feet of the noble men whom God yet permits to linger under the shadows of her venerated walls. The party of the President in my State gathered no converts to their faith from that presidential tilt with those honored citizens.

Mr. Chairman, I have felt it due to myself and my constituents to say this much in explanation of their true character, social position, and political opinions upon the slavery question. I had determined with myself not to occupy the time of the House, but to pronounce my own as well as their judgment upon that feature of slavery extension now under the consideration of Congress, in a negative vote upon every phase which it should assume. I have no desire to rehearse the catalogue of invasions and frauds practiced against the people of Kansas Territory. Neither have I the taste to dissect so foul a mass of political corruption as was, in my opinion, embodied in that Lecompton convention. For the same reason I do not desire to analyze the child that partakes so largely the paternal nature and character. Other and abler hands have done it; and, in my opinion, most successfully. On the face of the whole proceedings, from the first invasion downwards, it is marked with violence, fraud, and a pro-slavery fanaticism almost insane. Its leaders and abettors have been men high in authority, and blood-red murders have followed its serpentine trail. Its consummation has come to be a party test, and its legal crowning will be a blow which will drive that party staggering to its political death.

During the recess of Congress I visited the Territory, conversed with its citizens, and gathered up as much of its unwritten history as circumstances permitted. It harmonizes with the record already upon the page of history and before the country. I stood by the row of graves in the open field, on the summit of the hill which overlooks the city of Lawrence, and from a resident learned the history of this column of sleeping martyrs. History may be ransacked in vain to find a parallel of brutality, savage hate, and fiendish malignity which brought these men to their bloody graves. If "the blood of the martyrs is the seed of the Church," then the blood of freemen is not lost when it is yielded up to establish free institutions. If the strong influence of this Administration, and the force of party discipline shall place this constitution as a yoke upon the necks of a subdued people, I still shall have confidence that the sons of revolutionary sires will have enough of their fathers' spirit to emancipate themselves, and found for themselves a domain of freedom, peaceably if they can—forcibly, if that is the only alternative. The arbitrament of war is a court of last appeal, and should not be tried until the hope of a peaceful revolution has exhausted itself. When that crisis is reached the people must decide to be slaves or freemen.

Mr. Chairman, before closing I wish briefly to assign the reasons why I shall cast my vote against every step which looks to the consummation of this fraud.

In the first place, reflecting the sentiments of my constituents, I will not vote to admit a single inch of slave territory lying within the limits covered by the Missouri restriction of 1820. Its abrogation was in bad faith, and was designed, to say no more, to render possible what had solemnly been adjudged, and for a long series of years acquiesced in, as impossible. I have no faith—had none—in the catch-phrase of "popular sovereignty" with which that measure was gilded in order to screen the possibility or the purpose beneath it. It was asserted by our coolest men, at the time of the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska act, that the repeal of the Missouri restriction would result in the formation of a slave State within the limits from which the restriction was removed. Their prediction finds a fulfillment. It comes here with a slave constitution, in spite of the dogma of "popular sovereignty," and a majority of ten thousand votes of its citizens cast against it. But, sir, if every man in the Territory desired its admission with slavery, under the position which I have assumed, I could not, and would not, vote in its favor.

Another reason for its rejection would be found in the frauds connected with the formation of the constitution presented, even though the first could be waived. Why, sir, if testimony is to be credited—and Democratic Governors and Secretaries join in concurrence with the other proof spread before the face of the people—then this instrument is unworthy the respectful attention of the Congress of a free country, and should be kicked lustily from these Halls. If saved at all, it must be by technicalities and special pleading. An instrument of this nature, which is to determine the political and social complexion of a sovereign State, should not be saved merely because it was able to pass through such a gauntlet as this. We are not a petty court, sitting for the trial of a meager suit at law, to be governed by its petty technicalities, granting to the special pleader his verdict in consequence of his ingenuity in shaping his case, or artfully and skillfully dodging the tough points of his opponent by legal quibbles. As the nation's tribunes, we are sitting in judgment on the legal birth of a new Commonwealth seeking to be added to this Confederacy. Standing upon the doctrine of popular sovereignty, and in the face of the ten thousand majority of its citizens against this constitution, no northern Democrat can, in my opinion, vote for this rejected instrument, and be true to his pledges to the people.

If the voice of the people is to be authoritative in the founding of new States out of the common domain, without the interposition of Congress, then it should bear their popular verdict of approval, clear as the sun at noonday. Sir, popular sovereignty does not weigh a feather in the balance when opposed to the schemes of the slave propagandists of the day. They mean slavery in Kansas, whether a majority of its citizens approve or disapprove. They mean two slave-State Senators in the other wing of the Capitol, for four and six years respectively. All the irruptions of the Goths and Vandals of Missouri in the different elections; all the slaughter of Democratic Governors by the national Executive; the quartering of a Federal army within her borders; the refusal to enroll her citizens upon the poll-lists; the disfranchisement of nineteen counties in the pretended election for a constitutional convention; the creation of a peripatetic regent and supreme dictator, who holds the unannounced certificates of the late election for State officers in his breeches pocket; his absence from the Territory for months, and his hanging around the Federal city, and the reading of the author of the popular sovereignty doctrine out of the pale of the party, because he cannot shut his eyes against this outrageous swindle—all, all, sir, make the grand design of the party and this Administration perfectly apparent. They mean a "nigger" in Kansas, or no Kansas in the Union. Popular sovereignty is well enough as a text upon which to predicate speeches to please the northern Democratic ear; but when it rears a barrier against the extension of slavery, it is to the South a bird of different plumage. It will be difficult for the people of the North to harmonize the pitiful pettifoggery of the friends of Lecompton to carry this measure, with the stern popular verdict of ten thousand majority of the sovereigns against it.

Still another reason for my opposition is found in the fact that it is not for the interest of my State to depart from the first inaugurated policy of our Government under the Constitution, to which I have so briefly adverted in my opening remarks. The danger to this Government lies in its strong tendency to centralization, federation, or too much central power. The Federal Government is of limited powers; and I will go as far as the furthest to give the sacred instrument of its existence a strict construction. Far beyond the most extensive speculations of our fathers has executive patronage even now reached, in its rapidly augmenting course. It is conceded by the country that an Administration in power has the odds of almost two to one in a popular election. There is not even a village of our broad country in the which the President has not an active political agent; a local manager of the political affairs of his Administration, either for his own reelection or the candidate nominated by his party to succeed him. And this agent must have an unsullied party record, or the ax of the executive guillotine removes his official head without even saying "by your leave," or consulting in the least degree the will of the people. But, sir, when the central Government takes the system of chattel-slavery under its especial protection; when it declares that every rood of land in our broad territories, stretching away to the Pacific ocean, is, by the Constitution, the legal abode of the chattel-system, and that the central Government will enforce that system at the point of Federal bayonets, it is time that the increasing millions of northern freemen should investigate and decide for themselves this new interpretation. It, at one blow, nationalizes the chattel system, hovers it under the wing of our emblematic bird, shielding and defending it with its angry beak. At the same time, it annihilates all that makes the property valuable to northern laborers.

If a corrupt, partisan Administration usurps to itself the power of treading upon new ground, no patriot is far-sighted enough to discover the final results of that first misguided step. Already an alarmed North feels about the pillars and strong columns which support its independent State sovereignties, to discover the solidity of their foundations. Steadily increasing in strength as a central power, you are also as steadily trenching upon State rights, and you will yet claim the right to drive your coffied slaves through the very temples of freedom by the decision and with the aid of the central Government. This prophecy may be esteemed a madness; but there are children now born in the North who will live to witness the attempt. When that time comes, your Republic will become an Empire, your central Government as Paris is to France, and your elected President an Emperor. It cannot be reached but by revolution and blood; but both may be averted by nipping in the bud this tendency to centralization—this encroachment upon the rights of the free States of this Union.

It is not for the interests of the North to extend the area of slavery, for another reason. Your chattel system conflicts with the true interests of our northern laborer in almost all respects. We have all the slavery power pressing like an incubus upon us. You dictate the tariff policy of the nation, and by owning your own laborers, do not hesitate to attempt to enforce a free-trade policy which places the labor of our free mechanics upon a level with the pauper labor of Europe. At your will the governmental screws are unloosed, or turned until the cry of reduction of wages rings through all the manufactories and artisans' shops of the North, or else close their doors and stop the hum of industry.

No hired pauper of Europe, even though his remuneration for daily labor is but a scanty pittance, can compete with the owners of the human-labor machine in the South. You can restrict his daily allowance to the stand-point of actual necessity. You can compel him under the lash to labor for a number of hours per day, which, if forced upon the paupers of Europe, would revolutionize every nation upon the face of that continent. You do not need protection for such labor, and self interest alone leads you to the formation of a tariff that will, with the least possible addition essential to the carrying on of our Government, place in your hands the product of their industry at the lowest possible price. But, sir, the free labor of the North will never consent to take rank either with the paupers of Europe, or the slaves of the South. It seeks at the hands of a paternal Government protection from both. Just so fast as this slave system expands itself, in the ratio with which it fills your congressional Halls, it diminishes the chances for that protection which American industry and capital demand. I do not wonder, sir, that Connecticut Democracy, cheek by jowl with the South in her slave propagandism, and in striking down the dignity and rights of free labor, stands up in this Hall and begs of its southern coadjutors to stifle the utterance of their "mud-sill" sentiments, because such utterances ring the death-knell of the party.

But there is another and higher reason than all, which will control my vote upon this question, because it has been, is now, and, I trust, always will be, a cardinal principle of my political life. I do not, cannot, will not, acknowledge man's right of property in man. Born and educated amid the free institutions of the old Commonwealth of Connecticut, I was taught their justice and sanctity. The study of my later years has but strengthened and established my early convictions. No doctrine is so abhorrent to me, sir, as that so often proclaimed in this Hall, that one man has a social, political, moral, nay, sir, a Divine right, to hold as property the living body of his fellow-man. It saps the foundation of all rights invested in man by a high Creator. It stands between an eternal Ruler and the accountable subject. It claims the power, and exercises it, of making nugatory Divine commands. This it does by holding the marriage covenant subject to the caprices of fortune and the dictum of another's will, when the Divine Authority has declared it permanent. It claims the power, and exercises it, of shutting up the immortal mind in the prison-house of ignorance, and forbids the application of its God-given powers in fitting itself for the study of that Book by whose laws it must finally be judged, and through whose pages alone it can discover the moral beauties of the world's great Redeemer. It claims and exercises the right of seducing in the public shambles the child of another's loins, scattering families, without their consent, to the extremes of its spreading dominions. It abrogates nature's first law of self-defense. In a word, it lays its iron hand upon "the image of God" in man, and by one fell legal blow makes him a chattel, a thing, a beast of burden, an article of merchandise in the markets of the country.

Sir, I cannot acknowledge the existence of that right thus to transform a fellow-man—anywhere on this vast globe of ours, much less in my own native country, the boasted "land of the free, and the home of the brave." For that reason, also, I shall vote against this Lecompton constitution. I do not hold any party in my own State or elsewhere responsible for the doctrine set forth in this last reason for my vote against Lecompton. It will be my highest pleasure to co-operate with any man differing with me on this fundamental question in any effort to strangle this fraudulent attempt to impose a constitution upon an unwilling people in Kansas. Whatever may be the result of this local struggle, for myself and my constituents I pledge you that there will be no cessation of effort until this Government is brought back to its early practice, and a practical infidelity shall give place to the broad principles of a genuine Christian morality, which was the glory of its noble founders.

Mr. BOYCE. Mr. Chairman, the sectional agitation is upon us again. In vain we seek to get rid of it, in vain we endeavor to banish it from these Halls, and transfer it, under the Constitution, to the people of the Territories, or to the judiciary. It still returns upon us. It has taken various forms in the different stages of our history. At one time it is the acquisition of Louisiana, then the Missouri question; at another, the right of petition; again, it is the annexation of Texas; then it reappears after a brief space, as the Wilmot proviso; changing its form, it now comes before us as Kansas. But in all its different aspects it is the same principle of sectional antagonism. It flows on through the different periods of our history, a dark and gloomy current, drawing its sources from the fountains of bitterness, and threatening in its accumulating floods ultimately to submerge the Republic.

The admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution has been so elaborately discussed that I do not propose to go over this ground in detail. I shall content myself with alluding to some of the questions raised in the discussion, and a consideration of the sectional controversy in its more general bearings. A good deal has been said as to the necessity of a submission of the Lecompton constitution to a popular vote.

As to the expediency of a submission of the constitution to a popular vote in the case of the Lecompton constitution, I have nothing to say; that was a question for the convention alone to determine. The only question, in this connection, I propose to consider, is the necessity of such submission. Is it necessary to submit a constitution to a popular vote to give it validity? I think not. I admit that no constitution can have vitality but from the assent of the people; and if a submission to popular vote were the only mode by which the people could express their assent, then such submission would be indispensable. But is this the case? Certainly not. The people may express their assent in advance, by conferring upon their delegates the power to make the constitution. Empowering others to make the constitution for them, is agreeing in advance to be bound by the action of those others, and thus in advance giving their assent to the constitution. There are several modes by which the people might give their assent to a constitution. They might meet in mass meeting, and make their constitution, clause by clause. This would come nearest, perhaps, to actually making their own constitution; but there are so many practical objections to this mode, that it will find, perhaps, few advocates; though, in the progress of the democratic mania, even this mode may come to be insisted on eventually as the only legitimate mode having due regard to popular sovereignty. Again: the people might authorize their delegates to form and establish their constitution for them; and this, perhaps, is the best mode of accomplishing the purpose, if the delegates are judiciously chosen; for it is most likely that in this mode the constitution will be the embodiment of the highest wisdom of the community, acting independent of popular errors or prejudices.

Yet further, the people might confer upon their delegates the power of forming the constitution, but deny them the power of giving it vitality, but reserve to themselves this sovereign right. At first view this mode may appear desirable; but when we consider that the mere power to say yes or no upon an entire constitution in the lump, not permitting an expression of opinion upon every clause, but only upon the aggregate, amounts to very little. If every man were allowed to vote upon every clause, it is likely that no constitution that could be devised would obtain a majority of votes for all its clauses, yet if the same constitution were submitted to a popular vote it would in all probability, as a general rule, obtain a majority of votes. When a constitution is submitted to popular vote, the question is not whether the majority favor all the provisions, the question is really whether it is better to have that constitution or no constitution. You may submit a single question to popular vote as a means of really ascertaining the public will, as for instance, "convention or no convention," or "bank or no bank," or "slavery or no slavery;" but the submission of a constitution, or frame of government, to a popular vote is a more apparent than real mode of ascertaining the popular will.

As an illustration upon this point, I remember conversing with a gentleman from California who voted in California when the constitution was submitted to popular vote. He told me that he did not suppose half a dozen people in his section of the State had ever seen the constitution; but the people voted for it, because they wanted a government, and would have voted for anything. We all remember a recent vote in this District on submitting a code of laws to the people; we saw placarded over the city, "Workingmen vote for the Code, and go to jail for debt." And under this, and similar appeals, the Code, prepared with great care and ability, was voted down by an overwhelming vote. The submission to popular vote of a frame of government or code of laws, is, in my opinion, an illusion. Again, the people may establish a constitution, by giving the power to one man. This was the case in the master States of antiquity: in Lacedemon and Athens. Lycurgus gave institutions to Sparta, which made her supreme in Greece. Solon performed a similar great office for Athens. I do not, however, recommend this mode. It is not congenial to the spirit of our institutions, and I remember what an impracticable constitution the celebrated John Locke formed for my own State in an early period of her colonial existence. But all these modes of forming constitutions, which I have pointed out, are valid. The only essential thing is the assent of the people; any way by which that assent is signified is sufficient. The idea, therefore, that there is no mode of establishing a constitution but by a popular vote on the constitution, has no foundation, in my opinion, in reason.

This idea receives no sanction from the mode in which the Federal Government was established. Our ancestors desired to lay its foundations as deep as possible in the sanction of the States; and wishing to go behind the legislative authorities of the States, to the very sources of power, they required the Constitution to be submitted to "a convention of delegates chosen in each State by the people thereof." Such, too, was the practice of the States in the establishment of their own constitutions, until a comparatively recent period. To question the validity of a State constitution, on the ground of non-submission to a popular vote, is to disturb the foundation upon which our political system rests.

Another objection, much insisted on, is the mode in which the slavery question was submitted by the Lecompton convention to the people of Kansas. By that submission, the people were authorized to say whether any more slaves should be brought into Kansas. They were not authorized to confiscate the few already there. Now, this is the real cause of complaint. The convention did not submit the question of confiscation. To have done this would have been unjust in the extreme, for those who held slaves had taken them into the Territory under the sanction of the constitution; and suddenly, by a vote of a majority, to deprive them of their property, would have been robbery under the forms of law—what may be appropriately termed higher-law larceny.

The example set us by the northern States in their emancipation policy is most instructive in this regard. I have been at some pains to trace their legislation on this subject.

The first act for the abolition of slaves by a State Legislature was passed by Pennsylvania in 1780, which was, as its title indicated, "An act for the gradual abolition of slavery." It enacts:

"That all persons, as well negroes and mulattoes as others, who shall be born within this State, from and after the passing of this act, shall not be deemed and considered as servants for life or slaves; and that all servitude for life or slavery of children in consequence of the slavery of their mothers, in the case of all children born within this State from and after the passage of this act, as aforesaid, shall be, and hereby is, utterly taken away, extinguished, and forever abolished.

"That every negro, or mulatto child born within this State, after the passing of this act, (who would in case this act had not been made, have been born a servant for years, or life, or a slave,) shall be deemed to be, and shall be, the servant of such person, or his assigns, who would be entitled to the service of such child, until such child shall attain unto the age of twenty-eight years."

Now Pennsylvania did not, as we see by this act, proceed to an instantaneous confiscation, she only declared that the children of slave mothers born after the passage of the act, would be discharged from servitude on arriving at the age of twenty-one years. Why did Pennsylvania act thus discreetly? It was not certainly because she counted the costs of a more rapid philanthropy and wished to be cheaply benevolent: such a construction would be unworthy of her reputation. It must have been that she thought to have gone further would have been inconsistent with the rights of property, or liable to some other equally grave objections.

In Massachusetts slavery was not abolished by any special legislative act, but by the decision of the courts on the construction to be given to a clause in the constitution declaring that "all men are born free and equal." (Winchenden vs. Hatfield, 4 Mass. R., 129.)

Connecticut, in 1784, by her Legislature, enacted that—

"No negro or mulatto child that shall, after the first day of March, 1784, be born within this State, shall be held in servitude longer than until they arrive at the age of twenty-five years, notwithstanding the mother or parent of such child was held in servitude at the time of its birth, but such child, at the age aforesaid, shall be free."

No sudden emancipation, no confiscation—a very gradual transition. This Connecticut law explains its spirit in a recital—

"Whereas sound policy requires that the abolition of slavery should be effected as soon as may be consistent with the rights of individuals and the public safety and welfare."

Rhode Island enacted that—

"No person born within this State, on and after the 1st day of May, A. D. 1784, shall be deemed or considered a servant for life, or a slave; and all servitude for life, or slavery of children to be born as aforesaid, in consequence of the condition of their mothers, be, and the same is hereby, taken away, extinguished, and forever abolished."

Still prospective.

New Hampshire did not pass any express act of the Legislature for the abolition of slavery, but the abolition is inferred from a general clause in her constitution, in 1792, similar to the one cited from the constitution of Massachusetts. Slave interest was merely nominal in New Hampshire.

The constitution of Vermont, 1793, provides—

"That all men are born equally free, and independent; therefore, no male person born in this country, or brought from over sea, ought to be held by law, to serve any person as a servant, slave, or apprentice, after he arrives to the age of twenty-one years, nor female in like manner, after she arrives to the age of eighteen years, unless they are bound by their own consent, after they arrive at such age, or bound by law, for the payment of debts, damages, fines, costs, and the like."

The number of slaves, infinitesimally small in Vermont, yet no sudden spoliation.

New York provided, by legislative act, that all children born of slaves after the 4th of July, 1799, should be held by the owner of the mothers of the same only, until they should attain to the age of twenty-eight years, if males, and if females, until to the age of twenty-five years. No confiscation; philanthropy, not very rampant, satisfied to wait a quarter of a century for fruition.

New Jersey, in 1804, passed an act for the gradual abolition of slavery similar to the Rhode Island law, except "that white male children born of slaves, after the 4th day of July, 1804, may be retained as servants by the owners of their mothers, until the age of twenty-five years only, and female children in like manner, until the age of twenty-one years." Philanthropy still patient and listening to reason.

We thus see that in every instance where the northern States acted specially on the emancipation of their slaves, they respected the existing rights of property. They looked to the future without damaging themselves in the present. The effect of their legislation would seem to be more to release themselves from the presence of the African race than to exalt that race into freedom. For what was to prevent the owners of slaves thus advertised in advance from moving their slaves to a warmer climate? Nothing, that I see. And that the question of emancipation, in a large degree, took this form of solution, is, I think, obvious, from the comparatively small free negro population now in the emancipating northern States to that which should, in the natural course of events, be there. Either emancipation has acted like a paralysis on the African race, or they were transferred South before the emancipating process took effect. The northern emancipating States have proved, by their own action in reference to themselves, that they repudiated the confiscating process. Why, then, should there be complaint that this process was not established in Kansas? Is their philanthropy more vivid when it is to be exercised at the expense of others? Commend me to this prudent philanthropy, which counts the cost when it is to be operative at our own expense, but has a sublime contempt for the expense when it is to come out of other people's pockets.

I propose now, Mr. Chairman, to refer as briefly as possible to some of the prominent occasions on which the antagonism of a northern sectional party has manifested itself in our history. The review is curious and instructive, and shows in the strongest light imaginable the indefensible views which have actuated this northern organization.

One of the first instances was the purchase of that western empire known as the Territory of Louisiana, embracing that immense region lying west of the Mississippi, from the great lakes to the Gulf of Mexico. The facts that this territory embraced one bank of the Mississippi throughout its entire course; that, for a long distance near its mouth, the Mississippi flowed entire through the Territory; the boundless extent of fertile land embraced in it; its close proximity to the United States, as they then existed; that the numerous and great confluents of the Mississippi were of comparative little value without the absolute control of the "Father of Waters," which passes benignantly and sublimely across so many parallels of latitude; all rendered this acquisition not merely a desideratum, but a necessity. It is not going too far to say that the Republic would have been dismembered if this acquisition had not been made. Yet, there was a sectional party North whose horizon was so limited that they could not take in this mighty development of the Republic. The sublime flow of the great inland sea never stirred their hearts with emotion. If the question had depended solely upon them, the Mississippi would now be washing the shores of the stranger.

Another development of this northern sectional party occurred in the acquisition of Florida. Florida, from its local position, infested with hostile savages, who constantly harried our frontiers, in possession of a weak government unable to restrain these incursions, with an extended line of sea and gulf coast, along which passed so vast a portion of American commerce, was also necessary to the peace, the integrity, and the commerce of the Republic. Yet there was still an opposition at the North to its acquisition. But the common sense of the Republic burst the obstacles some wished to interpose to its rightful developments.

The next development of this northern sectional sentiment was on the admission of Missouri. Then it first attained its gigantic proportion. Three great questions of constitutional law were raised in the progress of this controversy:

1. As to the power of Congress to restrict and abolish slavery in a State applying for admission.
2. As to the power to prohibit slavery in a Territory.
3. As to the right of a State to prohibit the ingress of free negroes.

The discussion commenced on the proposition of Mr. Tallmadge to limit the existence of slavery in the new State, by declaring all free who should be born in the Territory after its admission into the Union. The amendment of Mr. Tallmadge was in these words:

"And provided, That the further introduction of slavery or involuntary servitude be prohibited, except for the punishment of crimes, whereof the party shall have been fully convicted, and that all children born within the said State, after the admission thereof into the Union, shall be free at the age of twenty-five years."

This amendment implied the power of Congress to annex conditions upon the admission of a State derogatory to her equality as a member of a confederacy of States, necessarily equal in all their rights. According to this principle, Missouri was to be shorn of an important portion of her sovereign right to regulate her own institutions in her own way, while the other States of the Union possessed, unquestioned, this right. The result would have been, if Missouri had been admitted with this provision, that, as to a vital portion of her social policy, she was in a condition of inferiority to the other States. Illogical and untenable as this position was, it was ardently sustained by a dominant party North, and the country was convulsed upon this unfounded assumption. Now, how does this question stand? It is abandoned even at the North, I believe, except by a few fanatics. Upon this point Mr. Justice Campbell, in delivering his opinion in the Dred Scott case, says:

"The attempt consisted of a proposal to exclude Missouri from a place in the Union unless her people would adopt a constitution containing a prohibition upon the subject of slavery, according to a prescription of Congress. The sentiment is now general, if not universal, that Congress had no constitutional power to impose the restriction. This was frankly admitted at the bar, in the course of this argument."

The case was argued for Dred Scott by Mr. Blair and Mr. G. F. Curtis, who cannot be suspected of any bias for the southern view of the question. In Groves vs. Slaughter, Mr. Justice McLean, who was strongly spoken of for the presidential nomination which Fremont received, says:

"The Constitution of the United States operates alike in all the States, and one State has the same power over slavery as every other State."—Pollard's Lessee vs. Hagan, 3 How., 212.

The Supreme Court of the United States say:

"The United States have no constitutional capacity to exercise municipal jurisdiction, sovereignty, or eminent domain, within the limits of a State, except in cases where it is delegated, and the court denies the faculty of the Federal Government to add to its powers by treaty or compact."

Mr. Justice Campbell, in the Dred Scott case, further says:

"This claim to impose a restriction upon the people of Missouri involved a denial of the constitutional relations between the people of the States and Congress, and affirmed a concurrent right for the latter with their people to constitute the social and political system of the new States. A successful maintenance of this claim would have altered the basis of the Constitution; the new States would have become members of a Union defined in part by the Constitution, and in part by Congress; they would not have been admitted to 'this' Union; their sovereignty would have been restricted by Congress as well as the Constitution."

Clearly upon this first question raised upon the admission of Missouri, the South were in the right, and the northern sectional party in the wrong.

As regards the second question, the power of Congress to prohibit slavery in the Territories: this power is pertinaciously adhered to by the northern sectional party; they refuse to be convinced, though the argument against it is overwhelming. They derive this power from that clause of the Constitution which authorizes Congress "to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States." From this they assume a governmental power over the territory. But this clause does not confer a governmental power; it only confers a proprietary power. This is obvious from the very terms of the clause, "territory or other property" evidently showing that the power conferred, in reference to the territory, is as property. Again: the power conferred by this clause is operative within a State where public land may be situated; thus showing that it is a proprietary power only. Again: if this power to make rules and regulations for the territory of the United States confers a governmental power, what was the use of the Constitution conferring upon Congress, in express terms, governmental powers over the District of Columbia, as this ample power would have resulted without express provision? The fact that the Constitution does confer expressly governmental powers on Congress, in reference to the District of Columbia, is conclusive that such powers were not conferred as to the territory by the clause, authorizing "rules and regulations."

Again: if the Constitution had intended to confer upon Congress governmental power over the territory, it would, as it did in the case of the District of Columbia, have done so by apt words. Not having done so, the argument is strong that they did not intend to do so. But even if a governmental power could be deduced from this clause of the Constitution, it would not authorize the prohibition of slavery in the territories by the Federal Government, because such legislation would be inconsistent with the equality which exists between the States. The power to govern the Territories is most properly deducible from the power to admit new States. Congress having the power to admit new States, has, as an incident to that power, the right to prepare a State for admission by establishing a territorial government; and in executing this derivative power, Congress has no right to discriminate in the Territories between the different forms of property, but must respect all property recognized as property by the Constitution, which slave property is. But without going any further into the argument of this question, it is sufficient to say that it has recently come for decision before the Supreme Court of the United States in the Dred Scott case, and the question has been decided adversely to the claim of the prohibitionists. The position taken at all times in our history by all parties at the North, until within a recent period, was that the Supreme Court was the final arbiter of the Constitution, and its decision was authoritative and binding. It would be supposed, therefore, that the claim of power to prohibit slavery would be abandoned after this decision. Without myself claiming such force in the decisions of the Supreme Court, I may say I rely on its decision in the Dred Scott case as a powerful indorsement of the rightfulness of the position taken by the South upon this question.

The third question raised in the Missouri controversy was as to the power of Missouri to prohibit the entrance of free negroes. This was resisted by the northern sectional party as violative of the Federal Constitution, on the ground that free negroes were citizens of the United States. Never was a more unfounded pretension put forward by any party. The best argument on this point is a reference to the status of the free negroes in the northern States. We find, on examination, conclusive evidence that the free negro has always been regarded and treated in the free States as of a degraded class, and not admitted to citizenship, as will appear from the following summary of their legislation on the subject:

Massachusetts, in 1786, passed a law prohibiting the marriage of white persons with any negro or mulatto—declaring all such marriages unlawful, and the issue bastards. And in the revised code of 1836, the same law is substantially reenacted, except that the penalty is increased from fine to fine and imprisonment on the person joining the white and colored in marriage. Thus strongly did Massachusetts, as late even as 1836, manifest her sense of the inferiority of the African race. Again, by a law of Massachusetts, passed March 6, 1788, revised in 1798 and in 1802, it is enacted:

"That no person being an African, or negro, other than a subject of the Emperor of Morocco, or a citizen of the United States, to be evidenced by a certificate, &c., shall tarry within this Commonwealth for a longer time than two months; if he does, the justices have power to order such persons to depart, &c. And if such person shall not depart within ten days, &c., such person shall be committed to the prison, or house of correction. And for this offense, &c., he shall be whipped, &c., and ordered again to depart in ten days; and if he does not, the same process and punishment to be inflicted, and so toties quoties."

This looks like a very strong demonstration of the opinion of Massachusetts as to the inferiority of the African race, and their consequent non-citizenship, and her power and her determination to keep them from her soil.

The constitution with which Indiana came into the Union recognizes the inferior status of the free negro.

Shortly after Indiana became a State, she passed the following law:

"No free negro, mulatto, or Indian, shall be a witness, except in pleas of the State against negroes, mulattoes, or Indians, or in civil cases where negroes, mulattoes, or Indians alone shall be parties."

They say, in the same law, that

"Every person, other than a negro, of whose grandfathers or grandmothers any one is, or shall have been, a negro, although all his other progenitors, except that descending from a negro, shall have been white persons, shall be deemed a mulatto; and so every person who shall have one fourth part or more of negro blood, shall, in like manner, be deemed a mulatto."

This looks very much as if the people of Indiana did not think the African race as worthy of equality with themselves.

In Connecticut we find similar legislation, recognizing the inferiority of the African race, and their want of the status of citizenship. By an act of 1784, it is provided, that if any free negro shall travel without a pass, and shall be stopped, seized, or taken up, he shall pay all charges arising thereby. Again: in 1833 Connecticut passed another law, which made it penal to set up any school in the State for the instruction of persons of the African race not inhabitants of the State, or to instruct or teach in any such school, or board any such person for such purpose, without the previous consent of the civil authorities.

The constitutionality of this law was attacked in the courts of Connecticut, in the case of Prudence Crandall, on the ground that the persons instructed, though of the African race, were nevertheless citizens of the United States, and therefore entitled to all the rights and privileges of citizens. Chief Justice Clagget overruled this defense, on the ground that free negroes were not citizens of a State within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States. The constitution of Connecticut of 1818, it should also be observed, provided "that every white male citizen shall be an elector." So much for Connecticut.

By the New Hampshire code, passed in 1815, no person was permitted to be enrolled in the militia but free white citizens; and the same provision is reenacted in 1855. The negro is not thought worthy to stop a bullet in battle. The defense of the country is left to the citizens; the free negro is not considered in that class.

In Rhode Island, by act of 1822, renewed in 1844, marriage is prohibited between whites and mulattoes. By another act it is provided that, if a free negro keep a disorderly house, or entertain persons at unseasonable hours, his house may be broken open, and he bound out to service for two years; that is, made a slave of for two years. Again, it is provided that no white person or mulatto keeping house, shall entertain any mulatto or slave. Again, any Indian, mulatto, or negro servant or slave, absent at night after nine o'clock to be lodged in jail until morning, then taken before a magistrate, who may cause them to be whipped. This is very inconsistent with the idea of full citizenship.

Vermont, by law of 1797, enacted that "every free, able-bodied, white male citizen, above the age of twenty-one shall be enrolled in the militia." This looks very much like counting the free negroes out of the class of citizens.

In New York, Ohio, and Illinois, legislation may likewise be found establishing the inferior status of the free negro.

The distinction between the African race and the white race has been frequently recognized by the legislative departments of the Federal Government from the earliest periods of our history, as by restricting the right of naturalizing aliens to the white race, by enrolling only white citizens in the militia. A very pointed act upon the subject was passed by Congress in 1813, as follows:

"That from and after the termination of the war in which the United States are now engaged with Great Britain, it shall not be lawful to employ on board of any public or private vessels of the United States, any person or persons except citizens of the United States, or persons of color, natives of the United States."

Congress by this act expressly negating the idea that persons of color were citizens.

Mr. Wirt, as Attorney General, in 1821, also gave an opinion denying the citizenship of free negroes.

This question of the status of the free negro came before the Supreme Court in the Dred Scott case; and it was decided that free negroes were not citizens of the United States.

The next subject of agitation by this northern sectional party was the right of petition; this was made the pretext for a wide spread agitation.

The next question was the admission of Texas. This great measure of general good was violently opposed by the same northern sectional party. I shall not enlarge upon the advantages to the whole country, North as well as South, by this acquisition.

The next agitation was produced by the efforts of this persistent northern sectional party to apply the Wilmot proviso to the territory acquired from Mexico. The discussions upon this subject, and their repugnance to enforcing the provisions of the Constitution in reference to fugitive slaves, and their desire to interfere with slavery in the District of Columbia, are so recent that it is not necessary to do more than to allude to them.

The agitation temporarily allayed by the legislation of 1850, was revived with increased intensity by the passage of the Kansas and Nebraska bill, repealing the Missouri restriction. And we are now in the closing chapter of this agitation.

From the summary I have taken of the various phases of the northern sectional agitation, several reflections will readily suggest themselves.

1. That in the various forms this agitation has taken, the South has uniformly contended for nothing more than justice, equality, and constitutional right, and that her policy in regard to the great questions involved has been wise, and in every sense unexceptionable.

2. That northern sectional agitation is unjust,

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

SATURDAY, MARCH 27, 1858.

NEW SERIES... No. 86.

unconstitutional, chronic; not accidental, but permanent.

I advance to another view of the subject. What is the purpose of this northern sectional party? Its great leading idea is power. It desires to obtain possession of the Government, and wield the Government exclusively for its own benefit. To accomplish this purpose, its instrumentality is hate—hate first, second, and all the time—hate of the South by the North. To verify this assertion, we have only to read the productions of its teeming press, the speeches of its Representatives here, and observe its legislative and individual acts. It wishes to make the North hate the South, and to attain this result it desires to make the South hate the North, that the gulf of alienation may be more profound. I do not consider that this party is primarily actuated by sympathy for the slave. That flag is held out to conciliate a portion of the North. There is a portion of the North, a minority, I think in every State, who really sympathize with the slave. To conciliate this class, the northern sectional party assumes the championship of the cause of the slave. The emancipation crusade proper, is, I think, weaker now than at any period within the last quarter of a century; and slavery, as an institution, stands upon stronger ground now in a moral and politico-economical point of view, than it has done at any time since 1830. After the great wars of Napoleon were ended, the public mind of Europe, agitated by a series of great events, could not at once subside into calmness. It needed the stimulus of some agitation, and the want was supplied by the emancipation propaganda. England yielded to it between 1830 and 1840, and abolished slavery in her West India possessions. This emancipation mania went upon three ideas.

1. That slavery was wrong in foro conscientie.
2. That emancipation would be better for the negroes.
3. That emancipation would be better for the civilized world, as the enfranchised slaves would produce more working as freemen.

This last assumption was, I have no doubt, more efficacious in producing emancipation than any other; for England, in common with the rest of the civilized world, has always pursued her material interests without any squeamish regard to the rights of inferior races, as is illustrated on every page of history. The emancipationists might have bawled themselves hoarse in Exeter Hall over the alleged wrongs of the Africans, without making any impression on the policy of England, if they had not adroitly held up the lure of material advantage in connection with the movement.

But the English emancipation act has led to consequences not foreseen by its advocates. A more thorough investigation has been given to the moral aspect of the question. The result has been that, on the grounds of revealed religion and natural reason, slavery, humanely administered, is founded on impregnable right. Instead of freedom being a benefit to the slaves, it has proved a curse. Upon this point the evidence from the experiment in the West Indies has been overwhelming, that the enfranchised blacks are worse off now than in a state of slavery. If my time would permit I could accumulate authorities on this point; but it will not. I can only in a general way refer to the facts as they have been developed on this point as sustaining my assertion. If this is hereafter controverted, I shall bring forward a magazine of proof upon the subject.

But the idea that the free negro would be more productive working for himself than for his master, has been, of all the assumptions, the most completely falsified. Space again does not permit me to give the statistics on this point. They have been collected by Christie, an emancipationist, in his work called "Ethiopia," a production of signal ability. His evidence is entitled to the more weight, as he is not of our camp. He concedes the failure of the West India emancipation scheme, but offers another—the transfer of the blacks to Africa.

The results of this West India emancipation have produced a profound impression on the public opinion of the world. We see this by various developments—in England, in the tone of the London Times; in France, by the recent action of Louis Napoleon.

From this short review I consider myself authorized to make the assertion I have as to the present strength of the institution of slavery. Slavery is interwoven with the material interests of the civilized world. You cannot strike down slavery without paralyzing free society. Take one single product which we grow at the South, dependent absolutely upon slavery—cotton. Abolish slavery, abolish the cotton culture, and there is not a hamlet in the civilized world that will not feel the recoil of the blow. The cold blasts of your northern winters are arguments for slavery; from the oracles of God, which you cannot disregard without entailing inexpressible suffering on all those who live by their daily toil. It is not too much to say that civilization itself hangs upon threads of cotton. The productions of hot regions are necessary to the white race in the northern zones; these productions cannot be obtained without slavery. You Free-Soilers and Abolitionists of the North are the abettors of slavery. Why do you use our cotton, our sugar, our rice? If you shudder, as some of you pretend to do, at the sin of slavery, why do you solace yourselves with the comforts and the luxuries of slave labor? Give them up; cease to use the products of slave labor, and we shall believe in your sincerity, even if we are more convinced of your folly. If not, then are you not slavery abettors, and is there not some little inconsistency in your professions and your practice?

This northern sectional party cannot be blind to the evidences of the times. They cannot but see that emancipation is a delusion. I therefore feel authorized to assume as I have, that, in a general sense, they are not agitating in the interest of the slave. They are agitating for sectional power. The truth sometimes develops itself involuntarily; and so it was recently in the memorable declaration of your great leader, [Mr. SEWARD], that "the battle was over and won;" that the North had now a majority of free States, and would soon have an excess of four free States. This was a pregnant declaration; it is true, too. The equilibrium of the two sections is at an end. The North have a majority in every department of the Government except the judiciary. In the House of Representatives the majority now is large; by the next census in 1860, the North will have a vastly increased preponderance, amounting to nearly two thirds. In the Senate they will soon have a majority of eight votes. In the electoral college they will have also a large majority.

In this aspect of the case two great questions suggest themselves to the South:

1. Will this northern sectional party get possession of the Government?
2. What policy will they pursue if in power?

In reference to the first, I think the signs of the times imply that this northern sectional party may get possession of the Government. When we see how they have increased in the last few years; when we reflect upon their persistent efforts to make the North hate the South, how alluring power is to States, the plausible pretense that they represent exclusively northern interests, their pandering to the anti-slavery sentiment, the conviction is forced upon us, however reluctantly, that they may eventually take possession of the Government.

Then the question comes up, what policy will they pursue? It is obvious that it will be legislation exclusively for what they may consider sectional interests; distributing office, patronage, and station, among themselves and such few adherents as they may have South—a process of constant agitation and impinging upon southern rights, so that the Federal Government will be the exponent of their ideas and their hate. To complete the programme of their policy, they will seize the judiciary, and from that battery discharge their envenomed arrows upon us. Their leader [Mr. SEWARD] has already this session declared that the Supreme Court must be remodeled in the interests of "humanity." Their mode of remodeling courts is seen in the late expulsion of Judge Loring from the bench in Massachusetts.

I have not language strong enough to express my sense of the calamities and degradation which would fall upon the South by acquiescence under the domination of this northern sectional party. Their possession of power would be the installation of hate. The South could not acquiesce in such domination without abdicating her present and her future. I am a conservative by education, by all the instincts of my nature. I have been, and am, in good faith, sincerely desirous of preserving the existing Government, if its preservation be possible, compatible with the safety and equality of the South. But if the North should—a result I ardently hope may never take place—put the Federal Government in the hands of this party whose capital is hate of the South, then I shall think and proclaim to my countrymen of the South that we have nothing more to expect from the justice of our northern brethren; and that the time has come for us to take our destinies into our own hands. If the South acts, I shall rejoice; if she does not, I shall retire to my farm, and lament that we of the South have so far fallen from our high estate.

Mr. COVODE. Mr. Chairman, the doctrine of "popular sovereignty," or the right of the people of a Territory to make their own laws, without let or hindrance on the part of Congress, or interference from any quarter, had its origin in the political necessities of a presidential aspirant, and was first announced in the famous "Nicholson letter." That letter made its appearance in 1848, just prior to the meeting of the Baltimore convention, and its author, General Cass, received the nomination of that body for the Presidency. It was regarded as a happy thought at the time, inasmuch as it relieved the party on the one hand of the Wilmot proviso, and on the other of the southern demand made by a few ultraists, with Mr. Calhoun at their head, of the right of the slaveholders to carry their slave property into all the Territories of the Union. But the South was far from being pleased with the "compromise," and signaled its displeasure by failing to elect its author to the Presidency. From that time forward, although the Democratic party has nominally clung to the doctrine of popular sovereignty, it has been more and more the fashion to construe it in the manner least objectionable to the South; until at length it has been brought into harmony with the constitutional theories of the great Carolinian.

The doctrine as enunciated by its author plainly meant that the people of a Territory may, as such, admit or exclude slavery by their territorial laws, prior to the formation of a State constitution. It is due to General Cass to say that he has always contended for this construction in language as explicit as he ever employs upon any occasion. But the party, finding this interpretation almost as distasteful to the slaveholding interest as the Wilmot proviso itself, has gradually receded from it, until, as I have stated, the opposite theory, in all its latitude, has been adopted and announced by the President. Mr. Buchanan, in his letter to Professor Silliman, says:

"Slavery existed at that period, [meaning when the Nebraska bill was passed,] and still exists in Kansas, under the Constitution of the United States."

In his recent message, dated February 2, in which he communicated the Lecompton constitution to this House, he goes still further, saying:

"It has been solemnly adjudged by the highest judicial tribunal known to our laws, that slavery exists in Kansas by virtue of the constitution of the United States. Kansas is, therefore, at this moment, as much a slave State as Georgia or South Carolina."

In 1854, when the repeal of the Missouri compromise was under consideration, the party avoided ultra southern ground. They declared in the body of the Kansas-Nebraska bill that it is slavery into any Territory or State, nor to exclude it therefrom, but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States."

"The true intent and meaning of this act not to legislate

We all remember that this clause was inserted in consequence of the disputes in regard to this doctrine of popular sovereignty. General Cass and his northern friends contended that slavery is a local institution, and that it exists nowhere except under the sanction of positive law; while the southern ultraists contend that slavery exists as a matter of right in all the Territories. In 1854, the Democratic party determined not to be embarrassed by this question, and accordingly inserted the above declaratory clause in the Kansas-Nebraska bill.

It will be seen that the Democracy has been steadily gravitating southwardly for nine or ten years past, until it at length stands squarely upon the South Carolina platform.

In 1847, the northern wing of the party voted for the Wilmot proviso. In 1848, they wheeled about and denied the right of Congress to abolish slavery in the Territories; but declared it to be the inalienable right of the people inhabiting them to admit or exclude slavery at their pleasure, either by their Territorial Legislatures, or in the formation of their State constitutions. In 1850 to 1854, this right was fiercely contested by the South, and the party was induced to take a neutral, or doubtful, position; in 1855-6-7, the repugnance of the slave interest to "squatter sovereignty" grew intense, and the party yielded still further; in 1853, they throw off all disguise, and openly avow that the Constitution carries slavery into all the Territories of the Union, and that no man can be a Democrat who denies this proposition.

I can conceive of but two further steps in this downward progress. The first of these is, to declare in favor of reopening the African slave trade; and the second is, to get up another Dred Scott decision in favor of the right to carry slavery into the free States.

We know that the revival of the slave trade is earnestly demanded by the more active spirits of the South. The Governor of South Carolina had recommended it to the attention of the Legislature; and in Louisiana the Legislature, or at least one branch of it—the other, however, has rejected it by two votes—has, within a few weeks, passed an evasive act for the revival of the traffic in slaves, under the name of apprentices, or hired laborers. Indeed, it is stated in the newspapers that the trade has been actually revived, on the coast of Mississippi, in defiance of the United States laws, which brand it as piracy. I have little doubt that the trade might be successfully carried on without the formality of a repeal of the laws prohibiting it, for we all know the alacrity of the President in efforts to conciliate the South. In Kansas we have seen him trample on law and justice; violate his pledges; and give countenance to the most infamous frauds, by turning out of office Governors and Secretaries who would not connive at them. How preposterous, then, the idea that the President would hoggle at the allowance of the slave trade, or put himself to inconvenience in the enforcement of an unpopular statute of fifty years' standing! The slave trade may therefore be regarded as practically reestablished; but there is reason to believe that the South will demand its legal recognition, and the experience of the last few years would lead to the expectation that the Democratic party will adopt the African slave trade as a plank in its platform. The next national convention of the party is to meet at Charleston, South Carolina, in 1860, for the purpose of nominating a candidate for the Presidency, and the time and place will be eminently fitting for the insertion of the ebony plank.

The doctrine that the Constitution carries slavery into the free States has also found favor with the leading members of the party. There are those who insist that the Dred Scott decision covers this ground; and among this number is the official organ of the Government, the Washington Union. That paper, on the 17th of November last, distinctly asserted the right of the slaveholders to carry their slaves into the free States, and to remain with them as long as they think proper, any law of those States to the contrary notwithstanding. The South will ere long insist upon this right, and we may expect to see the Democratic party adopt it into its creed.

I have said that the Democracy have but two more steps to take in their downward career; but there is still another demand which the South will hold in reserve: the right to reduce the poor whites of the country, and the laboring classes generally, including mechanics, to slavery. This proposition has been boldly advanced in the South. Leading editors, politicians, and preachers have espoused it; and the other day it was proclaimed in the Senate Chamber. The time may come when they may attempt to reduce it to practice. Why should they hesitate? They pronounce free society a failure—an unsuccessful experiment made in western Europe and northern America in comparatively modern times—while the whole experience and practice of mankind, from the earliest ages, attest the utility and necessity of slavery. It has become a cardinal dogma with the leaders of southern opinion, that slavery is the natural and proper condition of the laboring classes, without reference to the color of the skin or the nature of their employment. The northern Democracy are now the faithful allies of this white-slavery party of the South, and stand ready to assist them in carrying out every practical measure. I can conceive that the leaders of the party in the free States will be greatly embarrassed by this question, when they shall be called upon to make an explicit avowal of the doctrine; but it must be remembered that numbers of them have already indirectly taken ground in favor of white slavery; for whoever quotes the Bible in favor of slavery, is the advocate of white slavery. The slavery instituted and regulated by the Mosaic laws was white slavery; the nations surrounding the land of Canaan, whom the Israelites were authorized to enslave, were white men, Caucasians; and, in a later age, the servants whom Paul commanded to obey their masters were white servants. Whoever, therefore, resorts to the Bible for arguments in support of slavery, stands committed in favor of the right to enslave his white fellow-citizens.

In tracing the downward career of the Democracy in the pursuit of "popular sovereignty" it is but just that I should admit, as I do with pleasure, that a considerable wing of the party has at length awakened to a consciousness of the "base uses" to which their energies have been applied. They begin to see, at the eleventh hour, that they have done worse than stand all the day idle. The honest Democracy of the North really supposed that the propagandists of slavery were in earnest when they avowed themselves ready to "leave the people perfectly free to form their institutions in their own way." But the history of the struggle in Kansas has at length opened their eyes. It ought to have had that effect sooner, and would have done so but for the insatiation of prejudice and the pride of partisanship.

Sir, I will not fatigue the committee by going into a minute recital of the events of the Kansas history. A brief reference to them will be sufficient for my purpose.

The first territorial election took place in March, 1855. We all know how it was conducted. About five thousand men, in military array, marched over the line from the State of Missouri, "with drums beating and banners flying," dispersed themselves through the several counties or election districts; drove the peaceable inhabitants from the polls, and cast an overwhelming vote for men of their own party—many of them, like their constituents, citizens of Missouri. In a few instances protests were made by actual residents against these violent proceedings, and the Governor, Reeder, rejected the returns, and gave the certificates of election to free-State men. But, in most cases, the reign of terror established by the ruffian invaders was so complete that no one dared to make a protest; and, as a consequence—though not a legitimate consequence—the ruffian intruders secured a large majority of the Legislature.

The "Legislature" thus thrust upon the people of Kansas by violence and fraud, assembled in July. They adopted, at one fell swoop, the whole body of laws of the State of Missouri, contained in a large volume of several hundred pages, with such indecent haste, and with so little regard to what the book contained, that they neglected to erase "State of Missouri," where it occurred in the titles of the several acts, and insert "Territory of Kansas" in its place. The consequence was, that they were compelled to the ridiculous expedient of passing a supplementary act declaring that where the term "State of Missouri" occurs, "Territory of Kansas" must be understood. Among the laws passed by this model Legislature, were the following. I am not aware whether they were partly borrowed from the State of Missouri, or whether they originated entirely with the ruffian Legislature. They appear, however, to be, at least in part, original:

"Sec. 11. If any person print, write, introduce into, publish, or circulate, or cause to be brought into, printed, written, published, or circulated, or shall knowingly aid or assist in bringing into, printing, publishing, or circulating, within this Territory, any book, paper, pamphlet, magazine, handbill, or circular, containing any statements, arguments, opinions, sentiments, doctrines, advice, or innuendo, calculated to promote a disorderly, dangerous, or rebellious disaffection among the slaves in this Territory, or to induce such slaves to escape from the service of their masters or to resist their authority, he shall be guilty of a felony, and be punished by imprisonment and hard labor for a term not less than five years.

"Sec. 12. If any free person, by speaking or by writing, assert or maintain that persons have not the right to hold slaves in this Territory, or shall introduce into this Territory, print, publish, write, circulate, or cause to be introduced into this Territory, written, printed, published, or circulated in this Territory, any book, paper, magazine, pamphlet, or circular, containing any denial of the right of persons to hold slaves in this Territory, such person shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and punished by imprisonment at hard labor for a term of not less than two years. And further providing, that no person 'conscientiously opposed to holding slaves' shall sit as a juror in the trial of any cause founded on a breach of the foregoing law. 'They further provided, that all officers and attorneys should be sworn, not only to support the Constitution of the United States, but also to support and sustain the organic law of the Territory, and the fugitive slave laws; and that any person offering to vote shall be presumed to be entitled to vote until the contrary is shown; and if any one, when required, shall refuse to take an oath to sustain the fugitive slave laws, he shall not be permitted to vote."

They removed all obstacles to voting at future elections on the part of non-residents, by providing that whoever should pay a poll-tax and claim residence for the time being, should be a qualified elector. No length of time was made a necessary part of the qualification, and the consequence was, that any Missourian who could afford the expense of a ride across the line, and the payment of a small poll-tax, was legally qualified to make laws and institutions for Kansas. It was known that the citizens of the free States could not avail themselves of this privilege, in consequence of the great distance intervening. No one would dream of traveling five to fifteen hundred miles for the purpose of casting a vote. Even Iowa could afford no aid to the free-State cause, under this convenient electoral law, since the western portion of it is, or was at that time, almost uninhabited.

Such was the "perfect freedom," and "popular sovereignty" enjoyed by the people of Kansas at their first election.

Their second election, in 1856, took place under the "laws" passed by this Legislature, which make it a felony to discuss the very questions at issue between the parties; and disfranchise all who would not take an oath to support laws which they held in abhorrence. It is the height of tyranny to compel a man to swear to support a particular statute as a condition upon which he is to exercise the elective franchise. Have citizens no right to doubt and deny the constitutionality of laws? And must American freemen stultify themselves, or be disfranchised? The idea is abhorrent to every man who is not a tyrant or a slave at heart. It is the essence of tyranny.

What would South Carolina think of such a test-oath in regard to a protective tariff? She once declared such a tariff unconstitutional and void. Suppose the Congress of that day, at the recommendation of General Jackson, had passed an act prescribing a test-oath, and declaring that no man who refused to support the tariff act should be allowed to vote, what would South Carolina have said to it? I ask her Representatives here now, what they would have thought of such a test-oath? I know what their answer must be; not one of them but will feel his blood mantle in his cheek with indignation at the thought. Then how can they countenance for one moment, directly or indirectly, this infamous test-oath in Kansas? Their candor will not permit them to deny that the cases are perfectly parallel. It is as legitimate to require a test-oath for one law of Congress as for another.

But, Mr. Chairman, is it not too plain to need illustration, that whoever upholds the validity of the territorial election of 1856, gives his sanction to the test-oaths under which it was held? No candid man can deny the proposition. Those test-oaths are known to have kept thousands of conscientious voters from the polls. The free-State party resolved, in consequence of them, to abstain from voting; and the result was that the election went in favor of the pro-slavery party. They had no occasion to import voters. Their test-oaths were all-sufficient to secure them a monopoly of the elective franchise and an easy triumph.

The Legislature, therefore, which called the Lecompton convention into being, was elected under these infamous test-oaths, and owes its pro-slavery character to them. Without the test-oaths the result might have been, and probably would have been entirely different. Yet sir, we hear South Carolinians foremost in defense of the legitimacy of an election conducted on such principles. Sir, they should not forget that "a revolution of the wheel of fortune, an exchange of situations is among possible events," and the day may come when the "poisoned chalice" may be presented to their lips. A test-oath is a happy expedient of the central power to get rid of refractory majorities in the States, and give its own meager handful of friends the control. Sir, I am very far from threatening such retaliation; I love liberty not merely for myself and party, but for all men. But I warn the South, and particularly South Carolina against the danger of putting this tremendous weapon of despotism in the hands of this Federal Government. They should fear and tremble when they reflect upon their participation in these centralizing measures.

Test-oaths originated in a barbarous age. They were invented by religious intolerance and fanaticism, and furnished a convenient method for disfranchising and crushing minorities. England is now about to efface the last vestige of them from her statute-books, by repealing the laws which exclude the Jews from the rights and privileges of British subjects. The people of London have, several times, within the last ten years, sent a Jew to Parliament, merely as a protest against the intolerant test-oaths. The House of Commons has more than once, indeed, I believe, every time, signified its willingness to repeal the test act, and admit the Baron Rothschild to his seat, but the House of Lords has shown its characteristic repugnance to reform by opposing repeal. Every year, however, their opposition grows weaker, and if they have not already yielded, it is confidently expected that they will do so at no distant day. Sir, the House of Lords is a hereditary body, and clings with tenacity to whatever is arbitrary and illiberal; but it dare not resist the persistent demands of the British people for reform. It has always yielded—generally at the eleventh hour and with a bad grace—to the stern voice of the people, spoken through the Commons.

And, sir, shall republican America, in the latter half of the nineteenth century, transplant this relic of barbarism and intolerance to the New World, after it has been discarded by monarchical England? Sir, slavery is itself a relic of barbarism. It has no element of freedom or justice in it; but its friends pretend that it only affects the rights of black men; that white men are all the more free for holding black men in slavery. There never was a grosser fallacy. There can be no freedom where slavery is, for master or slave; for white men or black. It is itself the essence of injustice, and can only be maintained by illiberal and intolerant laws. It will not bear scrutiny, and therefore it becomes necessary to pass laws, such as I have quoted from the code of Kansas, and such as are to be found in the codes of all the slave States, forbidding, under heavy pains and penalties, any denial of the right to hold slaves. It must have test oaths, in order to disfranchise every man who dares to question, even in his heart of hearts, the justice of the system. In a word, slavery demands the same despotic regulations for its support which Louis Napoleon and the Czar of Russia find necessary to the maintenance of their tyranny.

The Lecompton convention was called into existence by this test-oath Legislature. Its parents were ruffianism and fraud. It was literally conceived in sin and brought forth in iniquity. What could we expect of such a convention but an offspring like itself, a foul and deformed monster, abhorred and hated of honest men?

It is true that the test oaths were repealed by the Legislature which called the convention into existence; but other precautions were taken to stifle the voice of the majority, and secure an easy victory to the pro-slavery party, even if the people had thought proper to vote.

In the first place, the Legislature authorized a census to be taken, and a registry of voters, which was very imperfectly performed in any part of the Territory, so far as the free-State party were concerned; while the greatest care was taken to register every pro-slavery man who had ever paid a casual visit to the Territory, or employed a proxy to stake out a "claim." In addition to this, about half the counties, containing an almost unanimous anti-slavery population, were entirely neglected by the census-takers, and were denied any shadow of representation in the convention. A second and still stronger guarantee of success was the fact that the appointment of judges of the election was made by the Legislature from the most reckless and unscrupulous tools of the slavery faction, and the poll-books made returnable, not to the Governor, but to the Speakers of the two Houses, in whom the people had not the slightest confidence. Under such circumstances it would have been the excess of folly on the part of the free-State men to participate in the election. But lastly, and above all, the people of Kansas regarded the Legislature which called the convention into being as a foul usurpation, which they would not have tolerated in their midst but for the support it received from the central despotism here at Washington.

The last election of a Territorial Legislature took place in October. We are all familiar with its history. The free-State party had now become too strong to be overawed by ruffian invaders from Missouri; and, as a consequence, the slavery desperadoes were compelled to resort to new tactics. In the first election, of March, 1855, their reliance was upon force. They scarcely condescended, at that stage of the struggle, to perpetrate frauds, except such as were as bold and barefaced as the violence which accompanied them. In 1856, their relative strength was considerably impaired, and force and fraud were united; while in 1857 their weakness was so conspicuous, that they abandoned force, except in a few localities, and relied almost exclusively upon the most despicable fraud and perjury. The ruffians have been completely transformed into knaves; and the people, who have grown too strong to be kept down by force, are to be cheated of their rights by the forgery of election returns, and the perjury of officials.

We all recollect how the consummation of this crime was prevented by the integrity of Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton, in the rejection of the Oxford and McGee county frauds; and we all know the reward they received at the hands of President Buchanan. For doing what any honest man would have done, Governor Walker was denounced by the pro-slavery press of the country in the most unmeasured terms, and was censured and frowned upon by the Administration, until self-respect compelled him to resign. Secretary Stanton, partly for his participation with Walker in the rejection of the Oxford frauds, and partly for calling an extra session of the free-State Legislature, has been unceremoniously dismissed.

Two more elections remain to be noticed. I allude to those of the 21st December and the 4th of January. The first of these elections was called by the Lecompton conspirators in order to gloss over their treacherable work by tricking the people into its adoption. Instead of submitting the whole constitution to the popular vote, which would have been the most easy and natural, as well as the only fair and legitimate proceeding, they submitted a single clause for the people's ratification or rejection, on condition of their voting for all the other clauses. Can any good reason be offered for this discrimination? Have not the people the same right to vote for or against the whole constitution that they have to vote upon a part of it? Sir, the members of the convention had the frankness to tell why they declined to submit the whole constitution. They acknowledged that they withheld it because they were aware that the people would vote it down; and incredible as the fact may seem, the official organ of Mr. Buchanan—the Washington Union—had the coolness to justify them on that ground! Sir, call you this Democracy? No, sir; no, sir; it is the essence of whatever is mean, odious, and tyrannical. Every honest man will detest the vile hypocrisy which attempts to cloak its despotic purposes under such disguises.

The terms of this pretended submission of the slavery clause to the popular ratification required that all who voted at all, whether for or against the slavery clause, must vote for the constitution. They must vote "for the constitution with slavery," or "for the constitution without slavery." Is it not clear that the object of the convention was to extort an indorsement of the constitution from those who were opposed to it, or compel them to refrain from voting? This dishonorable expedient originated in the same spirit with that which originated the test oaths—a desire to disfranchise all who were opposed to slavery and to the rule of the usurpers. No conscientious opponent of the constitution could vote at all; and the result was that the border ruffians and Federal stipendiaries had everything their own way.

But, sir, the question of the existence of slavery was really never submitted to the vote of the people at all. The pretended submission only amounted to this: shall Kansas exclude the further introduction of slaves? A separate clause of the constitution guarantees a perpetual right of slaveholders in the slaves already in the Territory, whatever might be the result of the vote upon the clause submitted for their ratification; and the vain attempt is made to bind future generations for all time to the maintenance of slavery. The people are permitted to alter their constitution after the year 1864, provided that the clause securing a perpetual right to hold slaves is never to be touched! Such, sir, is the "popular sovereignty" which Mr. Buchanan wishes secured to the people of Kansas. They may exclude the introduction of more slaves, provided they will vote for the perpetuation of the slavery already in existence, and the perpetual right to buy, sell, and breed from the stock already on hand! They may even alter the constitution after the year 1864, provided that this sacred right of holding, buying, selling, and breeding from those in the Territory at the time of its admission into the Union, is never to be interfered with! Sir, I should have held the Lecompton convention and the Administration in more respect if they had adhered to their first resolution, which was, not to submit the constitution, or any part of it, to the popular vote. Tyranny awakens our abhorrence, but fraud and jugglery excite contempt.

The convention ordered another election to take place on the 4th of January, under this Lecompton constitution, for State officers, State Legislature, and a member of Congress; and in the mean time the newly elected free-State Legislature met in a called session, which proceeded to order an election to take place also on the 4th of January, upon the question of ratifying or rejecting the constitution. We have heard the result of this election. More than ten thousand freemen of Kansas cast their votes against the constitution in all its parts; while on the 21st December only six thousand voted for the constitution with slavery; and of these it has been ascertained that fully half were fraudulent. We have, therefore, ten thousand against the constitution, and three thousand for it; and yet, in the face of these indisputable facts, the administration of Mr. Buchanan, backed by what is called the Democratic party, are endeavoring to force Kansas into the Union under the Lecompton constitution. Sir, the history of the worst ages of the world will furnish no more glaring invasion of the rights of a free people. The partition of Poland and the subjugation of Hungary by the despots of Russia and Germany, were not more flagrant acts of tyranny.

As to the election, on the 4th of January, for State officers, State Legislature, and member to Congress, we are not permitted to know the result to this day, on any reliable authority. The president of the convention, who is, at the same time, surveyor general of Kansas—a Federal official, who holds his place at the pleasure of the Administration—was authorized by the convention to receive and count the votes, and declare the result. In concert with the Administration, and doubtless by its command, he has held back the certificates of election in order to be ready for any emergency. If the prospect seems fair that Kansas is to be admitted into the Union under the Lecompton constitution, without serious opposition, we are given to understand that the pro-slavery party has triumphed. If, on the other hand, the fate of the swindle grows doubtful, we hear intimations thrown out through the organs of the Administration that the free-State candidates are to receive the certificates. We have recently seen in the newspapers a letter from Calhoun, stating that he has such information from the Territory as will induce him to give the certificates to a majority of free-State men. But his information is unofficial. He has not heard from Governor Denver; and the fraud once consummated here, it is not at all improbable that the official count might foot up quite differently. It is to be remarked, also, that this letter, which will pave the way for a few doubtful northern votes, says not a word about the State officers, and membership of Congress.

Sir, I have no faith in this letter. I will not believe that the majority has been given to the free-State party, until I hear it on undoubted authority from Kansas. This knavish juggle, this thimble-rigging, has been continued too long to impose upon the public.

I regard the Administration as being equally responsible with Calhoun for the outrageous violation of all law and precedent, all justice and decency, in this matter. He is their creature, holding a high and valuable office at their hands; and he would not have dared thus to trifle with the rights of Kansas if he had not been encouraged in it by his official superiors. The Administration is determined on securing two more United States Senators to bolster up their tottering despotism, and the whole history of their career proves that they will scruple at nothing—yes, sir, literally nothing—which may secure success.

Such, Mr. Chairman, has been the history of "popular sovereignty" under the administrations of Franklin Pierce and James Buchanan. They have "held the word of promise to the ear, and broken it to the hope." They never intended that the people should be "perfectly free" to form their own institutions, unless they should include slavery among them. If the people had been unanimous for slavery, there would have been no interference on the part of the Federal Government, because there would have been no necessity for it; but, as the most unmistakable indications were given that a majority of the people were opposed to slavery, and if left to themselves would exclude it, all the power and influence of the Federal Government have been employed to defeat the popular will, not by a legitimate use of executive influence, but by stimulating ruffianism, murder, fraud, and perjury; by the appointment of the most notorious murderers and scoundrels to office, and by putting arms into their hands with which to murder and rob the free-State men.

The Government is the creature of the slave power. A Senator, in the other wing of the Capitol, has had the frankness to admit that the South has ruled the country almost from the origin of the Government. Sir, nothing could be truer; and I with humiliation confess that the southern supremacy has never been so complete under a southern President as it has been under the last and present Administrations, when northern men have nominally presided at the White House.

The present incumbent of the presidential office is reported to have said, many years ago, that, if he had a drop of Democratic blood in his veins, he would let it out. I am not aware that the fact was ever tested by a resort to the Sangrado practice; but the history of his life has superseded all necessity for surgery. He clung to the old Federal party until it broke down, and then unceremoniously marched over to the enemy. From that time forward we have seen him trimming between the extremes of North and South, until he ascertained that the slave interest predominated in the Democratic party. From the date of that discovery he at once threw himself into the arms of the slavery propagandists; and to-day his position is more ultra southern than that of Mr. Calhoun was at the day of his death. And the history of his Administration, particularly with reference to Kansas, has removed every suspicion that he has either honest Democratic blood or northern blood in his veins.

Sir, he belongs to the genus Dough-face—a name invented by John Randolph, of Roanoke, to characterize the northern champions of slavery; and that term implies the absence of blood of any kind.

The position of the Republican party with reference to "popular sovereignty," or the right of the people of a Territory to make their own laws is, in my view, the only one compatible with the Constitution and with common sense. We hold that territorial sovereignty is subordinate to Federal authority; that it is absurd to suppose that the first handful of men—five hundred or five thousand—who arrive in a Territory like Kansas, of more than a hundred thousand square miles, have an exclusive right to fix its fundamental laws for all time, without the consent of Congress. They have no right, for instance, to form a State government, and to define its boundaries, without the consent of Congress. Common sense dictates that Congress should first pass an enabling act, setting forth the number of inhabitants requisite to form the State, the territorial extent of the State, and its boundaries. Can there be any question on this point? May five hundred men erect themselves into a State, with an area of five hundred thousand square miles? The idea is utterly preposterous; but admit the principle of territorial sovereignty, and this conclusion follows.

But while we insist upon the right of Congress to legislate for the Territories, we admit that this right may be waived. The people of the Territories may be invested with the privilege of making laws for themselves as Kansas has been; and we insist that they shall enjoy the right thus guaranteed to them by the organic act, without executive intermeddling. We deny their right to come into the Union whenever they think proper, and on any terms, but we admit their right to present themselves for admission. The Republican party has been the bulwark of practical popular sovereignty in Kansas since the organization of the territorial government; and we hail with joy the recent demonstrations of a large wing of the Democracy in favor of this principle. We extend to them the right hand of fellowship, and shall be happy to cooperate with them in any measures for vindicating the perfect freedom of the people in the formation of their own institutions in their own way.

Sir, if the Government were placed in the hands of honest and fair men, I should have little apprehension of seeing slavery extended, even without a resort to congressional prohibition. There was a time when the tendency was to expand slavery faster than freedom; but that time is past. At the period of the organization of the Government there were twelve States of the Union which tolerated slavery, and only one from which it was excluded. In six of those States slavery was an interest of prime importance; and nearly the whole territory of the Union lay contiguous to them. New England and New York had no frontier Territories bordering upon them; and only Pennsylvania, of all the States then comparatively, now entirely free, had a direct outlet into the wilderness beyond its western borders. In consequence of this state of things, and of the peculiar nature of slavery, we have seen Kentucky and Tennessee spring into existence before Ohio; and from that time forward, down to 1850, slavery spread more rapidly and widely than freedom. Since that period, the tables have been turned. Up to 1850, the number of free and slave States was equal. California turned the scale in favor of freedom; and now we have no less than three more free States ready for admission into the Union. One of them we have seen a party which styles itself Democratic, with a northern President at its head, attempt to smuggle into the Union under a slave constitution, concocted by corrupt Federal officials and other unscrupulous ruffians; but every man in the country knows that Kansas is practically free, and determined to remain so. Sir, nothing can prevent Kansas from becoming a free State of the Union in twelve months or two years, together with Minnesota and Oregon.

Of the fifteen slave States, Delaware is one, with not more slaves in it than are to be found on some of the largest plantations of the South. The people are anxiously looking about them for the means of removing the last vestige of the institution; and we may set Delaware down as practically free. Missouri, too, is one of the fifteen slave States. Her slave population is considerable, but her white population is ten times more numerous; her territory is as large as Great Britain, and the tide of white immigrants now flowing into the State is rapidly dwarfing the relative importance of slavery. It is believed that its actual strength will for the same reason decline, the slaveholders being induced to emigrate South with their slaves, by disgust and irritation at the marked change in public sentiment which has resulted from the influx of white population. As an index of the rising free sentiment in that State, I might point to the presence in this House of the distinguished Representative from St. Louis. He will doubtless have sympathizing colleagues in the next Congress.

Maryland is another of the fifteen slave States. It is now in a false position. It has no use for slaves in any point of view. It is a commercial and manufacturing, as well as agricultural State. It lies in the latitude of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, and has no more need of negro slaves than those States. Its slave population has been declining for fifty years. It had more slaves when the first census was taken, in 1790, than at the last, in 1850; and in the mean time, its white population has increased several fold. It has a city of two hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants, which, in fifteen or seventeen years, will number half a million. That city, and the whole tier of northern counties, are nearly rid of slavery, and are becoming averse to the institution. They embrace three fourths of the population of the State, and are growing every day more and more conscious of their strength. It is not to be credited that a barbarous and worn-out institution will be permitted to fetter the energies of such a population many years longer.

Sir, I have pointed to the fact that, at the time of the formation of the constitution, nearly the whole of our western Territories lay contiguous to the southern States, while only a portion of one northern State was in actual contact with them. From northern Virginia, on the fortieth parallel of latitude, down to the line of Florida, the South was bounded westwardly by vacant Territories stretching to the Pacific ocean. The North then literally had no West, except the strip of land between the northern line of Virginia and Lake Erie. Now, how changed! The free States are now in close proximity to nearly every foot of valuable territory in the Union; while the South has, in the progress of events, been shut off from it. We have twelve degrees of western front, commencing with the southern boundary of Kansas and running up to the forty-ninth parallel. This includes, and secures to us beyond contingency, all the territory east of the Rocky Mountains, except a strip about two hundred miles wide, west of Arkansas, which has been dedicated to the Indian tribes. Beyond the Rocky Mountains we have California, Oregon, and Washington Territories; in a word, the whole Pacific coast. Utah and New Mexico are cold, mountainous, or desert regions, and hold out no strong inducements to emigrants from any quarter; but are entirely unsuited for slavery. They are to become the great breakwater of the emigrant tide, and are destined at no distant day to turn it back upon Missouri, the Indian Territory, Arkansas, Kentucky, and, in a word, upon the whole northern tier of slave States. The fertile region of Kansas is said by Fremont, Emory, and other explorers, to extend not more than two hundred and fifty miles beyond the Missouri frontier. The emigrant crop of the North, and of Europe, will in a very few years occupy this ground, and from that time we may date the "friendly invasion" of the more northern slave States, including Maryland and Virginia. Sir, the day of their regeneration is not distant.

The friends of slavery talk of opening the Indian Territory to the settlement of white men, in order to convert it into one or more slave States. Well, let them try it; we shall be ready for them. The Indian Territory adjoins Kansas on the south, and it will be a comparatively easy task to rescue it from slavery. Kansas itself was entirely cut off from the free States by Missouri; and its most fertile portions were in immediate contact with the most populous slaveholding counties of that State. The Indian Territory, on the contrary, is bounded as well by the free State of Kansas as by the slave State of Arkansas; and it is a fact, which any one can verify by a reference to the census, that the northern and western portions of the latter, like southwestern Missouri, are nearly destitute of slaves. In fact, slavery has no great hold upon Arkansas. In the northern half of the State, with more than a hundred thousand inhabitants, there were in 1850 less than ten thousand slaves. That State is, therefore, more likely to receive a friendly invasion of Free-Soilers from the North than to send out a pro-slavery invasion into the adjacent Territory.

The cotton region of Arkansas lies in its southern and southeastern portions, and the slave population is chiefly confined to these sections. If cotton and slavery will not flourish in the northern and western parts of this State, how unlikely that they will succeed better in the higher and colder regions west of it, to which the Indians have been assigned!

Mr. Chairman, the South owed its rapid development, or I should more properly say, its diffusion and consequent increase in the number of States, in the commencement of our national career, to the ruinous effects of slavery upon the soil. Slave labor is fitted only for agriculture. Slaves are kept in ignorance as a necessary police regulation; and, as a necessary consequence, they are only qualified for the coarsest common labor. They will not excel in even the rudest species of mechanical or manufacturing labor; and are utterly unfitted, by ignorance, by the absence of motives of interest, and by want of integrity of character, for the more ingenious operations of art, for trade, commerce, and business. The community, therefore, which holds a half, a third, or two thirds of the population in slavery, can never compete with a free community. It is as if a man should attempt to run a race with one of his legs splintered, or to wrestle with his right arm bound. It is for this reason that we see but few towns and villages in the slave States, compared with what we find north of Mason and Dixon's line; that the cities, except on the northern border, where slavery has nearly disappeared, are few in number, and dwarfed in appearance. Even agriculture itself, because it is the almost only occupation of society, wears a languid and thriftless aspect.

Towns and cities are essential to agricultural prosperity. They furnish a domestic market for whatever the earth produces; for grain and vegetables, for beef, mutton, poultry, and eggs, and for a thousand things which would otherwise be useless. Slavery starves out the towns and cities, wears out the soil, and leaves nothing to improve or recuperate it, except at a very heavy expense and inconvenience. The consequence is, that the slaveholder, after a dozen or twenty years, finds it necessary to abandon his worn-out plantation, and move further, in search of new lands; and hence it is that slavery has heretofore advanced so rapidly. Its weakness and worthlessness, as a system of labor, have been the cause of its temporary increase of political power in the Confederacy.

But, sir, the spirit of progress and improvement has invaded even the slave region; and within fifteen years, but more especially within ten years, the South has greatly improved its condition by the construction of railroads, and other facilities of transportation and travel. The effect has been to bring the farmer nearer the market, to diversify employment, and to give unwonted activity to town and country. But the legitimate development of the South has tended to hinder its expansion. The augmented demand for labor in the old States has checked emigration, and we see Virginia, Maryland, and the Carolinas improving as fast, or nearly as fast, as the newer States of the Southwest. Texas, which has an immense fertile territory, with five times as much soil adapted to slavery as Virginia, has disappointed the hopes of the South; and apprehensions begin to be felt that the western half of it will be appropriated by the Free-Soilers. Should this take place it may be attributed as much to the internal development of the old slave States as to the enterprise of the Free-Soilers.

The most feasible remedy which the South has, therefore, against the encroaching tide of white labor, is the return to her ancient lethargy and indifference to the value of internal improvements. Let her abandon her railroads, and cease to build more, let her burn down her factories and workshops, and lynch or destroy every steam-engine, and she will soon see revived that great element of her political power, the compulsory dispersion of her population over the plains of Texas, and the formation of new slave States. A return to this policy may secure to her the Indian Territory, if not Kansas itself.

A different law has controlled the destiny of northern population. The free States were originally poor. The imports of the South, as well as the exports, prior to the Revolution, were greater than those of the North. The South, then, as now, produced the rich staples of commerce; the North produced nothing which was not grown equally cheap in Europe, except, perhaps, lumber and fish, which were exchanged for such British manufactures or colonial products as they could afford to purchase. The South, it is true, had no commerce, because that was in the hands of the merchants of England. English ships brought their cargoes to the very doors of the planters, without the intervention of an American merchant, in many cases; a fact which illustrates the utter absence of commerce in the American colonies. General Washington was in the habit of thus dealing directly with the London importer.

The planters had, however, much more to exchange for the luxuries and comforts of Europe than the poor farmers of the North. The South exported everything valuable which she produced, and imported everything which she consumed, except necessary food. Nearly everything worn, and every article of furniture was imported. Even bricks to build houses were imported from England.

The friends of slavery are in the habit of pointing to the large exports of the South—they can no longer point to its large imports—as evidence of the superior wealth of that section. They export everything valuable which they produce, and import, either from Europe or from the North, everything except necessities which they consume; and this, sir, is the ground of their boasted wealth, independence, and civilization! I am amazed, sir, that a moment's reflection has not taught them the contrary. Is it not clear that a country which produces only the raw materials of commerce, which only cultivates the ground, is in a condition of colonial dependence? Such, sir, is the condition of the South. She produces the bulk of our exports, and yet she has never, at any period of her history, exported them. Even when a majority of the exports was made from southern ports, the trade was carried on by northern or European ships and seamen. But for some years past the South has fallen behind the North in the amount of exports. The imports have always been in northern hands. The North sends its ships to New Orleans and Charleston, transports their cotton, tobacco, sugar, and rice, to Europe, and brings back return-cargoes of merchandise to New York, Boston, and Philadelphia; and from these points the South is supplied with foreign or northern manufactures. Sir, the condition of the South is strictly one of colonial dependence. She produces the very staples of commerce; she has fine harbors, fine timber for ship-building; in a word, every material element of commerce; but they are of no avail. The ignorance and barbarism of slavery have doomed her to an inferior and dependent condition.

The colonial history of New England and other northern States is a history of severe and heroic struggles with primeval nature. They had none of the advantages which the South enjoyed. They produced nothing which was not grown to equal advantage in Europe, with the exceptions of lumber and fish. The people had little to export, and therefore little to buy with. They were compelled to resort to their own ingenuity for the supply of their wants; and hence arose those diversified employments of agriculture, commerce, and the mechanic arts, which have conferred wealth and independence upon the free States. Even their superior education and literature may be traced to this humble origin—to the necessity of ministering to their own wants. The wealthy slave proprietors were able to educate their sons at Oxford or Cambridge, and therefore neglected, in a great measure, the establishment of schools and colleges at home. The northern people, too poor to imitate the example of their southern neighbors, but being imbued with the love of knowledge, set about building institutions of learning on this side of the Atlantic, and the establishment of common schools for all classes. The result has been to foster a universal love of learning among the people, to found institutions of learning which command the respect of the civilized world, and a literature which, in little more than two centuries from the date of the first settlement at Plymouth Rock, begins to take rank by the side of that of the mother country.

Sir, this diversity of employments, which is an essential element of civilization and progress, had its germ in the poverty of the northern colonies, and it is now the glory and strength of the empire. It has kept population more at home, and caused the accumulation of large masses in cities and towns. Since the Revolution, the incidental, and sometimes direct, protection, extended by the Federal Government to manufactures, has tended to promote this diversity of employment and concentration of population. The propagandists of slavery should, above all other people, advocate the protective policy; since its effect is to prevent the emigrating tendency of northern population, which has thwarted their efforts to carry slavery into Kansas.

But it is a singular fact that the policy of the South has tended more to the spread of free institutions than our own northern policy has done. Sir, what has that southern policy been? It has been to break down, or keep down, our manufacturing system, by withholding the protection which is essential to its existence. Free trade has never been literally adopted in this country; and we have therefore to conjecture its full effects upon our mechanical and manufacturing interests. But I think the free-trade theorists will agree with me that it would produce a general dispersion of the northern town population. It would augment the tide of western and southern emigration, and fill up the Territories with free white laborers. The present revenue tariff has been in operation a dozen years. We have seen its effects. They have been only less potent than free trade. It has crippled our manufactures, prevented the growth of manufacturing towns in the old States, and sent our people out in search of new homes in the Far West. California, in the latitude of Virginia and the Carolinas, has been made a free State. Kansas, in the same latitude, has been rescued from the jaws of slavery. We have at the same time found a surplus for the peopling of Minnesota, Oregon, Washington, and Nebraska, and are now proposing to oust slavery from Missouri.

But, sir, another southern measure has removed an obstacle to the ascendancy of free labor and free institutions in this Republic. I allude to the repeal of the Missouri compromise. While that compromise existed, there was a tacit understanding that the line of 36° 30' was to be the boundary line between slavery and freedom. But, sir, the line has been effaced; and the friends of freedom, after an arduous struggle, have succeeded in placing their right to all territory north of that line on a foundation more enduring than the isothermal theories of Governor Walker, or the plighted faith of the slave power. By its free-trade policy, the South has imposed upon the North the necessity of emigration, and, by the repeal of the Missouri compromise line, they invite us into their territorial heritage. We have lost nothing by your bad faith; and, in the name of the free people of the country, of all parties and sections, I thank you for the act, though not for the motive which prompted it. We will take you at your word. We will go into your goodly land and possess it, once yours by compromise, but now as much ours as yours by your bad faith.

I am the advocate of a protective tariff, and I think the present tariff ruinously low; but if you think it too high, reduce it, and establish free trade. The effect will be to injure us of the older States, of Pennsylvania, of New England, New York, New Jersey, and Ohio; but what we lose in wealth and prosperity the North will gain in political power. Break up our factories and workshops, and our population will emigrate to the western Territories, crowd out slavery, and make free States of them. Our population will invade Delaware, Maryland, Kentucky, Missouri, and Virginia, and transform them into free States.

Commerce, too, will be unduly stimulated, thus affording additional facilities to European emigration to this country; and we may expect to see an influx of five or six hundred thousand per annum who will be joined to the army of northern invaders of your soil.

DISTRIBUTION OF THE PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I desire very briefly to give the reasons which will govern my action upon the bill, donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts.

The disposal of the public lands, the common property of the whole nation, after the payment of the public debt, for the redemption of which they were solemnly pledged, has been a subject that has occupied the thoughts of many of the ablest and most experienced of our statesmen; and at one time, as is well known, when the Treasury was overflowing with a superabundant revenue, a plan was matured and passed into a law, to distribute the proceeds of the sales among the different States; but though the Treasury was plethoric at the time this law was passed, as it was but a few months ago, yet, then, as now, it soon became exhausted, and the further process of distribution was indefinitely suspended.

Whether the States, respectively, or the people of the States were much benefited by the money that was paid over to them by the General Government, in fulfillment of this "distribution act," is seriously questioned by many; but as it is not proposed by any one to revive that act, or adopt one at all like it, it is not necessary to inquire whether any better disposition could have been made of the surplus funds then in the Treasury, and tempting Congress and the Government into extravagant expenditures, always corrupting and demoralizing to any Government, but more especially a republican government. The bill introduced by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. Morrill] proposes to grant to the several States and Territories six million three hundred and forty thousand acres of land to be distributed in the proportion of twenty thousand acres for each Senator and Representative in Congress, to which the States are respectively entitled, and to each Territory sixty thousand acres, giving to my own State, by this ratio, one hundred and forty thousand acres.

The purposes which the donation of these lands to the several States are intended to serve, the objects they are to promote, and to which they are to be strictly and exclusively applied, are, in my judgment, those which are of all others most likely to benefit the great body of the people, by diffusing among them, especially among those who are properly termed "the bone and sinew of the country," the most important of all useful knowledge, that which teaches how to increase indefinitely the products of the earth, and improves the mechanic arts. I shall, Mr. Chairman, indulge in no rhapsodies in regard to the importance of agriculture, and its improvement, nor shall I stop to eulogize the hardy laboring men of the country, who create its wealth by their toil and sweat, and who are content with frugal fare and plain apparel, whilst others "fare sumptuously," and roll in that wealth which no toil of theirs ever produced. I would by no means depreciate the importance of academical or collegiate education; so far from it, I would have our colleges richly endowed, and enabled to confer upon the comparatively few who are designed to tread the higher walks of literature and science the most thorough education that can be obtained at any university in the world; but they are for the few, while the institutions proposed to be established by the bill under consideration, and to be supported through all time by the proceeds of the lands to be given to the States and Territories, are designed to benefit the millions, by educating them as farmers and mechanics; making them more perfect in their several occupations, by teaching them those several branches of science that are involved in those occupations.

I am aware, Mr. Chairman, that a strong prejudice exists among some of our farmers, though not to the extent and degree that it once did, against what is termed by them "book farming;" but we all know that very great improvements in farming have taken place, in almost every section of our country, within the last twenty years, and that improvements are going on rapidly. To what, sir, do we owe these? To the light which science has been made to throw upon the operations of the farmer; to the knowledge acquired by the various experiments of agricultural chemistry and scientific, or "book farming."

What is the growth or formation of wheat, corn, apples, peaches, pears, grass, and all other productions of the earth, but a chemical operation carried on by nature? It is the change of matter from one form to another; the potato which is formed in, and the wheat which grows out of the earth, both are produced from materials which must be brought in juxtaposition, and which combine in certain proportions when brought in contact, and are furnished with a sufficient amount of heat and moisture, but not too much. Science teaches us what the materials are of which the potato, wheat or any other product is composed, and their proportions, and it also enables us to ascertain whether those materials are contained by the soil upon which we propose to raise any given crop, or not, and of course, whether the soil will produce the article we wish to raise, without an artificial supply of the material wanted. An uneducated farmer may be able to form a tolerably good judgment, from the experience he has had of soils, from their appearance, whether any given field or farm will produce any given crop; if it will not, he knows from experience that the application of manure will add to its productive qualities; but why it does so, and why one kind of fertilizer is preferable to another for the production of any given article, as grass, corn, wheat, &c., he does not, and cannot know. But of late years some men of science have turned their attention to these matters, and we are indebted to the Mapeses, the Downings, the Liebiges, the Johnsons, and others, for a large amount of information upon these subjects, which is invaluable to farmers, and which has been the means of greatly improving the agriculture of this and other countries.

But the improvement and condition of agriculture in the United States are by no means comparable to the advances made in this most important of all the branches of human employment in England, Holland, Belgium, and some other European countries, where the cultivation of the earth has become a science, and where three or four blades of grass or heads of wheat have been made to grow where but one grew before. So far from farming being considered in those countries an inferior employment, the very highest in the land, men of eminence, wealth, and of the highest rank, take pride in being farmers—practical and successful agriculturists; and emulate each other in the raising of various kinds of stock, horses, sheep, hogs, &c. It may almost be said that it is the only branch of human employment in which "kings, lords, and commons" are all engaged, and in which they emulate each other in the quality and perfection of their productions.

And why, Mr. Chairman, is it that the countries I have named are so far in advance of us in their agricultural operations and productions? Why do some of them produce three, four, or five times as much to the acre as we do? and why is it that the tenant there is able to pay more annual rent for land per acre than he can obtain the fee-simple for here? Because, sir, mind, intelligence, science are brought in as auxiliaries. Those engaged in cultivating the earth do not go blind to work, as the Indian or barbarian does. They know beforehand what are the qualities of their soils; what ingredients they lack, and what are present in superabundance; and they know, therefore, what should be supplied, and in what quantities. This knowledge may be acquired to no inconsiderable extent by such of our citizens who are engaged in farming, and are already educated men, and have leisure to study agriculture as a science. But, sir, how few of them there are who come within this category!

Most of our farmers find but little time to read; and, it is probable, find political reading and the news of the day to occupy all the little leisure they have to devote to books or newspapers. And if they had time, such is the general prejudice against all "book farming," that it is not to be expected that they would think it worth their while to read works upon farming, written, it may be, by men who never held a plow, sowed a field of wheat, or made a ton of hay. Men must feel the necessity of knowledge before we can expect them to seek it; and it may be that some find how little they know and how much more knowledge there is to be obtained, when it has become too late for them to think of seeking it, and so keep on in their old beaten track—the same their fathers trod before them. It is the young that are to be educated; and if we expect to bring about such improvements in agriculture as are susceptible of being made; if we would raise the employment to the dignity of a profession, and make it a more remunerative occupation than it has been, we must take steps to educate the young who are intended to be tillers of the earth, and enable them to work in the light which the rays of science pour forth wheresoever they fall. It is to establish seminaries in every State where agricultural science can be taught, that I am in favor of the bill under consideration. As I have before said, I know of nothing so well calculated to improve the great body of the people and increase the productions and wealth of the country, as the giving of the young the most thorough literary and farming education; combining in that education the theory and practice of farming—just as to make a great lawyer, or a great physician, or surgeon, the student must combine the practice and theory of his profession.

I know, Mr. Chairman, that in some of the States, and especially the new ones, where the rich soil is unexhausted, and manure is not only a drug, but a nuisance, the necessity for agricultural education or knowledge is not so great as in those States where the original fertility of the soil has been exhausted; and the farmers there may laugh at the idea of educating young men for that branch of business. What! they may exclaim, educate a boy to hold the plow, or to hoe corn? Why, the man who does not know his alphabet will make just as good a farmer, and a great deal better one, than your college-educated man. A book farmer and a city farmer are their abhorrence, and, in their eyes, objects of perfect contempt. But how often have we seen these same book farmers and city farmers teach practical farmers lessons of the greatest value by showing them how much more any given number of acres can be made to produce when the mind is brought to bear upon their cultivation, and science lends her valuable aid as an assistant to labor.

This train of thought, Mr. Chairman, brings to my recollection an anecdote which a worthy gentleman of Philadelphia, some years ago, related to me; and which he then, a man somewhat advanced in life, had heard from one who lived at the time. There lived in Philadelphia, previous to the Revolution, a man named West, a brother of Sir Benjamin, the celebrated painter. Mr. West was a cooper; a man of strong mind and considerable intelligence, as he was fond of reading. Mr. West, having acquired a large property by his industry, took a notion to buy a farm and turn farmer. He accordingly looked around the country to find such a farm as would suit him. He soon found one in Montgomery county, not far from Norristown, which was for sale; but which, having been in the possession of a shiftless farmer for many years, was much out of order. The buildings were dilapidated; the fences were down; the briars had overrun the fields; the apple, peach, pear, and cherry trees had not been trimmed for a long time, and everything showed what sort of a man and farmer he was; but the soil was naturally good; and, as the farm could be purchased "cheap for cash," Mr. West bought it; and then began the farmers in the neighborhood to laugh at the folly of "the city farmer" for buying a farm so much out of order. But Mr. West was a man who asked no one's advice, and acted on his own judgment. He repaired the buildings and fences; cleared off the briars; carried out and spread upon the land the mountain of manure in the barnyard, making the land as rich as he wanted it, as far as it would go; stocked his farm with the best animals of the best breeds then in the country; and took pains to obtain the best kinds of wheat, corn, oats, &c., for seed. His plow only followed his manure cart; and, as the latter extended its journeys from year to year, so did Mr. West extend his inclosed fields and his plowed land. He was the first in Pennsylvania to apply lime to his land as a fertilizer; his neighbors, mean time, making sport of the "city farmer's" doings among themselves.

But it was not long before the farm, in the improvement of which mind and book farming had so much to do, attracted general attention; and farmers from other counties came there to purchase seed wheat, seed corn, &c., for all of which they paid a high price. Mr. West's stock, too, attracted attention, and breeders were sent for and purchased, from far and near, though it was an invariable rule with him to reserve the best lambs, calves, pigs, &c., for stock. Mr. West's farm became what is now called a "model farm;" it was admitted to be the best cultivated farm in the State, and was visited for inspection by a great number of farmers every year. Not content with thus advancing the interests of agriculture, he took an active part in establishing the first agricultural society formed in the State, and an agricultural magazine, for which he himself wrote much, and which was greatly instrumental in promoting a spirit of improvement among the farmers; and it is related, with how much truth I cannot say, that the farmers who indulged themselves, at first, in merriment at the "city farmer," were compelled at last to admire and endeavor to imitate him at whose expense they had before enjoyed much hearty laughter.

Mr. Chairman, the people of the United States have heard a great deal within a few years past about the large grants of public lands to different new States, for railroad purposes. Millions of acres have been given to some of these States for such purposes, and as "the Old Thirteen" had something to do in acquiring these lands, and as they had been purchased by the common fund of the nation, it is quite natural that my constituents, and the people of my State, one of "the Old Thirteen," should inquire why such large donations should be given to certain favored States, and not an acre to New Jersey? A portion of the public domain thus disposed of, they know was acquired with our independence, by the war of the Revolution, and they have also learned from history, if not from the lips of those who were actors and sufferers in that war, that her blood was freely shed in that eventful contest; that her territory was marked by the footsteps of the enemy; her cattle and crops destroyed; her houses burned; and her soil drenched with the blood of friend and foe, indiscriminately mingled on her battle-fields. Why, then, the public lands thus, in part, purchased by the valor, the suffering, and the blood of their fathers, should be so freely, and in such enormous quantities, given to those who had no part nor lot in the revolutionary struggle, and many of whose ancestors were then, perhaps, subjects of some European prince or potentate, and withheld from them, is a question which naturally forces itself upon their minds, but to which it is by no means easy to give a satisfactory answer.

We have, Mr. Chairman, lately been furnished with a statement, by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, of the number of acres of public land given to the different States "for schools, universities, &c., for deaf and dumb asylums, for internal improvements, for seats of government and public buildings, and for railroads;" and as this table contains a great deal of useful knowledge, in a very small compass, I have taken the pains to extract some portion of it, by which it will be seen that the number of acres of land unsold and unappropriated amount to 1,088,792,498.83 acres, from which the comparatively small number of 6,340,000 acres only are proposed to be taken by the bill under consideration.

GENERAL LAND OFFICE, February 15, 1858.

It will be seen, by this official statement, that a few States and Territories have received over one hundred millions of acres of the public land for the support of schools and colleges, for internal improvements, for railroad purposes, and for other objects, while the Old Thirteen have taken no space to themselves of their own public domain. But I make this statement in no spirit of complaint; I do not grudge the people of those States and Territories what they have obtained, and am willing they should have more; but I desire that my own State and my own constituents should have a share in them; and I know of no way in which the public lands can be disposed of to effect a greater, more general, or more permanent good, than in the mode proposed by the bill of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. Morrill.]

I trust that the bill will receive the favor of the members from those States that have already shared so bountifully of the public lands, as I am sure that gentlemen from the eastern, northern, middle, and southern Atlantic States will give it their hearty support. The agricultural schools and colleges, contemplated and provided for by this bill, will, we feel sure, be the points from which will radiate those lights of science which, when brought to bear upon the "old fields" or exhausted lands of Maryland, Virginia, and North and South Carolina, will restore their original fertility, and become covered with heavy and abundant crops, instead of meager coverings of poverty-grass, that has not strength enough to resist the winds of autumn, and is blown away like the chaff it resembles.

There is great merit in this bill; it has nothing sectional in it, and it appeals equally to the interest of the North and the South, if not to the East and the West. As agriculture is national, not sectional, so is any measure that tends to promote the interest of this great, this most important of all branches, of industry, in which every human being, of whatever condition, is deeply interested.

Pass this bill, and in my opinion it will become a fountain from whence blessings will flow in a never-ending stream, that, like the mysterious Nile, will make the land teem with productions wherever it shall spread its vivifying waters over their thirsty and exhausted soils; and where now only gophers burrow, and owls inhabit the solitary wastes, shall rise the lofty mansion, surrounded by gardens, orchards, and fields, vocal with all that makes the habitation of man cheerful, pleasant, and attractive; the seat of elegant hospitality, of refinement, intelligence, and independence.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, obtained the floor and moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and Mr. SMITH, of Virginia having taken the chair, Mr. WINSLOW reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 306) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1855, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. CLAWSON, (at five minutes to nine o'clock, p. m.,) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, March 26, 1855.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. G. W. SAMSON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

COMMITTEE OF ACCOUNTS.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. POWELL as a member of the Committee of Accounts, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Mr. MASON.

Mr. GARTRELL. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill of which previous notice has been given, for reference merely?

Mr. HARLAN. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. GARTRELL. I hope the gentleman will not object, as it is a local bill.

The objection was not withdrawn.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, in reply to the House resolution of the 16th instant, calling for information relative to the construction of the railroad from Dubuque to Sioux City, and branch from the mouth of the Tete des Morts.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the communication be referred to the Committee on Public Lands; and ask the adoption of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk:

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the communication of the Secretary of the Interior in reply to the resolution of the House of the 16th instant, calling for information in regard to the amount of land certified to the State of Iowa for building a railroad from Dubuque to Sioux City, and a certain branch therein named, be referred to the Committee on Public Lands; and that they be instructed to inquire into all facts in relation to building the said branch of the railroad, whether the main trunk or said road has been completed beyond the point of intersection of the said branch, and whether the said branch has been completed in conformity with the provisions of the act of Congress, and if not, to report such action to the House as may be deemed expedient and proper in the premises.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object to that part of it which instructs the committee. If we have given lands to a State, we do not want to investigate what the State has done with them.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think it is the duty of Congress to see that they have been properly applied.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I think that that is no part of the business of the Government or of the House.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Tennessee indicate the ground of his objection to the resolution?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. It is a resolution of instructions to the committee, as I understand. The gentleman can move to refer the communication, but not to give instructions.

The SPEAKER. Why not?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I do not think it is in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the resolution is in order. The paper itself was laid before the House by unanimous consent. This resolution proposes to dispose of the paper now before the House, and the Chair thinks it is in order.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Does the presenting of that message by unanimous consent make the resolution in order?

The SPEAKER. The presentation of the communication by unanimous consent places it before the House, and some disposition must be made of it. The gentleman from Illinois proposes to refer it with instructions.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move the previous question. I do not want to take up the time of the House in this matter.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. COBB. I hope the previous question will not be sustained until I make a suggestion.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is the resolution susceptible of division, so as to take a vote on reference, and then on the instructions?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. CLEMENS called for the yeas and nays on the motion to lay on the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 67, nays 80; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Atkins, Bocoek, Bonham, Bowie, Branch, Burnett, Clay, Cobb, Corning, Cox, Curtis, Dowdell, Elliott, Faulkner, Florence, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Greenwood, Hawkins, Hickman, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Jackson, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Leidy, Letcher, Maclay, McQueen, Mason, Miles, Montgomery, Niblack, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Purviance, Quitman, Reagan, Reilly, Ritchie, Rudin, Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Seales, Scott, Henry M. Shaw, Samuel A. Smith, Stephens, James A. Stewart, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Underwood, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Woodson, Augustus R. Wright, and John V. Wright—67.

NAYS.—Messrs. Abbott, Anderson, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Blair, Brayton, Bufington, Burlingame, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clemens, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Davidson, Daves, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Fenton, Foley, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gilmer, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Howard, Jenkins, Kelsey, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, Samuel S. Marshall, Maynard, Milson, Morrill, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Murray, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pike, Potter, Ready, Ricard, Robbins, Royce, John Sherman, Judon W. Sherman, Robert Smith, William Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Warren, Ellihue B. Washburne, Wilson, Wood, and Zollicoffer—80.

So the House refused to lay the whole subject on the table.

Pending the vote,

Mr. JACKSON stated that his colleague, Mr. CRAWFORD, was detained from the Hall by indisposition.

Mr. FLORENCE stated that his colleague, Mr. PHILLIPS, was necessarily absent, and had paired off with his colleague, Mr. EDIE; and that his other colleague, Mr. LANDY, had been called home by sickness in his family.

Mr. HOPKINS stated that his colleague, Mr. EDMUNDSON, was absent on account of indisposition.

The question recurred on the demand for the previous question.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to say a word on this matter, and I hope the previous question will not be seconded.

The previous question was seconded; there being, on a division—yeas 86, nays 50; and the main question was ordered.

The question was taken on the resolution; and the Speaker announced that the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HUGHES. I called for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear the gentleman; and the Chair is of opinion that if the gentleman had risen in his seat he would have both seen and heard him.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. The gentleman certainly did call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HUGHES. I did rise in my seat.

The SPEAKER. The Chair begs pardon for not seeing the gentleman in time. It is now too late to correct the error. The result of the vote has been announced.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. MONTGOMERY called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was taken; and the latter motion was agreed to—there being on a division, yeas 92, nays 42.

PACIFIC INDIANS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior requesting an additional appropriation for the bureau of Indian affairs, on account of the Indians on the Pacific coast; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

EXTENSION OF DEBATE.

Mr. LETCHER. There has been, I believe, a general understanding, on all sides of the House, that the debate on the Kansas question shall go on for some days yet. In order that that understanding may be fairly executed, I ask the unanimous consent of the House that the time for debate upon the deficiency bill shall be extended until this day week.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I object.

Mr. LETCHER. I hope the House will take notice where the objection comes from.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. FLORENCE. I move that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. ADRAIN. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will withdraw his objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If I understand the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia, it is, that instead of closing the debate upon the deficiency bill upon the adjournment of the House to-day, it shall be closed on the adjournment of the House on next Friday; that the general debate upon Kansas shall progress until one o'clock on Thursday next, when the Kansas bill shall be taken up and disposed of.

Mr. GROW. The statement of the gentleman from Tennessee is correct, with the exception of the last portion of it. I have no objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia. I understood the agreement to be, that no motion shall be made in reference to the Kansas bill until one o'clock on Thursday, when the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] proposes to make a motion to take it up, and the whole matter will be under the rules of the House.

Mr. LETCHER. Certainly, that is my understanding.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. At the suggestion of gentlemen around me, I will withdraw my objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia.

No further objection being made, it was Ordered, That the general debate upon the deficiency bill be closed on Friday next at the adjournment of the House.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Tennessee. I ask the consent of the House to make a report from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions. I will state that I was not in the House when the committees were last called for reports.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I must object, unless all the committees can be called.

Mr. MAYNARD. I appeal to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLORENCE] to withdraw his motion for a few minutes, to allow the committees to be called for reports of private bills, so that the bills may be placed on the Private Calendar, and be printed.

Mr. FLORENCE. I should have no objection, if there was any hope of calling the committees for reports. I have no hope of being able to go to the consideration of private business at all to-day, but I felt it my duty to make the motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that, if the motions to go into committee are withdrawn, the call of the committees for reports of private business will be first in order; and, in the opinion of the Chair, the call may be gone through with in twenty minutes.

Mr. FLORENCE. If the gentleman from Tennessee will withdraw his motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, I will withdraw my motion.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I think the vote had better be taken upon the motion.

Mr. FLORENCE. Then, I insist upon my motion.

The motion to go into Committee of the Whole House was not agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I will withdraw the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, until the committees have been called for reports.

The SPEAKER then proceeded to call the committees for reports.

PETER PARKER.

Mr. MAYNARD, from the Committee of Claims, reported back a bill (C. C. No. 85) for the relief of Peter Parker; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

FERDINAND COXE.

Mr. MAYNARD, from the same committee, reported back a bill (C. C. No. 84) for the relief of Ferdinand Coxe; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SAMUEL ANGUS.

On motion of Mr. DAVIDSON, it was Ordered, That the Committee of Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the petition and papers of Samuel Angus, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

JOHN SHAW.

On motion of Mr. DAVIDSON, it was Ordered, That the Committee of Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the petition and papers of John Shaw, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ASSIGNEES OF HUGH GLENN.

Mr. MAYNARD, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the assignees of Hugh Glenn; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

J. C. G. KENNEDY.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of J. C. G. Kennedy; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania, moved that the bill be referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I have some papers which I should like to go with that report, and be printed. They are from the Department; and there is a letter from a gentleman of this city who has charge of this property. I should like them to go with the report and be printed, so that the House may have all the facts before it.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. I will say that our report embraces substantially all the papers which were before the committee. I do not know that it would be right that the House should print papers which were not before the committee.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I should like to have them printed, so that we could all see them when the case comes up. They are from the Department, with a letter from the agent of the property.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. They can be used in the House when the question comes up, and I therefore object.

Mr. HOUSTON. Would it not be competent for the House to order the printing of the papers as a separate proposition?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see how the gentleman could get the papers before the House at this time, unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee of Claims, with the papers I send to the Clerk. I ask that they be read, in order that the House may know what it is referring.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can refer his papers under the rule, but the Chair does not see how they can be referred with the motion he makes.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. If the provisions of the bill be stated, there will not perhaps be any further objection to it. It does not propose to appropriate any specific sum. It refers this case to the Secretary of the Treasury, and authorizes him to take rule on the contract made and damage done to the building rented from Mr. Kennedy, and to pay him any sum to which he may be entitled; no more and no less.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The papers which I hold in my hand are the report of the Secretary of the Interior in adjudication of this case, the confirmation of that report by the President of the United States, and a statement of the agent for the renting of this property, for which the Government paid the owner $1,700.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. Rather than occupy time, I will withdraw my objection.

The bill was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, and the papers sent up by Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM F. WAGNER.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of William F. Wagner; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH HARDY AND ALTON LONG.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Joseph Hardy and Alton Long; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana, from the same committee, reported adversely on the memorial of Alexander Turner; which was laid upon the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

ALEXANDER LINDFELDT.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana, it was Ordered, That the Committee of Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Alexander Lindfeldt, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ENOCH B. TALCOTT.

Mr. GOODWIN, from the Committee of Claims, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 77) for the relief of Enoch B. Talcott, late collector of customs at the port of Oswego, New York; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

BENJAMIN DOLE.

On motion of Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois, it was Ordered, That the Committee of Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of Benjamin Dole, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

SAMUEL A. FAIRCHILD.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Samuel A. Fairchild; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

E. H. FITZGERALD AND WILLIAM P. YOUNG.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois, from the same committee, made adverse reports in the cases of E. H. Fitzgerald and William P. Young; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

HALL NEILSON.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois, from the same committee, reported a joint resolution for the relief of Hall Neilson; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ELIAS HALL.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, an act (S. No. 68) for the relief of Elias Hall, of Rutland, Vermont.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. This case, I would say, is one which peculiarly calls for the immediate action of the House. The amount involved is very small, and the claimant is an old man of some eighty years.

Mr. RITCHIE. I object to anything out of the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman desires, he can ask that the bill be read a third time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would ask my colleague if the bill involves an appropriation of money?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. It does, to a certain extent, though it is not a regular appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. If it contains an appropriation, the objection of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is well taken, as it would require unanimous consent to put it upon its passage.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

Mr. RITCHIE. I will not withdraw objection until the call of committees for reports is finished.

The bill was then referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SHADE CALLOWAY.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 386) for the relief of Shade Calloway; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

D. O. DICKENSON.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of D. O. Dickenson; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN R. NOURSE.

Mr. COBB moved that the Committee on Public Lands be discharged from the further consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 408) for the relief of John R. Nourse, and that the same be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, from the Committee on Public Lands, presented adverse reports on the petitions of David Baxter, Joseph Brady, Launcelot Crane, J. D. Stewart, Joseph Weeks, and Michael Vandervoort, and certain citizens of Kansas, asking for bounty lands; which were severally laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MONTGOMERY, from the same committee, presented adverse reports on the petitions of John P. Bennett, Mary A. Vance, Richard S. Venables, certain citizens of New York, and certain citizens of New Jersey; which were severally laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

JANE SMITH.

Mr. COBB, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, Senate bill (No. 73) authorizing Mrs. Jane Smith to enter certain lands in the State of Alabama; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. WOOD, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, presented an adverse report in the case of William L. Dillard; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, presented adverse reports on the petitions of Seltis Prather, Elizabeth Westcott, and the administrator of Mary Clift; which were severally laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

HEIRS OF NEHEMIAH STOKELEY.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of Nehemiah Stokeley, a revolutionary officer; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

REPRESENTATIVES OF THOMAS WILLIAMS.

Mr. DAWES also, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Lieutenant Thomas Williams, a revolutionary officer; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. LOVEJOY, from the same committee, presented adverse reports on the petitions of Joshua Oldner, the heirs of Benjamin Harrison, the heirs of Augustine Willett, and the heirs of J. P. Harrison; which were severally laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

NATHANIEL HEARD.

Mr. CLAWSON, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of Nathaniel Heard; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. CLAWSON, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Revolutionary Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of the heirs of Nathaniel Heard, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

FRANÇOIS GUILLORY.

Mr. SANDIDGE, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs or legal representatives of François Guillory; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

JEAN BAPTISTE DEVIDRINE.

Mr. SANDIDGE, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Jean Baptiste Devidrine; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

LAURA MILLEAUDON.

Mr. SANDIDGE, from the same committee, reported back with a recommendation that it do pass, Senate bill (No. 81) for the relief of Laura Milleaudon; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

ANNA M. E. RING, AND OTHERS.

Mr. SANDIDGE, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, Senate bill (No. 185) for the relief of Anna M. E. Ring, Louisa M. Ring, Cordelia Ring, and Sarah J. De Lannoy; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN DICK.

Mr. SANDIDGE, from the same committee, reported back Senate bill (No. 70) for the relief of John Dick, of Florida; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

R. T. BIRCHETT.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana, from the Committee on the Judiciary, made an adverse report on the memorial of R. T. Birchett, assignee of Thomas H. Duval; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM B. TROTTER.

Mr. GREENWOOD, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, Senate bill (No. 52) for the relief of William B. Trotter; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and with the report, ordered to be printed.

JAMES G. BENTON AND OTHERS.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. As the committees have all been called, I move that the House proceed to take up private bills from the Senate upon the Speaker's table, and refer them.

The motion was agreed to; and the following bills were taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred as indicated below:

An act (S. No. 58) to authorize and direct the settlement of the accounts of Ross Wilkins, James Witherell, and Solomon Sibley. Referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

An act (S. No. 137) for the relief of the heirs-at-law of the late Abigail Nason, sister and devisee of John Lord, deceased. Referred to the Committee of Claims.

An act (S. No. 194) for the relief of James Bawden. Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

An act (S. No. 167) for the relief of the owners of the bark Atica, of Portland, Maine. Referred to the Committee on Commerce.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, one of their clerks, informing the House that the Senate had passed the following acts and joint resolutions; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

An act (S. No. 161) for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union;

An act (S. No. 117) for the relief of William Allen, of Portland, in the State of Maine;

An act (S. No. 210) to create additional land districts in the State of California, and for other purposes; and

A resolution (S. No. 24) authorizing Lieutenant William N. Jeffers to accept a sword of honor from her Majesty the Queen of Spain.

Mr. LETCHER. I now renew my motion that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. COBB. I ask the gentleman from Virginia to withdraw his motion until I can make a motion to refer the bill which has just come from the Senate, in relation to additional land districts in California, to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. LETCHER. Very well.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I move that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. COBB. I will not press my motion to refer, and when the bill comes up, if there is no objection to it, I will move to put it on its passage.

The motion of Mr. CHAFFEE was not agreed to.

The motion of Mr. LETCHER was agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Boccock in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the deficiency bill.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, owing to the disadvantages under which I appear to address the committee on the subject of Kansas at this time—exhausted as it seems to be—I can but little hope to impart new interest and new light to the subject. Still, however, I propose to ask the attention of the committee to those views which I shall present, trusting that, if they shall not be convincing, they will not be entirely without profit.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it will be necessary, according to the view which I take, and in view of the short time now allotted to me, to avail myself of future occasions to complete that which I will not now, perhaps, be able to accomplish.

I beg leave to ask the attention of the committee to a few anterior facts—historical now, but important by way of answer to some of the objections that have been taken in connection with this matter. It is known to the committee as a historical fact that we acquired Louisiana on the 30th of April, 1803, by purchase from the French Republic, at a price of $11,250,000. I shall not pause to comment on the then condition of that territory, nor shall I pause with any other view than simply to refer to a clause of the treaty stipulating that the people of that territory should have all the rights of American citizenship. That clause is as follows:

"The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated into the Union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States; and in the mean time they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion they profess."

Suffice it to say now that the condition of that territory is to be found, by common consent, in the necessity which was afterwards deemed to exist, of providing by actual legislation to change its character. It was in the year 1820 that the Congress of the United States deemed it necessary to change the character of that territory by what is called the Missouri compromise, or, more properly speaking, restriction. I say "more properly speaking" because there is nothing of compromise in the eighth section, to which such frequent reference is had, but simply a restriction.

I suppose that the committee will readily perceive that there was a necessity for that restriction. They will also readily perceive that, without that restriction, there would have been none of the present difficulties that have torn and rended the country asunder, and endangered its peace and repose. Passing on from that subject, however, and having thus briefly adverted to it, in order to present a connected view, we come to the year 1853.

On the 5th of December, 1853, Senator Dodge, of Iowa, gave notice of his purpose to introduce a bill for the formation of a territorial government for the Territory of Nebraska.

On the 14th of December, on leave, Mr. Dodge introduced his bill; and it was referred to the Committee on Territories. On the 4th of January, 1854, Mr. DOUGLAS, the chairman of that committee, reported said bill with amendments, and five thousand copies of the bill, amendments, and report, were ordered to be printed. On the 16th of January, Mr. Dixon, a Senator from Kentucky, at that time a Whig, and, for aught I know, still a Whig, stated that he should offer the following amendment when the bill came up:

"Sec. 22. Be it further enacted, That so much of the eighth section of the act approved March 6, 1820, entitled 'An act to authorize the people of the Missouri Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and to prohibit slavery in certain Territories,' as declares 'that in all the territory ceded by France to the United States, under the name of Louisiana, which lies north of 36° 30' north latitude, slavery and involuntary servitude, otherwise than in punishment of crimes whereof the parties shall have been duly convicted, shall be forever prohibited,' shall not be so construed as to apply to the Territory contemplated by this act, or to any other Territory of the United States; but that the citizens of the several States or Territories shall be at liberty to take and hold their slaves within any of the Territories of the United States, or of the States to be formed therefrom, as if the said act entitled as aforesaid, approved as aforesaid, had never been passed."

On the day following, Mr. SUMNER gave notice of his purpose to offer a counter proposition. On the 20th of January, Mr. DOUGLAS proposed to divide Nebraska, so as to make an additional Territory, to be called Kansas; and the result was that the act creating territorial governments for Nebraska and Kansas passed on the 30th of May, 1854.

I mention these facts, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, for the purpose of letting the committee see and understand the true origin of this matter, its real patrons, and the manner in which it comes before the country. In this connection, also, it is well known, a very exciting debate sprang up; and the Democratic party, at that time in strong ascendancy in the Halls of Congress, was overthrown in the country. The elections that ensued for members of the Thirty-Fourth Congress resulted in the overthrow of the Democratic party, and, as it was thought, never to rise again. But, thank God, there is vitality enough in that great party—founded on sound principles and in popular sympathies—to enable it to defy its enemies and to recover any ground it may, on particular occasions, lose. After the election of members to the Thirty-Fourth Congress the sober second thought of the people seemed to have returned; and they sent to this Hall for this, the Thirty-Fifth Congress, a large majority, as it was believed, of those who would represent their sentiments and carry out the policy that was inaugurated in 1854.

President Buchanan, in his last annual message, adverting to the condition of things in Kansas, which is the great and absorbing question now agitating the country, indicated his purposes and opinions; without, however, recommending any particular policy, as he could not do, of course, in consequence of not having any basis on which to justify it. That recommendation, or that intimation of a purpose and policy, was, as we all know, fiercely seized upon and denounced by gentlemen who had been heretofore acting with us on this subject. It was a matter of astonishment in the country, that in this and in the other House of Congress there should have been hostility indicated to the views of the President in connection with this subject, which was wholly inconsistent, according to the general sentiment of the country, with the past history of the party. But so it is. On the 2d of February, 1858, the Leecompton constitution—and I come to the term at once—having been received by the President, was sent to Congress with a recommendation that Kansas should be admitted under it. Previously to that, however—on the 21st of December, 1857—we had a memorial presented to us by the Delegate from that Territory, asking for the admission of Kansas under the Topeka constitution. That memorial was referred to the Committee on Territories. As I understand it, the census-takers, under the Topeka constitution, submitted the petition to the people of each county, and collected their views. I advert to it thus particularly, because the Delegate has indorsed it as follows:

"Memorial of 4,170 citizens of Kansas, asking that Kansas may be admitted into the Union under the Topeka constitution."

I say, without dwelling on this subject, that here is an important fact, at least in reference to the strength of one party of that Territory; which fact I shall hereafter use.

What, then, is the condition of things? We have two applications before us; one to admit Kansas into the Union under the Topeka constitution, and the other to admit her under the Le-compton constitution. That is the issue before us. The President, having recommended her admission under the Lecompton constitution, and the subject having come to the attention of the State of Virginia, the Legislature of that State spoke on it. I refer to the action of that Legislature with some degree of regret, but still with pleasure. As one of her citizens and Representatives, I announce my readiness to sustain the policy which she promulgates.

The resolutions of the Legislature of Virginia to which I refer are as follows:

"1. Resolved, That in the opinion of the General Assembly of Virginia, the conclusion to which the President of the United States has arrived, as expressed in his recent message, in favor of the admission of Kansas, as a State of this Union, under the Lecompton constitution, is just and right.

"2. Resolved, That Congress has no right to look further into the constitution submitted by the State of Kansas, in its application to be admitted into this Union, than to see that the said constitution is republican in its form.

"3d. Resolved, That it is due to the peace and harmony of this Union that Congress should speedily admit Kansas as a State, under the Lecompton constitution, without further conditions."

Thus speaks Virginia; and why did she find it necessary to speak upon this subject? Because of the words which a gentleman in high official position in our State had undertaken to speak as an individual, and not as the Governor of the State of Virginia, as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ENGLISH] supposes. This gentleman, in response to an invitation that was given to him to join in, on the 8th of January last, the celebration which was then to be held at Tammany Hall, uttered sentiments which it was deemed right and proper for the Virginia Legislature to disclaim; and hence the resolutions. I must be allowed to say that it was astonishing, it was amazing, that a gentleman holding his high official position, in a community where there was scarcely a diversity of opinion, should have allowed himself to utter such sentiments, and particularly on that day—on the 8th of January—the anniversary of one of the most important and patriotic events in our history. It was astonishing that he should have pronounced such sentiments as are contained in that Tammany letter. I will merely quote a line from Dr. Beattie's Minstrel, and pass on:

"Some deemed him wondrous wise, and some believed him mad."

Mr. ENGLISH. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I shall be very happy to yield to any gentleman if I am not to be restricted in my time.

Mr. ENGLISH. I merely wish to inquire of the gentleman whether he holds Governor Wise to be in or out of the Democratic organization?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Well, sir, I hold him to be outside the Democratic organization, and I do not hesitate to say it. All gentlemen who refuse to cooperate with the Democratic party in the great measures of the party, are necessarily outside of that party organization.

Mr. BURROUGHS. I hope the gentleman will not assail the Governor of Virginia.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I am surprised that the gentleman should have supposed that I had assailed the Governor of Virginia. I am protecting the Governor of Virginia from being assailed. I speak of Henry A. Wise, and not the Governor of Virginia, as being outside the Democratic party. Or rather, I say he is outside the Democratic organization, it may be not outside the Democratic party. Gentlemen may fight on their own hook, if they please.

Mr. ENGLISH. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Is it to be understood that I am not to be restricted in my time? ["Yes," "yes."] I understand that I am not to be restricted in my time; then come one, come all, come every one.

Mr. ENGLISH. The gentleman says that Governor Wise is outside the Democratic party. Now I want to know if the gentleman supported Wise for Governor; and if not, whether the gentleman, in that act, was not himself outside the Democratic party?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I did not support Mr. Wise for Governor. But, sir, I never made war upon the Democratic party. What is party? It is a combination of individuals entertaining a community of sentiment. I respectfully submit to the gentleman from Indiana, that this is the only true and proper test. It is an association of individuals for carrying out the great interests of the country in a particular line of policy from a community of opinions and sentiments. If there be no such community of opinion and sentiment upon the part of a gentleman with a particular party, how can he be considered as within that party organization? Look at the condition of things at this particular time. In the two Houses of Congress it was supposed one hundred and sixty-five gentlemen entertained such sentiments. Twenty-five of them perhaps, unexpectedly, broke off from that party and assailed it as entertaining unsound sentiments. And these gentlemen turn round, as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DAVIS] last night did, and undertake to lecture the great body of their former friends. Absolutely, the gentleman from Indiana lectures the Democratic party in this House.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I ask the gentleman from Virginia to state in what I undertook to lecture the Democratic party, and in what I differ from the Democratic party?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Well, sir, any one who listened to the speech of the gentleman from Indiana last night, could not fail to see in what the gentleman differed with the Democratic party. I have not time to enumerate all the points of difference.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I hope the gentleman will specify.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. The gentleman certainly did this much: he said he could not vote for the Lecompton constitution. That is a measure of the Democratic party, vital in character.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I hope the gentleman will allow me to make one remark right here. The gentleman from Virginia has no right to read me out of the Democratic party, nor has he any right to read any other gentleman in this House out of the party. And I desire to say, further, that as far as the Democratic party of the North are concerned, I believe that nine tenths of that party hold the same sentiments as I do upon this question; and if anybody has the right to read out, we have the right to read the gentleman out of the party.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Exactly. There it is. The gentleman reminds me very much of a man on a jury case in which I was once engaged professionally. There were twelve jurors; the case was a very important one; it was elaborately discussed, and was, of course, referred to the jury for consideration after the argument had closed. It was reported to the judge that the jury could not agree, and they were at length called in, to see if their objections could not be harmonized. They came in accordingly, and one of the jurors stated to the court that he could not agree with the other jurors in their verdict; that they were eleven of the most stubborn men he had ever had anything to do with in his life. [Laughter.]

Now, that is precisely the case with the gentleman from Indiana. He and a few other gentlemen have undertaken to dissent from the great body of the Democratic party, and then they come here and lecture the Democratic party for holding unsound sentiments.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I will ask the gentleman whether he has not, time and again, in Virginia, run as an independent candidate against the Democratic party and the Democratic organization?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Never, sir.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. That has been my understanding.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. -It is like a great deal of the gentleman's understanding—unsound. I will say that I have never run against the Democratic organization, although I have been tempted to do it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. Tempted!

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Tempted, but failed not. The gentleman from Indiana will understand the virtue of the trial, because he himself has not at all times resisted temptation.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. The gentleman says that I have not always resisted temptation. I would like him to point to a single vote of mine during my five years' service in this Hall, that has not been with the Democratic party on all questions, including the fugitive slave law and everything else.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I ask the gentleman, since he brought himself into this colloquy, how he is going to vote now? Has he not told us that he was going to vote against the Lecompton constitution? And has not the Chief Magistrate, one branch of the Government, and the presumed head of the Democratic party, elected as he was by the Democratic party, recommended and urged that instrument with all his power and influence? Does he not know that if the bill is to be got through this House, it is to be got through by the Democratic party, with some few patriotic Know-Nothing votes, to whom he has referred in no complimentary terms?

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. Because the President has recommended this measure, is it necessary, therefore, that every Democrat in this Hall is bound to vote for it? That the President has a right to advise me, I admit; but he has no right to command me, against the will of my constituents; and, if that be the test the gentleman wishes to apply, it is, in my opinion, a political despotism.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. The President is the representative of the American Democracy, and was put into the executive chair for that reason. He was put into the presidential chair as the representative of the Democratic party and of the Kansas question in all its shapes and forms. He represents both now. The gentleman asks me whether I require every gentleman to conform to the President's opinions? I do not ask him to conform to the President's opinions at all. The gentleman can do it or not. He is an American freeman, and has the right to independent thought and action. But the gentleman speaks one thing and thinks another. He professes to be a Democrat when he associates with those who are not. Do not affect to be a Democrat, I will tell the gentleman, when you refuse to cooperate with those who are struggling to carry out the policy on which you and others were elected.

Mr. CHAIRMAN, what are the facts in the gentleman's case? He was here on the passage of the Nebraska bill. He was here in the Thirty-Third Congress, and upon the anxious bench. Last night he told us he was zealous in favor of the passage of that bill. At the next election he was beaten. He was one of those who went down before the combined hosts of fanaticism, but the returning wave bore him into this Hall. He came here upon the full tide of Democratic will. He came here to do what? To pursue the policy of 1854, or did he come here to pursue the policy of those who beat him in 1855, and those who are his associates now—they encircling him now, and prompting his answers?

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I came here to carry out the principles of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, for which I voted. I came here to carry out the recommendations of the President on that subject. I intend to carry them out—those I mean, which he made up to the middle of November, when he saw proper to change front on this question.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Exactly; that is the language of rebellion. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. It is the language of a freeman, and not the language of a slave. [Cries of "Good!"]

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I have accorded that the gentleman had the right to go against this bill if he chose to.

Mr. CHAIRMAN, I will resume my remarks where I left them off when I was interrupted.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the gentleman acknowledge the President as a good Democrat?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. If I wanted proof that he was, I would only have to remember that the gentleman opposed him. I know, too, that often we can tell who men are when we are away from them and are not acquainted with them, by learning the company they keep.

The CHAIRMAN. Before there is further interruption to the gentleman's remarks, the Chair would like to understand what is the nature of the understanding of the committee. At an early stage of his speech the gentleman from Virginia said that he would not object to interruption if it was not to come out of his time. Is this the understanding?

Mr. ENGLISH. It is my understanding.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I hope we shall have no such understanding as that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to know how he is to be regulated in determining when the time of the gentleman from Virginia is to expire?

Mr. HOUSTON. At the end of his hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that a contrary concession has been already made. The gentleman from Virginia in an early part of his speech asked whether these interruptions were to come out of his time, and stated that he would not yield provided that they were to be deducted from his time. No objection was made to their being so deducted.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am willing, as he has acted under a misapprehension, that he should be allowed for the time he has been interrupted thus far, but no further.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman has been interrupted ten minutes, and will allow that length of time.

Mr. CLEMENS. Say fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Fifteen minutes will be allowed by consent of the committee.

No objection was made.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I do not understand that there is any power to reclaim a grant already made. It was conceded that I should go on without having the interruptions deducted, and I desire to be interrogated. I stand here with as great purity of purpose as any man, and I desire to be interrupted if it be the pleasure of gentlemen to do so. I understand that I was to be allowed for such interruptions, and that concession having been made, it cannot be recalled except by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state to the gentleman from Virginia, that it is suggested that his proposition was not distinctly heard. The Chair did not make any proposition to the committee, and no proposition of the Chair was conceded to, and therefore, it was not considered as a binding proposition. Gentlemen of the committee now seem to agree that the gentleman has been interrupted fifteen minutes, and the Chair will allow that additional time.

Mr. QUITMAN. I beg leave to say, lest my silence be misconstrued, that I do not think that these interrogatories are of any benefit to the country or to the House, and I shall object to them hereafter; though I do not wish to be considered as an objector to extending his time fifteen minutes for interruptions already made.

Mr. HILL. I desire to ask the gentleman from Virginia if the Kansas-Nebraska bill was not considered the true test of orthodox Democracy?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. HILL. Then I want to ask him which is the better Democrat—the man who voted for the Kansas bill, and now votes against the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, or the man who voted against the Kansas bill, or who, if he had been here, and had had an opportunity, would have voted against that bill, and now votes for the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I suppose the gentleman, as a practical politician, will have no difficulty in answering his own question. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." Here is a question in which great parties are involved, and in which it is well known that if one party prevails the other party is destroyed. That is the nature of the question; and the man that is a Democrat, a real Democrat, and who means to act with the Democratic party upon its principles in this hour of struggle, will not see it swallowed up by its enemies, and much less help devour it.

Mr. HUGHES. Suppose that upon some great question of principle, such as is involved in this question of the admission of Kansas, a number of gentlemen belonging to the Democratic party should voluntarily assemble themselves together, and hold meeting after meeting among themselves, for the express purpose of devising some concert of action in order to defeat the measure, and in caucus—not a regular caucus of their party—complete an organization of their own for the purpose of—

Mr. ADRAIN. Is the gentleman in order?

The CHAIRMAN. Not if objection is made.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I have not time to answer the question, in consequence of being restricted in time. Certain it is, that upon the great measure involving the important consequences to which I have referred, those who are not of us or with us, are against us.

Mr. FOLEY. I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I cannot be interrupted. I have not time.

Mr. FOLEY. I wish to ask the gentleman if Mr. Buchanan is the Democratic party?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I think he is the chief head and front of the great Democratic party; and if the gentleman is a Democrat, he must have voted for him.

Mr. FOLEY. I only ask for information, whether he is the Democratic party?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I say he is the great head of the Democratic party.

Mr. BOWIE. The embodiment.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Yes, the embodiment; and as the head is the great controlling power of the general physical system, so the President is the head of the great Democratic body, and is united to that great party to carry out a measure which they deem essential to their success.

But I was going on with the view of calling the attention of the committee to the acts of Congress for the last two or three years; but I have been so interrupted that I must do it briefly. I first invite attention to the condition of things after the Kansas-Nebraska bill was passed. Immediately after that act was passed, a combination was formed in this city, chiefly of members of Congress, of which Mr. Goodrich, of Massachusetts, was president, for the purpose of preventing slavery from going into Kansas. And here I refer to the testimony of Mr. Mace upon that point, which is clear and explicit. He says:

"Immediately after the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska act, I, together with a number of others who were members of Congress and Senators, believing that the tendency of that act would be to make Kansas a slave State, in order to prevent it, formed an association here in Washington, called, I recollect aright, 'the Kansas Aid Society.' I do not remember all who became members of that society; but quite a number of members who were opposed to slavery in Kansas, of the lower House, and also of the Senate, became members of it, and subscribed various sums of money. I think I subscribed either fifty or one hundred dollars—I am not now prepared to say which.

We issued a circular to the people of the country, of the northern States particularly, in which we set forth what we believed were the dangers of making Kansas a slave State, and urged that steps be taken to induce persons from the North, who were opposed to slavery, to go there, and prevent its introduction, if possible. We sent a great many circulars to various parts of the United States with that object, and also communications of various kinds. I do not now remember what they were. The object was, to have persons induced to go to Kansas, who would make that their home, and who would at all elections vote against the institution of slavery." * * * "The leading primary object of the association was to prevent the introduction of slavery into Kansas, as I stated during the short session of Congress, in answer to a question propounded to me by yourself, I believe. We believed that, unless vigorous steps of that kind were taken, Kansas would become a slave State. I do not remember the caption of the subscription paper. I think no other object was mentioned or specified, except the prevention of slavery in Kansas. I think that was the sole object of the movement."

The purpose is clear and manifest; and it fully appears from the evidence adopted in the Kansas report that such was the universal impression in Missouri.

In this state of things, it was naturally to have been expected that a counter movement would have been made. Accordingly a society was formed in Missouri, the avowed object of which was to resist the aggressive movements of the free States, and make Kansas a slaveholding State. When was this society formed? The Kansas investigating committee says, about October, 1854. (Page 3 of Report.) It says:

"About the same time, and before any election was or could be held in the Territory, a secret political society was formed in the State of Missouri."

What was the object? Mr. John Scott, especially referred to and relied upon by the committee, deposes as follows:

"I was present at the election of March 30, 1855, in Burr Oak precinct, in the Territory. I saw many Missourians there. There had been a good deal of talk about the settlement of Kansas, and the interference of eastern people in the settlement of that Territory, since the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill. It was but a short time after the passage of that act that we learned through the papers about the forming of a society in the East for the purpose of promoting the settlement of Kansas Territory, with the view of making it a free State. Missouri being a slave State, and believing that an effort of that kind, if successful, would injure her citizens in the enjoyment of their slave property, they were indignant, and determined to use all the means in their power to counteract the efforts of eastern people upon that subject."

And again:

"I do not think I would have suggested to any one in Missouri the forming of societies in Missouri, but for these eastern societies; and they were formed as but a means of self-defense, and to counteract the effect of these eastern societies; and I think it is the general expression, and I knew it is the ardent hope, of every man in Missouri, that I have heard express himself, that if the North would cease operating by these societies, Missouri would cease to use those she has established."

Here, then, are the movements on the one side and on the other, and they speak for themselves. Is it not clear that the Missourians acted in self-defense?

But that is not all. Even before the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, the Legislature of the great Commonwealth of Massachusetts incorporated a company for a like object.

Mr. DAWES. This statement has been made upon this floor so many times, and I have sought an opportunity to contradict it so many times, that the courtesy of the gentleman, I know, will permit me to say, that when the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. QUITMAN,] the other day, in justification of the course pursued by the Missourians, stated that before the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill—

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I hope the gentleman will excuse me. My time is quite limited.

Mr. DAWES. I will be very brief.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. But then I cannot spare time. I will yield if I get the liberty of extending my remarks. Will the Chair take the sense of the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the committee agree that the gentleman from Virginia shall have his time extended to the extent of these interruptions?

Mr. HOUSTON. I object.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I have here the testimony on the subject. It is to be found on page 873 of the Kansas report.

Mr. DAWES. Will the gentleman let me say—

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I certainly would be glad, if I had the chance, to accord to the gentleman what he wishes. Let the committee give me fifteen minutes for this colloquy.

Mr. HOUSTON. I object to any addition of time.

Mr. CLEMENS. I appeal to my colleague to allow the gentleman from Massachusetts to finish his sentence.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Very well.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Chairman, it has been so often declared here, in justification of the proceedings in Missouri, that before the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska act, the Legislature of Massachusetts incorporated a company with a capital of $5,000,000 "for the purpose of sending emigrants into Kansas, with a view, not of becoming citizens, but of shaping and controlling its institutions, and defeating the law," as was said the other day by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. BARKSDALE,] of which company it was said by his colleague, [Mr. SINGLETON,] that Mr. Mace acknowledged himself to be president, and it is now repeated by the gentleman from Virginia, that I know he will permit me to set him right. It is true the gentleman has an act of the Massachusetts Legislature before him, but I want to tell him that nothing was ever done under that act. There was never an organization under it. There was never a president of the company, nor any other officer, nor a dollar raised under it. And nothing was done by Massachusetts before the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska act, which, by any one, can be construed as has been charged.

One word more. To show the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BARKSDALE] that the object of the act, which I have said existed only on paper, could not have been that of "defeating the law," let me tell him that several of the persons named in that act as incorporators, were at the time, and have ever been, Kansas-Nebraska Democrats, and have basked in the sunshine of royal favor from that hour to this; and some of them represented the Massachusetts Democracy in the Cincinnati convention. It is but just to those men to say, however, that they are, notwithstanding all this, men of high and honorable character.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. That is enough. That is an argument. Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the gentleman [Mr. DAWES] is a Massachusetts man; but he is not acquainted with the legislation of his own State. He is alluding to the act of April, 1854. I know that, according to the evidence of Mr. Lawrence, there was no action had under the act of April, 1854. But I speak of the act of February 21, 1855. There was a company formed on the 24th July, 1854; and it was organized and went into operation under the act of February 21, 1855. Mr. Webb, who was secretary of the Emigrant Aid Company, in forwarding information to that company on August 14, 1854, says on that subject:

"No pledges are required from those who go; but, as our principles are known, we trust those who differ from us will be honest enough to take some other course."

Nor is that all. Mr. Amos A. Lawrence, in his testimony, (page 879 of the Report,) says that, while entirely disclaiming on the part of the company any improper interference in the internal affairs of the Territory of Kansas, or any design to control its political or social condition, they had always hoped and expected that the emigrants who went out under its auspices would favor the establishment of free institutions.

That is not all. He goes on and says:

"It determines in the right way the institutions of the unsettled Territories, in less time than the discussion of them has required in Congress."

Nor is that all. This company, which did not interfere with the question of slavery, which was simply an emigrant aid society, lays it down in these broad terms:

"And further, whenever the Territory shall be organized as a free State, the trustees shall dispose of all its interests there, replace by the sales the money laid out, declare a dividend to the stockholders, and that they then select a new field, and make similar arrangements for the settlement and organization of another free State of this Union."

In the face of these revelations, in the face of these plans and purposes, the gentleman [Mr. Dawes] dares to get up, and, in the face of God and the country, say that this emigrant aid society was organized without any reference to ulterior objects. I say to him and every man, I do not care what may be his political relations, that here was the inauguration of a movement fraught with the most fell purposes, and the necessary results of which were to work destruction on the most gloriously organized political power that the world has ever seen. I say, then, on this point, away with the frivolous objection that these were but emigrant aid associations.

Here, then, Mr. Chairman, is the point—and I desire to impress it on the mind of every person—that this hostile and aggressive movement on the great laws of settlement and emigration; this agitation this excitement, this war upon the peace and repose of the country, originated in this Hall, in Massachusetts, and elsewhere; in the free States, not in the slave States.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman does not understand—

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I cannot yield. I refer again to this celebrated Report, page 3. I do not treat this report as my Bible; for I tell you that a clear analysis of it shows that it is not entitled to any of the sacred character of that book. But here is what the report says:

"About the same time, to wit, October, 1854, and before an election was or could be held in the Territory, a secret political society was formed in the State of Missouri."

Not till October, 1854, did the Missourians—the much-abused and vilified border ruffians, as they are scornfully called—take any action. That was subsequently to the movement here—after the movement in Massachusetts, and when the emigrants were pouring into that Territory and indulging in vituperations upon the institutions of the State of Missouri. Then it was—according to the report of the majority—that the Missourians awakened to their condition, and began an organization for their own protection and safety.

Then how stands the question at this period in regard to this subject? Who is the father of this mischief and agitation? The Missourians? No. It is those who originated the movement here to defeat the free settlement of the questions involved in the Kansas-Nebraska act.

But what says Mr. DOUGLAS on this subject? I quote Mr. DOUGLAS because we have indorsed him once, and he is now indorsed on the other side. [Cries of "No, no!"] He says:

"When the emigrants sent out by the Massachusetts Emigrant Aid Company, and their affiliated societies, passed through the State of Missouri in large numbers on their way to Kansas, the violence of their language, and the unmistakable indications of their determined hostility to the domestic institutions of that State, created apprehensions that the object of the company was to abolitionize Kansas as a means of prosecuting a relentless warfare upon the institutions of slavery within the limits of Missouri. These apprehensions increased, and spread with the progress of events, until they became the settled conviction of the people of that portion of the State most exposed to the danger by their proximity to the Kansas border. The natural consequence was, that immediate steps were taken by the people of the western counties of Missouri to stimulate, organize, and carry into effect a system of emigration similar to that of the Massachusetts Emigrant Aid Company, for the avowed purpose of counteracting the effects, and protecting themselves and their domestic institutions from the consequences of that company's operations."

As far as he has spoken, he is the accredited witness of both parties.

Mr. STANTON. I beg your pardon.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Is it not so?

Mr. STANTON. No, sir. He is not authorized to speak for us.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I understand very well how the matter stands. Is he not promised by the New York Tribune, and by Mr. SEWARD, the great leader of the Republican party, that he shall have a fair participation in the honors of the party?

Under the Kansas act, A. H. Reeder, of Pennsylvania, was appointed Governor, and was confirmed by the Senate on the 29th day of June, 1854.

He did not reach the Territory until October, 1854. On the 10th day of November he issued his proclamation announcing that an election would be held on the 29th of November, 1854, for Delegate to Congress. At that election J. W. Whitfield received 2,258 votes, and all others 575 votes. In the executive journal of the Territory will be found the following entry:

"December 5, 1854.—On examining and collating the returns, J. W. Whitfield is declared by the Governor to be duly elected Delegate to the House of Representatives of the United States, and the same day the certificate of the Governor, under the seal of the Territory, issued to said J. W. Whitfield of his election."

It nowhere appears that General Whitfield's right to a seat by virtue of that election was ever contested.

Yet, says Mr. DOUGLAS, in his report:

"No sooner was the result of the election known, than the defeated party proclaimed throughout the length and breadth of the Republic that it had been produced by the invasion of the Territory by a Missouri mob, which had overawed, and outnumbered, and outvoted, the bona fide settlers of the Territory."

On the 8th March, 1855, the Governor issued his proclamation for the election of a Territorial Legislature on the 30th of March thereafter. The pro-slavery party prevailed, and instantly the cry of invasion was again raised. The Kansas committee, in their Report, page 10, say:

"The details of this invasion form the mass of the testimony taken by your committee, and is so voluminous that we can here state but the leading facts elicited."

The testimony referred to established on the part of the free-State men two resolves:

1. Not to be governed by the laws to be enacted by the Legislature just elected.

Dr. Wood testifies as to the determination of the Lawrence association, of which he was a member, as follows:

"They said there was no law in the Territory; that the organic act was unconstitutional, made so by the repeal of the Missouri compromise; and that they intended to form an association, and make and enforce their own laws, irrespective of the laws of Congress, until there could be a change in Congress, by which the Missouri compromise could be restored, and the organic act set aside."

"When the Legislature was about to be elected, they held a meeting, and brought out their candidates. After the Legislature was elected, and before they met, there were several meetings held in Lawrence, and at these meetings they passed resolutions declaring they would submit to no laws passed by the Legislature." "They resolved not to obey the laws that would be passed by the Legislature, and only obey their own provisional laws, until they could form a provisional government for the Territory."

"The first general meeting while the Legislature was in session, was held in Lawrence in July or August, 1855. Before that time their meetings had been of the association; but this was the first general meeting; this was the first meeting at which I recollect hearing Colonel Lane take ground in opposition to the laws that the Legislature, then in session, should pass. All the public speakers that I heard there said they did not intend to obey the laws that should be passed, but intended to form a provisional government for themselves."

2. To resist the laws that were passed. Upon this point Mr. Wood testifies as follows:

"After the Legislature adjourned, the first meeting at which I heard any declarations with regard to the resistance of the laws was held at Blanton's Bridge. Colonel Lane, Mr. Emery, and Mr. John Hutchinson addressed the meeting, urging the people to resist the laws, let the consequences be what they might."

"In private conversation with those men, they always expressed their determination to resist the laws, and said the officers and posse should not enforce the laws. They said they had a new code of laws called Sharpe's Revised Statutes, and they were going to use them in preference to any others. It was a common remark, that they would use Sharpe's Revised Statutes in preference to any others."

"I often expostulated with Lane, Robinson, and others, both publicly and privately, as to their course, and addressed the meeting at Blanton's Bridge in opposition to their course. They said they would resist the laws, regardless of consequences."

The free-State men held their first general meeting with a view to a State government on the 15th of August, 1855. The following preamble and resolution were there passed:

"Whereas, the people of Kansas have been since its settlement, and now are, without any law-making power: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we, the people of Kansas Territory, in mass meeting assembled, irrespective of party distinction, influenced by common necessity, and greatly desirous of promoting the common good, do hereby call upon and request all bona fide citizens of Kansas Territory, of whatever political views or predilections, to consult together in their respective election districts, and, in mass convention or otherwise, elect three delegates for each representative to which said election district is entitled in the House of Representatives of the Legislative Assembly, by proclamation of Governor Reeder of date 10th of March, 1855; said delegates to assemble in convention, at the town of Topeka, on the 19th day of September, 1855, then and there to consider and determine upon all subjects of public interest, and particularly upon that having reference to the speedy formation of a State constitution, with an intention of an immediate application to be admitted as a State into the Union of the United States of America."

At the Topeka convention, an executive committee was appointed, of which General James Lane was appointed chairman, who issued the following proclamation:

"To the legal voters of Kansas:

"Whereas, the territorial government, as now constituted for Kansas, has proved a failure; squatter sovereignty, under its workings, a miserable delusion; in proof of which it is only necessary to refer to our past history and our present deplorable condition. Our ballot-boxes have been taken possession of by hands of armed men from foreign States; our people forcibly driven therefrom; persons attempted to be foisted upon us as members of a so-called Legislature, unacquainted with our wants, and hostile to our best interests, some of them never residents of our Territory, misnamed laws passed, and now attempted to be enforced by the aid of citizens of foreign States, of the most oppressive, tyrannical, and insulting character; the right of suffrage taken from us; debarred from the privilege of a voice in the election of even the most insignificant officers; the right of free speech stifled, the muzzling of the press attempted: and whereas, longer forbearance with such oppression and tyranny has ceased to be a virtue: and whereas, the people of this country have heretofore exercised the right of changing their form of government when it became oppressive, and have at all times conceded this right to the people in this and all other Governments: and whereas, a territorial form of government is unknown to the Constitution, and is the mere creature of necessity, awaiting the action of the people: and whereas, the debasing character of the slavery which now involves us impels to action, and leaves us, as the only legal and peaceful alternative, the immediate establishment of a State government: and whereas, the organic act fails in pointing out the course to be adopted in an emergency like ours: therefore, you are requested to meet at your several precincts in said Territory hereinafter mentioned, on the second Tuesday of October next, it being the ninth day of said month, and then and there cast your ballots for members of a convention to meet at Topeka on the fourth Tuesday in October next to form a constitution, adopt a bill of rights for the people of Kansas, and take all needful measures for organizing a State government, preparatory to the admission of Kansas into the Union as a State."

While the Legislature was in session in July, 1855, a memorial to the Senate and House of Representatives was got up by the free-State party, from which I will submit sundry extracts:

"One of the States of our Union, strong in wealth, population, and resources, relying upon her accumulated strength of almost half a century, and taking advantage of our feeble infancy as a people, has invaded our soil, seized upon our rights, subjugated our Territory, and selected for us our rulers; intending also to dictate our laws and make us the slaves of their will. This may well seem an almost incredible thing in the nineteenth century, and in this republican Union, the peculiar and boasted land of liberty and self-government; but the evidence of it is as palpable and undeniable as the fact is bitter and mortifying to us and disgraceful to the public."

"This invasion of our soil and usurpation of our rights commenced in the first moment of calling these rights into action. The first ballot box that was opened upon our virgin soil was closed to us by overpowering numbers and impending force. It became not what Americans have been proud to designate it, the exponent of the people's will, but was converted into the sword of the oppressor to strike at civil liberty. So bold and reckless were our invaders that they cared not to conceal their attack. They came upon us, not in the guise of voters to steal away our franchise, but boldly and openly to snatch it with the strong hand. They came directly from their own homes and in compact and organized bands, with arms in hand and provisions for the expedition, marched to our polls, and when their work was done, returned whence they came. It is unnecessary to enter into the details; it is enough to say that in three districts, in which, by the most irrefragable evidence, there were one hundred and fifty voters, most of whom refused to participate in this mockery of the elective franchise, these invaders polled over a thousand votes." * * *

"On the 30th day of March last we were again invited to the ballot-box under the law, which we, in common with our fellow-citizens in the States, had, through your body, enacted." * * * "The occasion came, and with it came our invading and self-constituted masters in thousands, and with all the paraphernalia of war. They came organized in bands, with officers and arms and tents and provisions and munitions of war, as though they were marching upon a foreign foe instead of their own unoffending fellow-citizens." * * * "In the morning they surrounded the polls, armed with guns, bowie knives, and revolvers, and declared their determination to vote at all hazards and in spite of all consequences." * * * "It would be mere affectation in us to attempt to disguise the fact that the question of making Kansas a free or slave State is at the bottom of this movement, and that men who thus invade our soil and rob us of our liberties, are from the pro-slavery men of Missouri, who are unwilling to submit the question to the people of the Territory, and abide the compact between the North and the South which the Kansas-Nebraska bill contains." * * * "With a feeble and scattered community first struggling into existence, without organization, and almost without shelter, we are powerless to resist an old, strong, and populous State, full of men and arms and resources; and we therefore appeal to you, and through you to the people of the States. Remedy we have none." * * *

"We make now this last appeal, not to the North, nor to the South, nor to any political party, but to the representatives of the whole Union. We beg that no men will sport with our fearful condition by endeavoring to make political capital or build up party at the expense of our civil and physical existence. We want the men of the North and the men of the South to protect us. Through yourselves, their representatives, we appeal to their honor, to their justice, to their patriotism, to their sympathies; not for favors, but for rights; not for trivial rights, but for the dearest rights guaranteed to us by the Declaration of Independence, by the Constitution of the Union, by the law of our organization, by the solemn compact of the States, and which you pledged to us as the condition of our coming here."

An election for Delegate took place on the 1st October, 1855; "but," says the Kansas report, "the free-State men took no part in this election, having made arrangements for holding an election on the 9th of the same month." (Page 44.) It is, however, alleged that the citizens of Missouri voted at this election also. But the committee adds:

"Your committee did not deem it necessary, in regard to this election, to enter into details, as it was manifest that, from there being but one candidate, (General Whitfield,) he must have received a majority of the votes cast. This election, therefore, depends, not upon the number or character of the votes received, but upon the validity of the laws under which it was held. Sufficient testimony was taken to show that the voting of citizens of Missouri was practiced at this election, as at all former elections in the Territory."

It was on the 14th February, 1856, that A. H. Reeder presented his memorial contesting the right of J. W. Whitfield to a seat as Delegate from the Territory of Kansas.

Here then had commenced the work of rebellion and revolution. Here was a determination to defeat, by every means in their power, the will of the dominant majority. We all know the excitement which sprung out of this question, and the violent struggle which ensued here. A Democrat, or one professing to be a Democrat, on that day, did the ungrateful work of offering a resolution which was then the subject of a long and angry debate. It was on the 19th of February, 1856, that Mr. HICKMAN, of Pennsylvania, offered a resolution to send for persons and papers. It does seem as if there were always Democrats at hand to perform the ungrateful task. He offered that resolution, and it was openly charged on the floor of the House that that election had been carried by violence and fraud. Bear in mind that this occurred in February, 1856. The election of March, 1855, had taken place, and other elections had taken place, and grave charges of fraud at all of them were made. It was in view of these charges that Mr. HICKMAN made his motion and submitted, in support of his application, an elaborate report, (on the 5th March, 1856,) from which I submit the following extract:

"The relative position of the contesting parties, and the disputed questions of fact, appear in the memorial of the contestant, who denies the entire validity of the election law under which the sitting Delegate obtained the certificate of the Governor of the Territory. This denial is based on the alleged fact that the Legislature which passed it was imposed upon the people by a foreign invading force, who marched into the Territory at the election, and seized upon the powers of government which Congress had provided for the actual inhabitants; which powers, it is said, have been held and exercised ever since by these strangers to the soil, under no other title than that of a strong hand and superior numbers, and to the entire subjugation of the people of the Territory."

After making a long extract from Governor Reeder's statement, the report proceeds:

"These are startling allegations; and when the contestant offers to prove their truth, your committee shrink from the deep and solemn responsibility of declining to allow him the opportunity to do so, or of casting the least obstacle in his way. When facts are proclaimed to exist, striking at the very root of our institutions, and tending to the total subversion of republicanism, it is no time to be dredging among technicalities or abstractions, for the material out of which to construct equivocal objections."

Dunn's resolutions finally superseded that recommended by the election committee, and on the 19th March, 1856, passed the House.

Why were certain gentlemen then so hostile to looking into frauds? Upon every vote, steady as veteran soldiers, they struggled on.

How were these charges met?

Without dwelling at length upon all the evidence that might be brought to the work of demonstration, I will call attention to Judge DOUGLAS's celebrated report of March 12, 1856. Nearly a year had elapsed; every development that could be made touching the prior elections had taken place. In that report, the Senator reviews the whole subject with a giant's pen. I will give a few extracts as apposite to my present views. First, as to the immediate parties to the struggle in Kansas:

"The material difference in the character of the two rival and conflicting movements consists in the fact that the one had its origin in an aggressive, and the other in a defensive policy. The one was organized in pursuance of the provisions and claiming to act under the authority of a legislative enactment of a distant State, whose internal prosperity and domestic security did not depend upon the success of the movement; while the other was the spontaneous action of the people living in the immediate vicinity of the theater of operations, excited, by a sense of common danger, to the necessity of protecting their own firesides from the apprehended horrors of servile insurrection and intestine war. Both parties, conceiving it to be essential to the success of their respective plans that they should be upon the field of operations prior to the first election in the Territory, selected principally young men—persons unincumbered by families, and whose conditions in life enabled them to leave at a moment's warning, and move with great celerity, to go at once, and select and occupy the most eligible sites and favored locations in the Territory, to be held by themselves and their associates who should follow them. For the successful prosecution of such a scheme, the Missourians, who lived in the immediate vicinity, possessed peculiar advantages over their rivals from the more remote portions of the Union. Each family could send one of its members across the line to mark out his claim, erect a cabin, and put in a small crop, sufficient to give him as valid a right to be deemed an actual settler and qualified voter as those who were being imported by an emigrant aid society."

"In tracing," says the Senator, "step by step, the origin and history of these Kansas difficulties," he adds:

"Combinations in one section of the Union to stimulate an unnatural and false system of emigration, with the view of controlling the elections, and forcing the domestic institutions of the Territory to assimilate to those of the non-slaveholding States, were followed, as might have been foreseen, by the use of similar means in the slaveholding States, to produce directly the opposite result. To these causes, and to these alone, in the opinion of your committee, may be traced the origin and progress of all the controversies and disturbances with which Kansas is now convulsed."

"If these unfortunate troubles have resulted as natural consequences from unauthorized and improper schemes of foreign interference with the internal affairs and domestic concerns of the Territory, it is apparent that the remedy must be sought in a strict adherence to the principles, and rigid enforcement of the provisions, of the organic law. In this connection your committee feel sincere satisfaction in commending the messages and proclamation of the President of the United States, in which we have the gratifying assurance that the supremacy of the laws will be maintained; that rebellion will be crushed; that insurrection will be suppressed; that aggressive intrusion for the purpose of deciding elections, or any other purpose, will be repelled; that unauthorized intermeddling in the local concerns of the Territory, both from adjoining and distant States, will be prevented; that the Federal and local laws will be vindicated against all attempts of organized resistance; and that the people of the Territory will be protected in the establishment of their own institutions, undisturbed by encroachments from without, and in the full enjoyment of the rights of self-government assured to them by the Constitution and the organic law."

"In view of these assurances, given under the conviction that the existing laws confer all the authority necessary to the performance of these important duties, and that the whole available force of the United States will be exerted to the extent required for their performance, your committee repose in entire confidence that peace and security and law will prevail in Kansas. If any further evidence were necessary to prove that all the collisions and difficulties in Kansas have been produced by the schemes of foreign interference which have been developed in this report, in violation of the principles and in evasion of the provisions of the Kansas-Nebraska act, it may be found in the fact that, in Nebraska, to which the emigrant aid societies did not extend their operations, and into which the stream of emigration was permitted to flow in its usual and natural channels, nothing has occurred to disturb the peace and harmony of the Territory, while the principle of self-government, in obedience to the Constitution, has had fair play, and is quietly working out its legitimate results."

Nor is this all. The Senator largely participated in the debates upon his report, from which I desire to submit several extracts.

In the 32d volume, part 1st, page 639, of the Congressional Globe, he says, on the day his report was submitted, in reply to Senator SUMNER:

"The Senator says he wishes emphatically to repel the assaults which he thinks the report makes on the emigrant aid society. What am I to understand by his denunciation of the report? He certainly does not intend to deny the truth of any one fact which the report contains! What, then, is he going to deny? Why this emphatic denunciation, when there is not a fact stated in the report which he does not know to be true, and which I will not prove to be true by official documents signed by the officers of the aid society itself? By his emphatic denial is the country to understand that he intends to disprove the facts? He knows the time will never come when he will controvert the truth of any one fact which is stated in our report with regard to the emigrant aid society? Whether their action is laudable or reasonable is another question; but that the charter is truthfully set forth, that its objects and aims are copied from its own official proceedings, and that every statement of a fact is truly made, cannot be controverted. This he knows as well as I do. I do not intend to allow denials of the truth of facts to be interposed to screen men from the consequences of their action, when that action is avowed and susceptible of proof; hence the Senator's denial cannot be interposed. It is a denial of facts which he knows to be true; it is a denial of facts which shall not be controverted. If, instead of denying, he proposed to justify them, I would willingly hear him; but he cannot be permitted to deny them. Our statements are based on the records of the legislative proceedings of the Senator's own State, and on documents attested by the signatures of the officers of the emigrant aid society. The facts shall not be denied. When he comes to offer his apologies, or his excuses, or his justification for them, I shall be glad to hear anything which he may bring forward in vindication of the enormity of their conduct; but let him not make broad denials unsupported by proof."

"The Senator says that we begin our game with 'loaded dice.' I understand that to be a gambler's phrase. He may be able to explain it; certainly it will require explanation before the majority of the Senate will be able to understand it. If he means that he is prepared to go to the country to justify treason and rebellion, let him go; and I trust he will meet the fate which the law assigns to such conduct. If he means that the hopes of his party are to produce a collision in Kansas, in which blood may be shed, that he may traffic in the blood of his own fellow-citizens for political purposes, he will soon discover how much he will make by that course. We understand that this is a movement for the purpose of producing a collision, with the hope that civil war may be the result if blood shall be shed in Kansas. Sir, we are ready to meet that issue. We stand upon the Constitution and the laws of the land. Our position is, the maintenance of the supremacy of the laws, and the putting down of violence, fraud, treason, and rebellion against the Government."

"The Senator stakes himself on the minority report. I say that report justifies foreign interference in Kansas; while the majority report denies the right of foreign interference. Taking that minority report, I can justify, under its principles, every act that has been done in regard to Kansas, either by persons from Massachusetts or from Missouri. The majority report denies the right of any man to violate the law, and to pervert the principles of the Kansas-Nebraska act, whether he comes from the North or the South. The minority report advocates foreign interference; we advocate self-government and non-interference. We are ready to meet the issue; and there will be no dodging. We intend to meet it boldly; to require submission to the laws and to the constituted authorities; to reduce to subjection those who resist them, and to punish rebellion and treason. I am glad that a defiant spirit is exhibited here; we accept the issue."

"I will say no more now. At an early day I shall take occasion to express my opinions on the whole question, if my health and strength and voice will permit; and I shall hold myself responsible to vindicate every position assumed in the majority report."

Mr. HARRIS, then and now a member of this House, on the 13th of March, 1856, made a speech on Kansas affairs, from which I propose to submit a few extracts:

"We have here presented, at the very threshold of our inquiries, a question of the gravest character. Can this House, in the exercise of its constitutional right of determining the election and qualification of its members, go behind the law of their election, and question the right by which the members of the Territorial Legislature held their seats? I deny the power of this House to do it; and were I, for the sake of argument, to admit the power, I hold that there is no reason why it should be intrusted to this Committee of Elections."

"But, sir, I am opposed to the resolution of the committee for another reason. I have no sort of confidence in the committee that desires to make the investigation. I should have no more confidence in the report which they would make than I have in the one they have already presented. Upon the ordinary subjects of legislation I would regard the investigation of a committee of this House with much respect; but upon an exciting political question, where a committee has been formed by you with two thirds of its members of the Black Republican stripe, who have been thrown in here themselves by the crazy current of anti-Kansasism, with the black flag of Abolitionism in their hands, I should have no more regard than for the babble of a maniac. The country would have no confidence in such a report. It is a one-sided committee, prejudiced upon one side—without, perhaps, being aware of it—and from them nothing could be expected but a one-sided report.”

“I then say that this whole movement was instigated, and has been prosecuted, with the objects of shaping the institutions of Kansas, and ultimately those of Missouri, and in keeping up a political excitement in the country, by which certain political leaders hoped to be advanced, and also to use that excitement in turning to good advantage the ‘almighty dollar.’”

In what has been extracted, it has been my purpose to show the positions taken by both parties, and have left it to be shown on the Democratic side by gentlemen then conspicuous in the Democratic party.

Has the Black Republican party reformed? Let us see. I have not Governor Geary's correspondence at hand; but I find one extract, which I cut from Mr. SHERMAN's speech, delivered on the 28th January last. He says:

“Governor Geary, in his letter to the President, of November 22, 1856, says:

“‘When I arrived here the entire Territory was declared by the acting Governor to be in a state of insurrection; the civil authority was powerless, and so complicated by partisan affiliations, as to be without capacity to vindicate the majesty of the law, and restore the broken peace.’”

On the 30th March, 1857, Robert J. Walker was appointed Governor of Kansas; and on the 31st of the same month Frederick P. Stanton was appointed Secretary of the Territory. Governor Walker did not immediately repair to his post. The Secretary of the Territory, announcing his arrival and the assumption of his duties as acting Governor, under date of the 17th April, 1857, says:

“It affords me great satisfaction to advise you that, so far as I have yet learned, the people of the Territory are entirely peaceable and quiet, and exhibit every disposition to remain so.”

Governor Walker, having reached Kansas in May 1857, assumed the duties of his office. In his letter of July 15th, giving an account of the state of the Territory, he says:

“Although still suffering from debility, as the result of my illness, I considered the crisis so alarming as to require my immediate presence at Lawrence, where I proceeded in company with Mr. Secretary Stanton, and after spending several hours there, ascertained to my entire satisfaction that all the facts communicated to me were true, and that this movement at Lawrence was the beginning of a plan, originating in that city, to organize insurrection throughout the Territory; and especially in all towns, cities, or counties, where the Republican party have a majority. Lawrence is the hot-bed of all the abolition movements in this Territory. It is the town established by the abolition societies of the East, and whilst there are respectable people there, it is filled by a considerable number of mercenaries, who are paid by abolition societies to perpetrate and diffuse agitation throughout Kansas, and prevent a peaceful settlement of this question. Having failed in inducing their own so-called Topeka State Legislature to organize this insurrection, Lawrence has commenced it herself, and, if not arrested, the rebellion will extend throughout the Territory.”

He then calls for troops, and a regiment being placed at his command, he proceeds:

“The regiment will be commanded by Colonel Cooke, who will act in obedience to my orders. I shall encamp in the immediate vicinity of Lawrence, and in a manner conformably to the law will put down, by military force, if necessary, this most wicked rebellion.

“In order to send this communication immediately by mail, I must close by assuring you that the spirit of rebellion pervades the great mass of the Republican party of this Territory, instigated, as I entertain no doubt they are, by eastern societies, having in view results most disastrous to the Government and to the Union; and that the continued presence of General Harney here is indispensable, as originally stipulated by me, with a large body of dragoons and several batteries.”

In his proclamation of the same date, after making most earnest appeals, he says:

“A rebellion so iniquitous, and necessarily involving such awful consequences, has never before disgraced any age or country.

“Permit me to call your attention, as still claiming to be citizens of the United States, to the results of your revolutionary proceedings. You are inaugurating rebellion and revolution; you are disregarding the laws of Congress and of the territorial government, and defying their authority; you are conspiring to overthrow the government of the United States in this Territory. Your purpose, if carried into effect in the mode designated by you, by putting your laws forcibly into execution, would involve you in the guilt and crime of treason.”

Governor Walker, in his letter to the Secretary of State, of July 20, 1857, says:

“There is imminent danger, unless the territorial government is sustained by a large body of the troops of the United States, that, for all practical purposes, it will be overthrown or reduced to a condition of absolute imbecility. I am constrained, therefore, to inform you that, with a view to sustain the authority of the United States in this Territory, it is indispensably necessary that we should have immediately stationed at Fort Leavenworth at least two thousand regular troops, and that General Harney should be retained in command.”

Again, in his letter of August 3, 1857, he urges a reinforcement to the already large body of troops in the Territory:

“The spirit of insurrection; of resistance to the laws, and to the territorial government, still pervades Kansas, and manifests itself in their newspapers, in violent harangues, in the enrollment and drilling of their troops, and in open threats for the use of the insurgent forces at the October election. Menaces, indeed, have been made in the most public manner, to drive the constitutional convention by force in September next from Lecompton. Under these circumstances, it becomes my duty to renew my request, so often made, that two thousand regular troops, chiefly mounted men, should be sent immediately into Kansas, together with two batteries.”

I have thus elaborately shown who was to be blamed for all the troubles in Kansas. Now, sir, what was the remedy, as openly avowed by all parties? A convention, a constitution, and admission into the Union as a sovereign State. Accordingly, on the 15th August, 1855, a general meeting was held by the free-State men, which initiated the movement which became general throughout the Territory. The delegates thus elected met at Topeka on the 19th day of September, 1855, and resolved upon a convention; and fixed upon the second Tuesday of October to hold an election for delegates to a convention to be held at Topeka on the fourth Tuesday (23d) of October. The convention met, drafted a constitution, which was submitted to the people on the 15th day of December, 1855, and adopted by a vote of only seventeen hundred and thirty-one, and ordered an election for State officers to be held on the 15th January, 1856. The Legislature then elected, besides various other matters, elected United States Senators, to one of whom, General J. H. Lane, was assigned the duty of presenting the new constitution and the memorial asking for admission into the Union. It was presented to the Senate, I think, on the 7th of April, 1856. It was declared in debate there to be vitiated by fraud and forgery; and, sir, the honorable Senator who presented it requested that it should be returned to him; and when it was returned, he gave it, in disgust, back to the man from whom he had received it. This constitution was urged as the sovereign remedy for all the ills of Kansas. The minority report of Mr. COLLAMER declares that “they saw no earthly source of relief but in the formation of a State government by the people, and the acceptance and ratification thereof by Congress.”

Mr. SEWARD avowed his readiness to receive it, even though the population of the Territory might not exceed twenty-five thousand souls. And this House, on the 30th of June, 1856, by a vote of 107 yeas to 106 nays, passed the bill admitting Kansas into the Union under the Topeka constitution. The Senate also passed a bill, generally called the Toombs bill, authorizing the people of Kansas to form a constitution. That bill, when introduced, had a provision that the constitution should be submitted to the people; but, when it was reported back from the committee, it was reported back with that provision stricken out. President Pierce had previously, in a special message, recommended it in the following words:

“This, it seems to me, can be best accomplished by providing that, when the inhabitants of Kansas may desire it, and shall be of sufficient numbers to constitute a State, a convention of delegates, duly elected by the qualified voters, shall assemble to frame a constitution, and thus prepare, through regular and lawful means, for its admission into the Union as a State. I respectfully recommend the enactment of a law to that effect.”

About the same time, the Territorial Legislature, at its July session, 1856, passed a law submitting the question of a convention to the people; the first section of which is in the following words:

“Sec. 1. That there shall be, at the first general election to come off in October, 1856, a poll opened at the several places of voting throughout this Territory, for taking the sense of the people of this Territory upon the expediency of calling a convention to form a State constitution.”

The election was held; and the people voted in favor of holding a convention. In accordance with this vote, the Territorial Legislature passed “An act to provide for the taking a census, and the election of delegates to a convention,” on the 19th February, 1857. The eighth section of said act provides that the delegates to the convention shall be elected “on the third Monday in June next.” And the sixteenth section provides that they shall assemble in convention “on the first Monday of September next,” (1857.) The election was held, and the delegates duly assembled. On the 7th of November, 1857, the convention completed its labors, submitting only the clause in reference to slavery to the vote of the people, which, it was provided, should be taken on the 21st of December following.

Thus every branch of the Federal Government, and every party in the Territory, although disjoined in action, agreed in the remedy for the pacification of Kansas, to wit, admission into the Federal Union.

Allow me to remark that both constitutions had been formed in peace. Both parties had held their preliminary elections without interference. There was no contest; no struggle; no collision; and it may be fairly inferred, in the absence of all motive, there was no fraud.

Both constitutions are now before this House; the Topeka constitution, framed by the convention called for that purpose, and the Lecompton constitution, framed by the convention also assembled for that purpose; and both very similar in their organization.

Was the Topeka constitution the emanation of legal authority? and does it represent the voting population, as recognized by the laws of the Territory? I quote from Judge DOUGLAS's report. He says, speaking of the Topeka movement:

“With regard to the regularity of these proceedings, your committee see no necessity for further criticism than is to be found in the fact that it was the movement of a political party, instead of the whole body of the people of Kansas, conducted without the sanction of law, and in defiance of the constituted authorities, for the avowed purpose of overthrowing the territorial government established by Congress.”

He further says, page 33:

“Your committee have made these voluminous extracts from the best authenticated reports which they have been able to obtain of the proceedings of the convention, for the purpose of showing that it was distinctly understood on all sides that the adoption of the proposition for organizing the State government before the assent of Congress for the admission of the State should be obtained, was a decision in favor of repudiating the laws, and overthrowing the territorial government in defiance of the authority of Congress. By this decision, as incorporated into the schedule to the constitution, the vote on the ratification of the constitution was to be held on the 15th of December, 1853, and the election for all State officers on the third Tuesday of January, 1856.”

Upon this subject I need say no more. Was the Lecompton constitution the emanation of legal authority? and does it represent, truly and fairly, the voting population, under congressional and territorial laws? It is known to us all that the Territorial Legislature of Kansas, at its session in 1856, passed an act submitting to the people, at the general election in October, 1856, “the expediency of calling a convention to form a State constitution.” That, in obedience to the will of the people, the Legislature, on the 19th February, 1857, passed a law providing for the election of delegates, to take place on the 15th June, and the convention to assemble on the 4th day of September thereafter. Great efforts were made to bring all parties to the support of those laws. On the 17th of April, 1857, Secretary Stanton issued his inaugural as the acting Governor of the Territory, in which he says:

“The Government of the United States recognizes the authority of the territorial government in all matters which are within the scope of the organic act of Congress and consistent with the Federal Constitution. I hold that there can be no other rightful authority exercised within the limits of Kansas, and I shall proceed to the faithful and impartial execution of the laws of the Territory, by the use of all the means placed in my power and which may be necessary to that end.

“The Government especially recognizes the territorial act which provides for assembling a convention to form a constitution, with a view to making application to Congress for admission as a State into the Union. That act is regarded as presenting the only test of the qualification of voters for delegates to the convention, and all preceding repugnant restrictions are thereby repealed. In this light, the act must be allowed to have provided for a full and fair expression of the will of the people, through the delegates who may be chosen to represent them in the constitutional convention.”

Governor Walker, in his inaugural of the 27th of May, 1857, says:

“But it is said that the convention is not legally called, and that the election will not be freely and fairly conducted. The Territorial Legislature is the power ordained for this purpose by the Congress of the United States; and in opposing it, you resist the authority of the Federal Government. That Legislature was called into being by the Congress of 1854, and is recognized in the very latest congressional legislation.”

I see in this act calling the convention no improper or unconstitutional restrictions upon the right of suffrage. I see in it no test oath or other similar provisions objected to in relation to previous laws, but clearly repealed as repugnant to the provisions of this act, so far as regards the election of delegates to this convention. It is said that a fair and full vote will not be taken. Who can safely predict such a result? Nor is it just for a majority, as they allege, to throw the power into the hands of a minority, from a mere apprehension (I trust entirely unfounded) that they will not be permitted to exercise the right of suffrage."

And adds:

"The people of Kansas, then, are invited, by the highest authority known to the Constitution, to participate freely and fairly in the election of delegates to frame a constitution and State government."

Senator DOUGLAS, in his celebrated Springfield speech, made within three days of the election of delegates to the Kansas convention, says:

"Kansas is about to speak for herself, through her delegates assembled in convention to form a constitution, preparatory to her admission into the Union on an equal footing with the original States. Peace and prosperity now prevail throughout her borders. The law under which her delegates are about to be elected is believed to be just and fair in all its objects and provisions. There is every reason to hope and believe that the law will be fairly interpreted and impartially executed, so as to insure to every bona fide inhabitant the free and quiet exercise of the elective franchise."

Well, sir, the Lecompton convention met; and on the 7th of November last completed their labors. A constitution was formed and adopted, except as to the slavery clause, and that was submitted to a vote of the people, to be taken on the 21st of December, 1857. Slavery was voted in by a large majority.

A violent outcry was raised against this constitution by those who had throughout refused to share in the necessary steps to its formation, and by Mr. DOUGLAS and his friends, who had previously and habitually denounced those thus refusing, as insurgents; a strange and ominous combination, of which we are now collecting the bitter fruits.

Mr. Chairman, every consideration that could influence a good citizen called for a speedy settlement of this territorial strife and agitation. It was an instrument of political mischief in the hands of designing demagogues, and was largely used to the disturbance of the public peace and the danger of the Union. Yet, Mr. Chairman, strange as it may be, it is a melancholy and deplorable truth, the Hon. S. A. DOUGLAS, of the State of Illinois, to the amazement of the whole country, with the exception of that portion of it in his confidence, on the first reading of the President's message, dissented from its Kansas policy; and charged the President with having committed "a fundamental error," in two days thereafter, in an elaborate speech addressed to the Senate. Various grounds of objection are taken by him; and among them, that the whole proceeding for a convention in Kansas is illegal, and refers to the case of Arkansas as in point, and in which the Attorney General gave his opinion. He says:

"But while the Attorney General decided, with the approbation of the Administration of General Jackson, that the Territorial Legislature had no power to call a convention, and that its action was void if it did, he went further:

"No law has yet been passed by Congress which either expressly or impliedly gives to the people of Arkansas the authority to form a State government."

"Nor has there been any in regard to Kansas. The two cases are alike thus far. They are alike in all particulars so far as this question involving the legality and the validity of the Lecompton convention is concerned. The opinion goes on to say:

"For the reasons above stated, I am, therefore, of opinion that the inhabitants of that Territory have not at present, and that they cannot acquire otherwise than by an act of Congress, the right to form such a government."

Again:

"If you apply these principles to the Kansas convention, you find that it had no power to do any act as a convention forming a government; you find that the act calling it was null and void from the beginning; you find that the Legislature could confer no power whatever on the convention."

In his celebrated Springfield speech he takes a different ground, and makes the following remarks:

"The organic act secures to the people of Kansas the sole and exclusive right of forming and regulating their domestic institutions to suit themselves, subject to no other limitation than that which the Constitution of the United States imposes. The Democratic party is determined to see the great fundamental principles of the organic act carried out in good faith. The present election law in Kansas is acknowledged to be fair and just—the rights of the voters are clearly defined—and the exercise of those rights will be efficiently and scrupulously protected. Hence, if a majority of the people of Kansas desire to have it a free State (and we are told by the Republican party that nine tenths of the people of that Territory are free-State men) there is no obstacle in the way of bringing Kansas into the Union as a free State, by the votes and voice of her own people, and in conformity with the great principles of the Kansas-Nebraska act; provided all the free-State men will go to the polls and vote their principles in accordance with their professions."

Governor Walker also took similar ground in his inaugural and in public speeches. In his letter of the 15th July last to Mr. Cass, he informs him of his discussion with one Mr. Foster, in which he speaks of the Michigan case having been quoted by him as a precedent in support of the free-State party. He then adds:

"I showed them that, in the case of Michigan, the Territorial Legislature were clothed by Congress with no authority to assemble a constitutional convention and adopt a State constitution; but that, under the comprehensive language of the Kansas and Nebraska bill, the Territorial Legislature was clothed with such authority by the laws of Congress, and that the authority of such a convention to submit the constitution to the vote of the people was as clear and certain as that of Congress itself, and that opposition to such a proceeding was equivalent to opposing the laws of Congress."

To this may be added the opinion of Governor Wise, who says:

"If the Kansas-Nebraska act did not enable the people to hold a convention, or to make laws for their own self-government, it has no virtue in it at all. The Kansas-Nebraska act organized a Territory, and the people thereof were enabled thereby to govern themselves. By their own laws they organized a convention to frame a constitution of State government. That convention was, therefore, de jure, legitimate. It formed a constitution, and had a right to form it."

And last, though not least, the views, strong and conclusive, of President Buchanan, in his special message, in which, speaking of the organic act, he says:

"That this law recognized the right of the people of the Territory, without any enabling act from Congress, to form a State constitution, is too clear for argument. For Congress 'to leave the people of the Territory perfectly free,' in framing their constitution, 'to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States,' and then to say that they shall not be permitted to proceed and frame a constitution in their own way, without an express authority from Congress, appears to be almost a contradiction in terms. It would be much more plausible to contend that Congress had no power to pass such an enabling act, than to argue that the people of a Territory might be kept out of the Union for an indefinite period, and until it might please Congress to permit them to exercise the right of self-government. This would be to adopt, not 'their own way,' but the way which Congress might prescribe."

But were there doubts about the necessity of an enabling act, it will be seen it was unnecessary, as there was no purpose to oust Federal authority in Kansas without the consent of Congress; and thus Mr. DOUGLAS might have been saved a large portion of his remarks. I refer to the sixth section, and so much of the seventh as is pertinent, of the schedule of the Lecompton constitution, as follows:

"Sec. 6. All officers, civil and military, holding their offices under authority of the Territory of Kansas, shall continue to hold and exercise their respective offices until they shall be superseded by the authority of the State."

"Sec. 7. This constitution shall be submitted to the Congress of the United States at its next ensuing session, and as soon as official information has been received that it is approved by the same, by the admission of the State of Kansas, as one of the sovereign States of the United States, the president of this convention shall issue his proclamation to convene the State Legislature at the seat of government, within thirty-one days after publication."

Here it is expressly and solemnly provided that the State shall not supersede territorial authority without the assent of Congress.

The next ground taken was that the constitution was to be submitted to the people, by the universal understanding of all parties. The position is put in the following words:

"I understand, from the history of the transaction, that the people who voted for delegates to the Lecompton convention, and those who refused to vote—both parties—understood the territorial act to mean that they were to be elected only to frame a constitution, and submit it to the people for their ratification or rejection. I say that both parties in that Territory, at the time of the election of delegates, so understood the object of the convention. Those who voted for delegates did so with the understanding that they had no power to make a government, but only to frame one for submission; and those who staid away did so with the same understanding."

He proceeds, and says:

"It is sufficient for my purpose that the Administration of the Federal Government unanimously, that the administration of the territorial government, in all its parts, unanimously understood the territorial law under which the convention was assembled, to mean that the constitution to be formed by that convention should be submitted to the people for ratification or rejection, and, if not confirmed by a majority of the people, should be null and void, without coming to Congress for approval."

Now the statement, in toto calo, is denied.

I have before referred to the act passed in 1856, submitting to the vote of the people the question of convention or no convention. In that act of eight brief sections, not a word was said about the powers of the convention. That was left to the general policy which had ruled on such occasions; and yet, in that act was the place for trammeling the convention. The people having voted in favor of a convention, an act was passed on the 19th day of February, 1857, providing for the election of delegates to such convention; but it did not provide for submitting the constitution, when framed, to the people. For that reason Governor Geary vetoed the bill; and yet the two Houses passed it by a constitutional majority, the veto notwithstanding. Governor Geary argues no other question, but says:

"Passing over other objections, I desire to call your serious attention to a material omission in the bill."

"I refer to the fact that the Legislature has failed to make any provision to submit the constitution, when framed, to the consideration of the people for their ratification or rejection."

On the 17th April, 1857, Governor Stanton, speaking of the above law, and urging the people to peace and union, says:

"I do not doubt, however, that, in order to avoid all pretext for resistance to the peaceful operation of this law, the convention itself will, in some form, provide for submitting the great distracting question regarding their social institution, which has so long agitated the people of Kansas, to a fair vote of all the actual bona fide residents of the Territory, with every possible security against fraud and violence. If the constitution be thus framed, and the question of difference thus submitted to the decision of the people, I believe that Kansas will be admitted by Congress without delay as one of the sovereign States of the American Union, and the territorial authorities will be immediately withdrawn."

Governor Stanton did not think the convention was expected to submit the constitution. All he expected was that the slavery clause alone should be submitted to the people. And such was the policy of Governor Walker, as it appears from sundry articles, which I will now submit:

"The St. Louis Leader contains in its issue of the 6th an article on the subject, which we recognize as proceeding from one of the ablest minds in the State; a man who has long stood at the head of the national Democracy of Missouri."

"Nearly a year ago, when Governor Walker passed through this city on his way to Kansas, he was free to unfold his plans to his political friends. In a conversation with him in the Planter's House we remember that he distinctly announced as his programme, that a constitution should be formed perfectly unexceptionable, ignoring the subject of slavery, and that a schedule should accompany it submitting the question of slavery to the people. We printed it in the Leader at the time, and it went forth to the world; it was published all over the country, both before and after that time."

Nor is this all. Governor Walker, appealing to the people, and presenting various and earnest views why they should go into the convention, and referring directly to the question of submitting the constitution, says in his inaugural of May 27:

"You should not console yourselves, my fellow-citizens, with the reflection that you may, by a subsequent vote, defeat the ratification of the constitution. Although most anxious to secure to you the exercise of that great constitutional right, and believing that the convention is the servant, and not the master of the people, yet I have no power to dictate the proceedings of that body. I cannot doubt, however, the course they will adopt on this subject. But why incur the hazard of the preliminary formation of a constitution by a minority, as alleged by you, when a majority, by their own votes, could control the forming of that instrument?"

And so late as the 10th September, in his proclamation, he said:

"The only remedy rests with the convention itself, by submitting, if they deem best, the constitution for ratification or rejection to the vote of the people, under such just and reasonable qualifications as they may prescribe."

But it is argued and insisted that the Kansas and Nebraska act requires the constitution to be submitted to the people. It is difficult to perceive in what part of this act that doctrine is to be found. Mr. Walker sums up his doctrine in his letter of resignation, as follows:

"It will be perceived that this doctrine, that 'sovereignty makes constitutions,' that 'sovereignty rests exclusively with the people of each State,' that 'sovereignty cannot be delegated,' that 'it is inalienable, indivisible,' 'a unit incapable of partition,' are doctrines ever regarded by me as fundamental principles of public liberty and of the Federal Constitution."

I very much incline to the opinion that the Governor expresses the true doctrine. I can cheerfully agree with him that sovereignty is "a unit incapable of partition." But, with concurrence in this sentiment or principle, how different our conclusions. He denies to this "unit" the right to depute power; and in so doing, shows that "sovereignty" does not exist. I contend that this "unit" has all power—can do by another what it can do by itself—and so is "sovereignty." What is sovereignty? It is uncontrollable power. And yet Governor Walker denies the right to "sovereignty" to delegate its power. In Athens, the people, thirty thousand voters, met and exercised sovereignty. It was a pure democracy; that is impossible with us. Neither in the States nor in the federation formed by them, is that possible. Representation is therefore a necessity, without which our institutions could not last a minute. Hence, the system of delegated power is as familiar to the public mind as household words. It prevails in every form of government known to the people. Nor is it true that a sovereign delegating power thereby parts with sovereignty. It is not the less his because he allows to another the privilege or the duty of using it; for the sovereign can discharge his agent and resume the power with which he had intrusted him.

The delegates who framed the Federal Constitution were elected by the Legislatures of the several States, not by the people; the Constitution was adopted by conventions of the several States, not by the people. The fifth article of the Constitution provides for its amendment by a convention, the acts of which are to be ratified by the Legislatures or the conventions of three fourths of the States, as Congress may prescribe, but not by the people; and yet the preamble to the Constitution proclaims it the work of the people. It says:

"We, the people of the United States" * * * *
"do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

Yet this language is used in the face of the facts stated, upon the well-known principle that what a man does by another, he does by himself—qui facit per alium, facit per se.

Let us look to the States, as divided by the Revolution. And first of the old States. There have been four constitutions in New York: the first two, that of 1776 and that of 1801, were adopted by the conventions; the other two, that of 1827 and that of 1848, were formed by conventions, submitted to and ratified by the people, because so required by law. In Pennsylvania, her only two constitutions were framed and adopted by conventions, and the latter is to this day in force, except in certain amendments that have been adopted by the vote of her people. The constitution of Rhode Island was the charter of a King, and it took rebellion and insurrection to induce that State to change her organic law. The Virginia Legislature resolved itself into a convention, on the 25th of June, 1776, and on the 29th of the same had framed and proclaimed, without popular intervention of any sort, her first constitution, under which, without any change whatever, her people enjoyed all the blessings of liberty for upwards of half a century.

Now to the new States; and I regard those as such which were admitted into the Union subsequent to the Revolution. The constitution of Vermont was "ordained" without submission to the people. This State is the birthplace of Senator DOUGLAS. Illinois did not submit her constitution to the people. This is the State of the Senator's adoption. The constitution of Missouri was not adopted by the people. Without further enumeration, it will be sufficient to state that a majority of all the States of our Union have, at some time, lived under constitutions framed and adopted by conventions, and without any test by the suffrage of the people. And yet they are not less the government of the people.

There is, then, nothing in the law, nothing in the precedents, which requires that the Lecompton constitution should be submitted to the people; and abundance of both law and precedent which left the whole question of submission to the people, in the discretion of the convention. The pledges of Calhoun and associates, when candidates for the convention, were obviously designed, like the appeals of Governor Walker, to influence the free-State men to join in the convention movement; but it utterly failed. They are content. And it is no little assurance on the part of the free-State men to complain of the violated promises of those whose persons they reviled, in whose elections they did not share, and whose work they intended, if possible, to destroy. Then why submit the constitution? They did their best to enforce their own constitution; they refused to participate in the vote upon a convention; they refused to participate in the election of delegates; they proclaimed bitter hostility to the Lecompton constitution; and it became an interesting question with the law-and-order party how their work could be saved from the effects of factious opposition, &c.

Governor Walker, among many other similar things, says:

"The spirit of insurrection, of resistance to the laws, and to the territorial government, still pervades Kansas, and manifests itself in their newspapers, in violent harangues, in the enrollment and drilling of their troops, and in open threats for the use of the insurgent forces at the October election. Menaces, indeed, have been made in the most public manner, to drive the constitutional convention by force, in September next, from Lecompton."

Governor Stanton says, in his message of the 8th December:

"I ascertained that designs of a most desperate character were freely discussed in their private meetings, and that violent measures had probably been agreed upon to be executed at a favorable time. It was to me certain that the mass of the people were determined not to submit to the constitution, nor to participate in the election, but probably to prevent its taking place. A large military force would have been necessary everywhere to enforce order."

"It thus appears that in the election of the 15th June last, for delegates to the convention, the great mass of the people purposely refrained from voting, and left the whole proceeding, with all its important consequences, to the active minority, under whose auspices the law had been enacted, and also executed, so far as that could be done by the executive officers, without the concurrence of the majority of the people."

Are these the people to whom to make concessions?

But, Mr. Chairman, a great outcry was raised about the manner in which the registry or census was taken. I have sufficiently shown that the law itself was unexceptionable—indeed it was a substantial copy of the Toombs bill, which Mr. HALE pronounced almost perfect. After providing in the first section that the sheriff shall proceed to take the census, the second section provides:

"In case of any vacancy in the office of sheriff, the duties imposed on such sheriff by this act shall devolve upon, and be performed by, the judge of the probate court of the county in which such vacancy may exist, who may appoint deputies, not to exceed one in each municipal township; and in case the office of both sheriff and probate judge in any county shall be or become vacant, the Governor shall appoint some competent resident of such county to perform such duty, who shall have the same right to appoint deputies, take and subscribe the same oath, and perform all the requirements of this act, as applied to sheriffs."

"Sec. 4. It shall be, and is hereby, made the duty of each probate judge, upon such returns being made, without delay, to cause to be posted at three of the most public places in each election precinct in his county or district one copy of such list of qualified voters, to the end that every inhabitant may inspect the same, and apply to said probate judge to correct any error he may find therein, in the manner hereafter prescribed."

"Sec. 5. Said probate judge shall remain in session each day, Sundays excepted, from the time of receiving said returns until the first day of May next, at such places as shall be most convenient to the inhabitants of the county or election district, and proceed to inspection of said returns, and hear, correct, and finally determine according to the facts, without unreasonable delay, all questions concerning the omission of any person from said returns, or the improper insertion of any name on said returns, and any other questions affecting the integrity or fidelity of said returns, and for this purpose shall have power to administer oaths and examine witnesses, and compel their attendance in such manner as said judge shall deem necessary."

It is difficult to conceive anything more fair and unexceptionable.

The census being taken and corrected, it is provided by the seventh section of said law as follows:

"It shall be the duty of the Governor and Secretary of the Territory, so soon as the census shall be completed and returns made, to proceed to make an apportionment of the members for the convention," &c.

I have thus shown that the law was ample and carefully framed. But it was said that the registry was imperfectly taken. Let us see whose is the fault. Mr. Stanton says, in reply to complaint upon the subject:

"It is not my purpose to reply to your statement of facts; I cannot do so from any personal knowledge enabling me either to admit or deny them. I may say, however, I have heard statements quite as authentic as your own, and in some instances from members of your own party, [Republican], to the effect that your political friends have very generally—indeed, almost universally—refused to participate in the pending proceedings for registering the names of the legal voters. In some instances they have given fictitious names, and in numerous others they refused to give any names at all. You cannot deny that your party have heretofore resolved not to take part in the registration, and it appears to me that, without indulging ungenerous suspicions of the integrity of officers, you might well attribute any errors and omissions of the sheriffs to the existence of this well known and controlling fact."

In his message of the 8th December, 1857, he says:

"In consequence of this embittered feeling, and the mutual distrust naturally thereby engendered, one of the parties, constituting a large majority of the people, refrained almost entirely from any participation in the proceedings instituted under the law aforesaid. The census therein provided for was imperfectly obtained from an unwilling people in nineteen counties of the Territory; while in the remaining counties, being also nineteen in number, from various causes no attempt was made to comply with the law. In some instances, people and officers were alike averse to the proceeding; in others, the officers neglected or refused to act; and in some there was but a small population, and no efficient organization, enabling the people to secure a representation in the convention. Under the operation of all these causes combined, a census list was obtained of only nine thousand two hundred and fifty-one legal voters, confined to precisely one half the counties of the Territory, though these, undoubtedly, contained much the larger part of the population."

In his New York speech, he said in reply to complaints about the registry:

"I said to them, gentlemen, you might have gone to the probate judges and had those names put on the lists. But they said it was not their duty to go; it was the duty of the officers to register their names. Now, it is useless for any of us to disguise the truth. The great mass of the free State people did not care a fig whether their names were registered or not; they were opposed to the convention; they were opposed to all the laws and all the proceedings under it."

But it is charged that about one half of the counties were without a census or a registry, and that it would be a great wrong to put a constitution on a people who had no share, and could have had no share, in its formation. This is strongly put, and is, in effect, answered by what I have just said. But I will examine into the subject still further.

The territorial law laying out the Territory into counties, names three—Washington, Clay, and Dickinson—which lie in the extreme western portion of the Territory, and, being without inhabitants, were unorganized. The law, therefore, providing for the election of delegates did not name them. Of the thirty-four counties remaining, the registry and return was made, as appears by the proclamation of Governor Stanton as follows:

No. of district.	Names of counties.	No. of legal voters.
1	Doniphan	1,083
2	Brown	936
	Neenah	140
3	Atchison	804
4	Leavenworth	1,837
5	Jefferson	555
6	Calhoun	391
7	Marshall	305
8	Riley	353
9	Pottawatomie	235
	Johnson	493
10	Douglas	1,318
11	Shawnee, Richardson, and Davis	283
12	Lykings	413
13	Franklin	no return
14	Four counties	no return
15	Two counties	no return
16	Lynn	413
17	One county, (Anderson)	no return
18	Bourbon, McGee, Allen, and Dorn	615
19	Five counties	no return
Total		9,251

By the seventh section of the election law, it is made the duty of the Governor to form these counties into election districts, and to assign to each district its share of representation. This duty was performed by Governor Stanton, as appears by his proclamation dated 20th May, 1857.

From this it will be seen, that of the thirty-four organized counties in the Territory, twenty-one were represented in the convention. Of the thirteen counties left, seven counties had scarcely any population, so small that they did not cast a vote at the election on the 4th of January, when the free-State men had everything their own way. Of the remaining six, at the election of the 4th of January, when the free-State men reported a much larger vote than ever reported before, the following is the vote:

Madison	50 votes.
Woodson	40 "
Franklin	304 "
Breckinridge	191 "
Coffee	453 "
Anderson	177 "
	1,215 "

I have sufficiently shown why those counties were not registered. But I will resort to more direct and positive testimony as to part of them.

It must not be overlooked that during the whole period of time up to the 7th of November, 1857, when the constitution was completed, neither Governor Walker nor Stanton ever found fault with the registry, but acted upon it, and urged, with extraordinary zeal, the formation of a constitution predicated upon that basis, ay, scornfully repelled objections made thereto by the free-State men. When, however, that objection was made by them, and pressed by others, with effect, the exposition already made became a duty, to which I will add the positive testimony of one George Wilson. On the 5th day of February, 1858, he, among other things, deposed as follows:

"At the time when the census was taken under the law providing for the Leecompton convention I was the acting judge of probate for Anderson county, Kansas, and am aware of the fact that the two wings of the free-State party in that county, composed of more moderate Free-Soilers and the adherents of Lane, threatened the life of any who should attempt to take the legal census; and I can say, under oath, that the life of any one making the attempt to execute the law in that particular was in danger, and the foregoing threats were the cause which prevented the taking of the census in Anderson county within the prescribed time."

"In regard to Passmore Williams, judge of probate for Allen county, members of the so-called free-State party stated to me in person that if he attempted to execute the law, and did not leave, they would kill him; and I know the fact that he did not so execute the law, and left the county, because he believed his life in danger. Mr. Williams is from Illinois, and is a free-State man, but belongs to the Democratic party."

"In regard to Esquire Yocum, judge of probate for Franklin county, he left the county and the Territory on account of losing his negro property and having his life menaced. The office being vacant, the Legislature which passed the census law appointed a new judge of probate and other officers, who refused to serve, alleging as a reason that they were afraid so doing would cost them their lives. Consequently, no census was taken, and no legal election held."

Governor Stanton says:

"In the other eighteen counties there was no census and no registration. I think it very probable, although I do not know the fact, that in some of these counties the officers were deterred and discouraged by the people from the duty of taking the census."

"I have no doubt it is true, that the great majority of the free-State people did not wish to be represented, and did not intend to be represented at all. They determined to hold off from it."

Nor was there any occasion "to hold off from it" from any apprehension of Missouri hordes. Governor Walker, in his letter of the 27th May to General Cass, says:

"There is no longer any pretext for the suggestion that any portion of the people of Missouri intend to invade the ballot-box at any election in Kansas."

Let me say here, also, that Mr. Calhoun wrote to Judge DOUGLAS, not as a Senator, but as a friend, stating the plan that was to be pursued, and asking his advice in reference to it. No answer to that letter was ever received, but the Chicago Times came out and indorsed the proposed plan. I state, as a fact which will not be disputed in any quarter, that Senator DOUGLAS, not as a Senator, but as a conspicuous friend of this gentleman, was written to in the month of September, asking his advice as to the course to be pursued in the submission of the constitution, and that he never responded to that letter by dissent or affirmation. I repeat, the Chicago Times, understood to be under his influence, was published, containing an article indorsing the suggestions of that letter. I have not time to go into this question as I would like; but such are the facts in relation to this matter.

What then, do we see? An overwhelming majority of the voters embraced in the registry, and the omissions in every material particular occasioned by the violence of those who now complain. In the Senate debate of the 4th March, Mr. HAMMOND said:

"Mr. President, in the debate which occurred in the early part of the last month, I understood the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] to say that the question of the reception of the Leecompton constitution was narrowed down to a single point. That point was, whether that constitution embodied the will of the people of Kansas. Am I correct?"

"Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator is correct, with this qualification: I could waive the irregularity and agree to the reception of Kansas into the Union under the Leecompton constitution, provided I was satisfied that it was the act and deed of that people, and embodied their will. There are other objections; but the others I could overcome, if this point were disposed of."

"Mr. HAMMOND. I so understood the Senator. I understood that if he could be satisfied that this constitution embodied the will of the people of Kansas, all other defects and irregularities could be cured by the act of Congress, and that he himself would be willing to permit such an act to be passed."

Away, then, goes the enabling act. Away the necessity of submitting the constitution. Away go all questions of fraud. The only question is, is the Leecompton constitution "the act and deed of that people, and embodies their will?" This is a grave question, and presents the real and substantial point in this discussion. What fact is it necessary to know? What principle is it requisite to adopt to enable us to know that the constitution of a State "is the act and deed" of her people, and embodies "their will?" The lawful authority of the Territory, at the July session of 1856, passed a law submitting the question of a convention to the people to be voted upon at the ensuing general election in October. The vote was taken, and the people decided to have a convention. This step was taken in the midst of the presidential election. The great Democratic party knew the vote that was cast—knew that one party held off claiming for itself to be largely in the majority; and yet they said that all was right and fair and proper. These are facts—undoubted facts. In pursuance of the will of the people thus expressed, the Legislature passed a law providing for the election of delegates to the convention. It was vetoed by Governor Geary because it contained no clause submitting the constitution to the people. It became a law notwithstanding; was approved by the Federal Executive; by Senator DOUGLAS; by Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton. These are facts. The election was held on the 15th June. The convention assembled—completed their labors on the 7th November last by adopting and ratifying the constitution in question, except the slavery clause, which was voted on by the people on the 21st December last. These are facts—every one of them; clear, undoubted, unmistakable facts. There is no controlling precedent or established principle which requires or forbids the submission of the constitution to the people for ratification or rejection; but, whether ratified by the convention or by the vote of the people, it is equally the act of the people, and equally authoritative and valid.

In our community of States, the people are known only when they speak at the polls. Any other mode of expression is unknown to our institutions; and any other mode of expression is sternly disregarded or rebuked. It is in this way that constitutional government is maintained, popular sovereignty preserved, and personal happiness promoted. On the 10th April, 1856, Mr. DOUGLAS, in his place in the Senate, said:

"I know of but two ways of governing men—but two ways by which men have ever been governed—by laws, or by force. If we give countenance to these people who disregard the laws, they will, of necessity, place themselves in a condition to be subjected to force only. What sanction has popular government but obedience to law? What security have we for government, if we disregard obedience to law? What is the great merit which we claim for our Government over the other Governments of the earth? That we are a Government of laws, and of laws only."

Was this doctrine sound in 1856? Is it otherwise now? Subsequent to this, and on the 12th June, 1857, at Springfield, Illinois, Mr. DOUGLAS addressed a large assembly of his countrymen. Having Kansas in view, and in express reference to the steps being taken for a convention and the extraordinary condition of things in the Territory, he carefully and deliberately said:

"If any portion of the inhabitants, acting under the advice of political leaders in distant States, shall choose to absent themselves from the polls, and withhold their votes, with a view of leaving the free-State Democrats in a minority, and thus securing a pro-slavery constitution, in opposition to the wishes of a majority of the people living under it, let the responsibility rest on those who, for partisan purposes, will sacrifice the principles they profess to cherish and promote. Upon them and upon the political party for whose benefit and under the direction of whose leaders they act, let the blame be visited of fastening upon the people of a new State institutions repugnant to their feelings, and in violation of their wishes."

Here the Senator, so recently as the past summer, recognizes the doctrine for which I am contending, and distinctly repudiates his present majority idea. Recollect that he himself states the points of this speech. He says:

"The points which I am requested to discuss are:

"1st. The present condition and prospects of Kansas.

"2d. The principles affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States in the Dred Scott case.

"3d. The condition of things in Utah, and the appropriate remedies for existing evils."

Governor Walker also says in his inaugural address to the people of Kansas, under date of the 27th May, 1857:

"The law has performed its entire appropriate function when it extends to the people the right of suffrage, but it cannot compel the performance of that duty. Throughout our whole Union, however, and wherever free government prevails, those who abstain from the exercise of the right of suffrage authorize those who do vote to act for them in that contingency, and the absentees are as much bound under the law and constitution, where there is no fraud or violence, by the act of the majority of those who do vote, as if all had participated in the election. Otherwise, as voting must be voluntary, self-government would be impracticable, and monarchy or despotism would remain as the only alternative."

It is difficult to conceive anything more explicit. This doctrine was officially avowed to the people of Kansas as a warning and a guide, and with a hope of inducing them to unite, but without avail, in the formation of a constitution.

But the Cincinnati platform embraces the same principle; and the great assembly which formed it declared as follows:

"Resolved, That we recognize the right of the people of all the Territories, including Kansas and Nebraska, acting through the legally and fairly expressed will of a majority of actual residents, and whenever the number of their inhabitants justifies it, to form a constitution, with or without domestic slavery, and be admitted into the Union upon terms of perfect equality with the other States."

To show how this was understood by Mr. DOUGLAS at the meeting held in this city, to rejoice over the nomination of Mr. Buchanan, he said:

"The platform was equally explicit in reference to the disturbances in relation to the Territory of Kansas. It declared that treason was to be punished, and resistance to the laws was to be put down. That was the whole question involved—whether the supremacy of the laws should be maintained, or whether mob violence should overcome the officer of the law. On this question, between law and violence, the Democracy had expressed their sentiments; they say that the laws shall be executed so long as they stand upon the statute-book. But the Black Republicans say that they will trample upon the law, and shoot down the officers who execute it, because they do not like the law. The whole question was, whether law and order and the constitution shall prevail, or whether lawless violence and mob law shall rule in their stead."

"And the principle of the Black Republicans is to obey such laws as they like, and repudiate those they do not like. They claim protection under the constitution, and refuse to yield obedience to it. The difference between them and the Democracy is, that the Democracy support the Constitution in all its parts, with equal fidelity, without reference to whether they like or dislike it. It is no excuse for a man to say that he does not like a law, and therefore will not obey it. Did they ever know a criminal who liked the law. [Applause.] Law-breakers never like the punishment that follows the act. Law-abiding men have no fear of the supremacy of the law."

Nor were such sentiments uttered by Mr. DOUGLAS for the first time. He has often uttered them:

"The Democratic party is ever a law-abiding, Constitution-loving, conservative party—a party which holds that all true liberty is to be found under the protection of the Constitution and the laws, and that the laws made in pursuance of the Constitution must be obeyed. If we dislike them, they can only be repealed in conformity with the Constitution; and we must submit to them as long as they are on the statute-book, unless they are unconstitutional, and their constitutionality is a question which must be decided by the courts. It is not to be settled by mobs resisting law, by shooting down the officers of the law, by pledging candidates for the judicial bench to decide contrary to the Constitution and their oaths as the condition of their election. The courts must decide the question according to the Constitution and the law, and all must abide by that decision. Thus we are brought back to the simple point, whether the Constitution and the laws, as expounded by the highest tribunals in the land, shall prevail; or whether a town meeting or a political organization, when it finds itself in the minority, is at liberty to become a mob, to defy the law, and shoot down its officers?"

It is difficult for doctrine to be more clearly stated. Those who "choose to absent themselves from the polls," says Mr. DOUGLAS, and "those who abstain from the exercise of the right of suffrage," says Governor Walker, allow to those who do go to the polls the right to govern them; "otherwise," says Governor Walker, "monarchy or despotism would remain as the only alternative."

I think it not out of place, Mr. Chairman, to invite attention to the case Luther vs. Borden &c. 7 Howard. It grew out of the Dorr rebellion, and presents a case in many respects analogous to the one now under consideration.

When the Revolution commenced, the then colony of Rhode Island had a government formed under a charter granted by Charles II., King of England. The State of Rhode Island made no change in the form of government. This charter restricted the right of suffrage to freeholders. For years strenuous efforts were made, without success, to obtain an extension of the right of suffrage.

In 1841 the people held meetings and elected delegates to a convention to form a constitution, which was formed and submitted to the people, who, as it was alleged, ratified it by a large majority of all the qualified voters, according to the new constitution, and also according to the charter of Charles.

Under this constitution elections were held for Governor, members of the Legislature, &c., who assembled together in May, 1842, and proceeded to organize the new government.

But the charter government did not acquiesce in these proceedings. On the contrary it passed stringent laws, and finally an act declaring the State under martial law.

Martin Luther brought an action of trespass, quare clausum fregit, against the defendants for breaking and entering the plaintiff's house, on the 29th June, 1842. Defendants replied that they necessarily broke the plaintiff's house in seeking to arrest him for aiding and abetting an insurrection of men in arms, to overthrow the lawful Government of the State, by military force—to which the plaintiff replied generally. And on the trial offered to prove that the new constitution had been adopted by a majority of those under the new constitution, and also under the old charter; and that the citizens of this State, in their original sovereign capacity, have ratified and adopted said constitution by a large majority; and the plaintiff moved the court, Judge Story presiding, to instruct the jury that, if they so found, then the pleas of the defendants show no justification. But the court refused such instruction, and thus the case went into the Supreme Court.

The plaintiff's counsel, Mr. Hallett, among many points, laid down the following:

"The institution of American liberty is based upon the principles that the people are capable of self government, and have an inalienable right at all times, and in any manner they please, to establish and alter or change the constitution or particular form under which that government shall be effected. This is especially true of the several States composing the Union, subject only to a limitation provided by the United States Constitution, that the State governments shall be republican.

"That the sovereignty of the people is supreme, and may act in forming government without the assent of the existing government."

"If these questions are answered in the negative, then the theory of American free governments for the States is unavailable in practice."

"The anti-republican doctrine that legislative action or sanction is necessary, as the mode of effecting a change of State government, was broached for the first time, under the United States Government, by one Senator in the debate in Congress upon the admission of Michigan, December, 1846."

The defendant's counsel, Mr. Whipple, states the issue:

"Mr. Whipple, for the defendant in error, said that the question to be decided was, whether a portion of the voters of a State, either the majority or minority, whenever they choose, assembling in mass meeting without any law, or by voting where there is no opportunity of challenging votes, may overthrow the constitution and set up a new one? But he would leave the discussion of general principles to his associate, and confine himself to the more minute facts of the case."

Mr. Webster, on the same side, agreed with Mr. Hallett:

"Let me state what I understand these principles to be. The first is, that the people are the source of all political power. Every one believes this. Where else is there any power?"

Mr. Webster said:

"But, in 1776, the American people adopted principles more especially adapted to their condition. They can be traced through the Confederation and the present Constitution, and our principles of liberty have now become exclusively American. They are distinctly marked. We changed the government where it required change; where we found a good one we left it. Conservatism is visible throughout."

"Another is, that the qualification which entitles man to vote must be prescribed by previous laws directing how it is to be exercised, and also that the results shall be certified to some central power, so that the vote may tell. We know no other principle."

"Our American mode of government does not draw any power from tumultuous assemblages. If anything is established in that way, it is deceptive."

"Always these conventions were called together by the Legislature, and no single constitution has ever been altered by means of a convention gotten up by mass meetings. There must be an authentic mode of ascertaining the public will somehow and somewhere. If not, it is a government of the strongest and most numerous. It is said that, if the Legislature refuses to call a convention, the case then resembles the Holy Alliance of Europe, whose doctrine it was that all changes must originate with the sovereign. But there is no resemblance whatever. I say that the will of the people must prevail, but that there must be some mode of finding out that will. The people here are as sovereign as the crowned heads at Laybach, but their will is not so easily discovered."

"The Constitution proceeds upon the idea that each State will take care to establish its own government upon proper principles, and does not contemplate these extraneous and irregular alterations of existing governments."

"The question which the court was called upon to decide was one of sovereignty. Two Legislatures were in existence at the same time; both could not be legitimate. If legal power had not passed away from the charter government, it could not have got into Dorr's. The position taken on the other side is, that it had so passed away; and it is attempted to be proved by votes and proceedings of meetings, &c., out of doors. This court must look elsewhere: to the Constitution and laws and acts of the Government of the United States."

The Supreme Court, in its elaborate judgment, countenanced the views of Mr. Webster, and says:

"But the courts uniformly held that the inquiry proposed to be made belonged to the political power, and not to the judicial; that it rested with the political power to decide whether the charter government had been displaced or not; and when that decision was made, the judicial department would be bound to take notice of it as the paramount law of the State, without the aid of oral evidence or the examination of witnesses; that, according to the laws and institutions of Rhode Island, no such change had been recognized by the political power; and that the charter government was the lawful and established government of the State during the period in contest; and that those who were in arms against it were insurgents, and liable to punishment. This doctrine is clearly and forcibly stated in the opinion of the supreme court of the State, in the trial of Thomas W. Dorr, who was the Governor elected under the opposing constitution, and headed the armed force which endeavored to maintain its authority."

It also says:

"By this act, the power of deciding whether the exigency had arisen upon which the Government of the United States is bound to interfere, is given to the President. He is to act upon the application of the Legislature, or of the Executive; and consequently, he must determine what body of men constitute the Legislature, and who is the Governor, before he can act. The fact that both parties claim the right to the government cannot alter the case, for both cannot be entitled to it. If there is an armed conflict, like the one of which we are speaking, it is a case of domestic violence, and one of the parties must be in insurrection against the lawful government. And the President must, of necessity, decide which is the government, and which party is unlawfully arrayed against it, before he can perform the duty imposed upon him by the act of Congress."

And in conclusion adds:

"No one, we believe, has ever doubted the proposition that, according to the institutions of this country, the sovereignty in every State resides in the people of the State, and that they may alter and change their form of government at their own pleasure. But whether they have changed it or not by abolishing an old government and establishing a new one in its place, is a question to be settled by the political power. And when that power has decided, the courts are bound to take notice of its decision, and to follow it."

The constitution of a State cannot be changed by domestic violence, nor can the organic act of a Territory. The Constitution forbids it. (Fourth article, fourth section, and second article, third section.)

Then there is no alternative. The will of the people can alone be known by the exercise of the right of suffrage. Those who vote must govern those who do not. There is no help for it; and the only majority our institutions can recognize, or we can know, is of those who appear at the polls, and cast their suffrage in the manner prescribed by law. How, then, can Senator Douglas do otherwise than support the Lecompton constitution?

But it is said that the election ordered by the free-State Legislature for the 4th of January, discloses the fact that there was a large majority against the Lecompton constitution. Upwards of ten thousand majority against it! And shall such a startling fact be disregarded?

In the first place, this vote was taken with a knowledge that one party alone would vote—it was ex parte. The act, too, was without precedent. It may be safely affirmed that the whole history of constitutional government and reform cannot show its like in the United States. Repeal a constitution already adopted under an act calling upon the people to vote for or against it! But the vote reported as cast on that occasion is manifestly fraudulent. Why is it so much larger than was ever cast before by the free-State men? Why is it so much larger than that cast by them for State officers on the same day? Why is it so much larger than the memorial gotten up by them through their own census, taken only a few months ago? The free-State vote on the constitution is put at about 10,178; on State officers at about 7,000; on their memorial it is 4,170.

I have heretofore shown that the presidential election was fought upon the speedy admission of Kansas, &c., as the only means of giving peace to the country. Shall we keep it open, and thus play into the hands of those who are insurgents, and regard its agitation as necessary to success? Let us see what Judge Douglas has heretofore said upon this point.

In April, 1856, Mr. Douglas, in his place in the Senate, said:

"The policy is avowed, by the pretended executive officer of that so-called State, to continue the condition of violence by inducing Congress to withhold appropriations to pay its officers, and thus enable the revolutionary movement to be successful. When I see that the same line of policy is marked out here, showing that the object is to prevent any settlement of the question, to keep up revolution, to defeat the supremacy of the law, to perpetuate the struggle, I feel bound to give it no countenance by any vote of mine."

Gentlemen have been kind enough to say that the object of this bill is to make a slave State in Kansas. I show them that, by the provisions of the bill, its object is to allow the people to make just such a State as they wish. The Senator from Maine [Mr. Fessenden] says he has a right to go a little behind the face of the bill, and give his opinion that the object is to make Kansas a slave State. Conceding that right, and acting upon it, I have a right to come to the conclusion that all these gentlemen want is to get up murder and bloodshed in Kansas for political effect. They do not mean that there shall be peace until after the presidential election. They sent their partisan agents to get up rebellion, to commit crime, to burn houses, and then their newspaper agents are to report these acts here, and charge them on the border ruffians. This whole game of violence there, and the publication of it here, is done by the one and same set of men—done for political effect. It is a part of their game. They do not mean that there shall be peace. Their capital for the presidential election is blood. We may as well talk plainly. An angel from Heaven could not write a bill to restore peace in Kansas that would be acceptable to the Abolition Republican party previous to the presidential election. [Laughter and applause in the galleries.]

"Then, sir, if it be an evil to have laws in force infringing the freedom of speech in the Territory, why not join with us to pass this bill, which obliterates those laws? If it be an evil of such magnitude as to justify rebellion and bloodshed to have test oaths in the Territory, why not join in blotting them out? If there be such evils as are portrayed in Kansas, why not join in applying the remedy? No; you vainly hope that you can make the people believe that the Democracy are responsible for the consequences of your own acts, and thus gather political capital from the blood of your fellow-citizens, if violence can reign and excitement last until the presidential election. Hence, law must not prevail—life must not be safe—property must not be secure—peace must not be restored in Kansas, if the Abolition-Republican leaders can prevent it, until after the election. You mistake, if you suppose the people will not be able to understand this scheme."

Such was the opinion of Judge Douglas as late as the 12th June last, when, in his Springfield speech, he said:

"If such is not the result let the consequences be visited upon the heads of those whose policy it is to produce strife, anarchy, and bloodshed in Kansas, that their party may profit by slavery agitation in the northern States of this Union."

Governor Walker, in his letter of 27th May, 1857, to Mr. Cass, says:

"I am well satisfied that a large portion of the insurrectionary party in this Territory do not desire the peaceful settlement of this question, but wish it to remain open in order to agitate the country for years to come. Such a result I would regard as most disastrous, not only to the peace and prosperity of Kansas, but as putting in imminent jeopardy the Government itself."

Governor Walker says, in his official letter:

"The professed object is to protect the polls at the election in August of the new insurgent Topeka State Legislature. The object of taking the names of all who refuse enrollment is to terrify the free-State conservatives into submission. This is proved by recent atrocities committed on such men by Topekaites. The speedy location of large bodies of regular troops here, with two batteries, is necessary; the Lawrence insurgents await the development of this new revolutionary military organization."

"You are aware that General Lane commanded the military expedition which made an incursion into this Territory last year, and that the officers of the staff are all leading agitators for the overthrow of the territorial government. The object of this last requisition is believed to be to mark for persecution and oppression all those persons, and especially free-State Democrats, who refuse to unite in this military organization. The purpose is universally regarded to be to establish a reign of terror."

"A few weeks since, one of these conservative Democrats, who had committed no other offense than permitting the use of his name as a candidate for the constitutional convention, was abused and injured in the most shocking manner, and the most revolting atrocities were committed upon his wife by some of the insurrectionary party."

"It will be perceived that this military organization embraces the whole Territory—being arranged into four divisions and eight brigades."

"August 18.—The insurgent military organization under General Lane is still progressing. Arms are being supplied, and his troops drilled for action. We are threatened with the seizure of the polls, at various points, by these insurgent forces. When it is remembered that the Topeka party claim to outnumber their opponents at least ten to one, the pretext for assembling these forces to protect the polls is evidently most fallacious."

To all this much more might be added of the same character. Can any man who loves order, peace, and harmony, desire such scenes to continue? Will Democrats who desire hereafter to be so regarded, help to continue such scenes?

So late as the 12th June, 1857, Senator Douglas had said:

"Of the Kansas question, but little need be said at the present time. You are familiar with the history of the question, and my connection with it. Subsequent reflection has strengthened and confirmed my convictions in the soundness of the principles and the correctness of the course I have felt it my duty to pursue upon that subject."

What has occurred since to induce a change of this course? I fear ambition has done its work. I fear imaginary private griefs have been actively at work. I have heard of a meeting of the Illinois delegation to consider of the policy to be pursued. I give at least one gentleman from Illinois notice that I shall bring up a matter in connection with the movement of that delegation in reference to this defection on the Kansas question, when I have an opportunity to do so. I intended to pay my respects to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Cox,] but I have not the time.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. How much time have I?

A MEMBER. Only three minutes.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. I want to say this—

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I cannot yield. How much time have I, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. About two minutes.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. I merely want to say that if the gentleman has anything to say about the Illinois delegation, I wish he would charge it, and not insinuate it.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I do charge it as distinctly as I can.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. What does the gentleman charge?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Will gentlemen give me time to go on?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks that his time may be extended.

Mr. BURNETT. I object, and I prefer to make the objection upon a gentleman on my own side.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I will say this in conclusion, that the delegation from Illinois, or a portion of them at any rate, met together here, when Congress assembled, to consider the course which a certain gentleman in the other end of the Capitol should pursue, and the means he should use to secure his reelection to the United States Senate. I say that much; and I will make out the case when I have the time. I say that that certainly extraordinary action has resulted in a concerted movement, having an eye alone to his reelection.

Mr. PALMER obtained the floor.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. PALMER. I will yield to the gentleman for a moment.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. I would like to state that the charge of the gentleman from Virginia is wholly and entirely unfounded.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I do not know about it of my own knowledge; but when a member of that delegation speaks to that effect, when he tells it to me without reserve, tells it to another person, and, I may say, to still another—I allude to the successor of the gallant Richardson—I take it to be true. He told me that they had a conference; that in that conference they came to the conclusion that the only chance for the reelection of Mr. Douglas to the United States Senate was in the course he has pursued. I speak openly and squarely, because I have nothing to fear nor favor to ask.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. I do not know from whom the gentleman received his information; but if he intends to include the whole Illinois delegation, I, as one of that delegation, can tell him that it is wholly and entirely unfounded, so far as I am concerned. I do not believe any such general conference ever was held.

Mr. COX. With the permission of the gentleman from New York, I wish to say, in relation to this most extraordinary attack which has been made upon the Democrats acting against the Leocompton bill here, that it becomes the gentleman from Virginia, least of all the members of this House, to read lectures to the members of the Democratic party.

Mr. ATKINS. I object to the gentleman's speaking, unless the gentleman from Virginia is to have an opportunity to reply.

Mr. COX. The gentleman will have the opportunity. The gentleman from Virginia was elected by the aid of American votes, and he has acted with the Americans.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is out of order, and will resume his seat.

Mr. COX. I am speaking in the time of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. PALMER,] and by his leave. The gentleman has turned tail upon the Democratic party, and it does not become him to turn round and read a lecture to them, after he has joined hands with the Americans.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is out of order. The gentleman from New York has the right, under the rules of the House, to yield the floor to the gentleman from Ohio to propound a question or make an explanation, but not further, without unanimous consent. Several gentlemen have objected, and, therefore, the gentleman is out of order.

Mr. KEITT. Will it be in order to make a proposition?

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen will resume their seats and come to order.

Mr. FOSTER. I move that the gentleman have what the underwriters call "general liberty."

[A laugh.]

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Let us have this little matter out now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair announces that unless gentlemen preserve order, he will abandon the chair and report the disorderly members to the House.

Mr. PALMER. I hope this will not be taken out of my time.

Mr. CLEMENS. I hope the gentleman will be allowed his full hour.

Mr. RUFFIN. I object to all these arrangements.

Mr. PALMER. I will proceed.

Mr. COX. I ask the gentleman to—

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen will be good enough to resume their seats.

Mr. PALMER. I would very gladly yield for a few minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that, even if the gentleman from New York were to yield to him, he could not proceed, except to ask a question, or to make a personal explanation in reference to something which has been said in relation to himself, without the unanimous consent of the committee; and the Chair is already informed that that consent will not be given.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman, I propose to address the committee briefly upon topics suggested by the annual message of the President, and especially by the communication he has lately made to Congress demanding the admission of a new State into the Union, in a particular manner and with a particular constitution.

In these messages the President seems to have mistaken the functions of his office. Whether Kansas shall or shall not come into the Union, with or without the Leocompton constitution, is, by virtue of the fundamental principles on which the Republic is based, a question solely for the legislative department of the Government to determine.

"New States may be admitted by the Congress into the Union," is the language of the Constitution; and this power belongs exclusively in its very nature to the Representatives of the people and of the sovereign States whose relative interests are affected by its exercise.

Washington had such a respect for the line which separates the executive from the legislative functions of the Government, especially in cases involving the sovereignty and enlargement of the States, that when the first application for admission into the Union was made, he studiously avoided even to express an opinion as to the propriety of the measure, much less to address to Congress a sectional harangue, assailing one portion of the people, eulogizing another, and insisting in the most arrogant terms that their Representatives shall adopt the particular line of action which he shall mark out for them.

In his message to Congress, in 1790, he thus alludes to the admission of a new State into the Union:

"Since your last session, I have received communications by which it appears that the district of Kentucky, at present a part of Virginia, has concurred in certain propositions contained in a law of the State; in consequence of which the district is to become a distinct member of the Union, in case the requisite sanction of Congress be added. For this sanction application is now made. I shall cause the papers on this very important transaction to be laid before you."

And there he stopped. He laid the papers before Congress, and that was the limit of his constitutional duty.

The Constitution of the United States makes it the duty of the President "from time to time to give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient;" measures which in his judgment are necessary and expedient in order to enable him to administer the Government as he finds it—as the legislative power has confided it to his hands. Such are the subjects which he may "recommend to the consideration of the Congress;" and the earlier Presidents confined themselves to the letter and spirit of this constitutional right.

They laid before Congress, in brief and comprehensive sentences, the condition of the Union; they occasionally discussed in general terms abstract principles of political economy; and whenever they alluded to specific measures of legislation, it was merely to commend them, in dignified and respectful terms, to the free and independent consideration of Congress. They did not deem it within the range of their duty or their dignity to appeal to party prejudices, passions, and interests; nor did they themselves, nor did they require or permit their subordinates in office, to attempt to control the action of the legislative department of the Government, either by the hope of reward or the fear of punishment.

In his first address to Congress, in 1789, Washington illustrates this clause in the Constitution, as well as the duty of the President under it. He says:

"By the article establishing the executive department, it is made the duty of the President to recommend to your consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient. The circumstances under which I meet you will acquit me from entering into that subject further than to refer to the great constitutional charter under which you are assembled, and which, in defining your powers, designates the objects to which your attention is to be given."

In the next paragraph of the same message, with what studied disclaimer of the right to advise, much less to dictate, to the Congress, he approaches a question not embraced within the "necessary and expedient measures of legislation." There was then a warm discussion going on in the country, in which parties were divided, concerning amendments to the Constitution.

The President, coming to this subject, says:

"Besides the ordinary objects submitted to your care, it will remain with your judgment to decide how far an exercise of the occasional power delegated by the fifth article of the Constitution is rendered expedient, at the present juncture, by the nature of the objections which have been urged against the system, or by the degree of inquietude which has given birth to them. Instead of undertaking particular recommendations on this subject, in which I could be guided by no lights derived from official opportunities, I shall again give way to my entire confidence in your discernment and pursuit of the public good."

That this uniform refusal to interfere with, or to attempt in the slightest degree to control the action of Congress, which characterized his whole administration, was not the result of accident, but rather of design; and a well-settled conviction of right and propriety, is manifest by what he says on this subject in his Farewell Address. Among those last words of wisdom which he gave to his countrymen in an official form occurs this passage:

"It is important, likewise, that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those entrusted with its administration, to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding, in the exercise of the powers of one department, to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of the Government, a real despotism. A just estimate of that love of power and proneness to abuse it which predominate in the human heart, is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position. The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power, by dividing and distributing it into different depositories, and constituting each the guardian of the public weal against invasions of the other, has been evinced by experiments, ancient and modern, some of them in our own country, and under our own eyes."

In his first annual message, Jefferson says:

"I am happy in this opportunity of committing the arduous affairs of our Government to the collected wisdom of the Union. Nothing shall be wanting on my part to inform, as far as in my power, the legislative judgment, nor to carry that judgment into faithful execution."

How clearly and distinctly the line which marks the separation of the two departments of the Government is here followed. The affairs of the Government are committed to Congress. He will give them such information concerning those affairs as may be in his power; and when they shall have made up their judgment upon them, he will carry that judgment into execution.

He closes his third annual message in these words:

"I anticipate with satisfaction the measures of wisdom which the great interests now committed to you will give you an opportunity of providing, and myself that of approving and carrying into execution with the fidelity I owe to my country."

The words you and myself are italicized by Jefferson, and it is the only instance in all his messages in which he employed this mode of conveying a nice distinction and special emphasis to his sentiments.

Again, Jefferson closes his fourth annual message in these words:

"Whether the great interests of agriculture, manufactures, commerce, or navigation, can, within the pale of your constitutional powers, be aided in any of their relations; whether laws are provided in all cases where they are wanting; whether those provided are exactly what they should be; whether any abuses take place in their administration, or in that of the public revenues; whether the organization of the public agents or of the public force is perfect in all its parts; in fine, whether anything can be done to advance the general good—are questions within the limits of your functions which will necessarily occupy your attention. In these, and other matters which you in your wisdom may propose for the good of our country, you may count with assurance on my hearty cooperation and faithful execution."

President Madison, instead of charging a great and respectable body of his fellow-citizens with want of patriotism, and Congress with keeping up for years a system of dangerous agitation, as Buchanan now does, closed his first address thus:

"The source to which I look for the aid which alone can supply my deficiencies is in the well-tried intelligence and virtue of my fellow-citizens, and in the counsels of those representing them in the other departments associated in the care of the national interests. In these my confidence will, under every difficulty, be placed."

Again, as the country was about to prepare for the threatened war with Great Britain, he brought to the consideration of Congress the condition of the Army and Navy, in the following brief sentence:

"It will rest with the judgment of Congress to decide how the change in our external prospect may authorize any modification of the laws relating to the Army and Naval establishments."

All through the excitement of 1819 and 1820, concerning the admission of Missouri and the establishment of the famous compromise, Mr. Monroe does not, so far as I have been able to discover, even mention the subject in his messages to Congress.

These men, sir, had not forgotten the causes of the Revolution. The insidious encroachments of the British King upon the rights of the colonists were fresh in their recollection; and they had some respect for the wisdom of the framers of the Constitution, whose first great care in laying the foundations of the Republic was to distribute the powers of Government among its several departments so clearly and distinctly that the barriers between them should never be broken down.

But we have fallen upon evil times. We have a President now who claims the right not only to control the action of the Representatives of the people by the most shameful abuse of executive patronage, but to prostitute his constitutional intercourse with them to the merest sectional and partisan purposes. Not a message upon any subject on which the public sentiment is divided has come from his pen, which rises above the clap-trap that belongs to the arena of party contests—to the hustings and the stump. The English language does not furnish an instance where more of partisanship under the plea of patriotism—more of sophistry under the guise of argument—more of suppression of truth and perversion of fact, more of unblushing and barefaced misrepresentation, than are condensed in those portions of his messages which relate to Kansas and the Lecompton constitution. Alas, for the infirmities of nature! alas, for the clearness with which the imbecility of age reflects, as in a mirror, the naked deformities which, in the hour of their successful career, great bad men are enabled, by cunning and duplicity, to conceal!

Surely, Mr. Chairman, these last acts of self-development on the part of the President are a work of supererogation. They were not necessary to a fair exposition of his character. History was already prepared to assign him his proper place among men. The materials, ample and unerring, were already at hand. The anti-war malediction upon the administration of James Madison which signalized his entrance into public life; the facility with which he has espoused all sides of all public questions from that time to this; the part he took in the election of 1824, embittering for a season, by his intrigues, the relations of Jackson and Clay, and earning, in the end, the contempt of both of them; the infamous Ostend manifesto—these and other sufficient materials were already at hand for the elucidation of the public character of James Buchanan. They were ample for its truthful portraiture; and these last incoherent mutterings shall only serve to strengthen and fill up the picture.

I make no apology for speaking plainly of the official conduct of the President. While I have a proper respect for the elevated station he holds—while I have a becoming reverence for age, I have no reverence, I have no respect, for him who degrades that station to the ignoble uses of sectional or party interests. The Constitution, recognizing the necessity of a power somewhere to resist and rebuke the encroachments of an ambitious or wicked Executive, has lodged that power in this House; and it is our duty to exercise it whenever, in our judgment, the public interests require.

Mr. Chairman, all through his messages, from the beginning to the end, whenever he touches upon this Kansas question, the President assumes an air of dictation to Congress. He questions its patriotism, he insults its intelligence. On every page, in every line, he exhibits the narrowest partisan prejudices, lauding the wisdom and the honesty of the few who sustain him, and impugning, in unmeasured terms, the motives of the great majority of the people in the free States who differ from him. In the first lines of his special message he insolently proclaims that "a great delusion seems to pervade the public mind in relation to the condition of the parties in Kansas." What right, sir, has he to charge the people of this country with delusion upon a great public question, open alike to the knowledge and judgment of all? Whence comes his exclusive knowledge of the truth in regard to the "condition of parties in Kansas?" Surely not from impartial official sources, for to these he turns a deaf ear, and his own Governors are beheaded for daring to tell him the truth. "The condition of parties in Kansas!" Where is his warrant in the Constitution or in the examples of his predecessors, for reading us a lecture upon the "condition of parties?" He should be reminded that he sits where Washington sat; that his party should be the American people; his section the American Union.

Again the President says:

"The dividing line between parties in Kansas is between those who are loyal to the government and those who have endeavored to destroy its existence by force and usurpation; between those who sustain and those who have done all in their power to overthrow the territorial government established by Congress. This government they would long since have subverted had it not been protected from their assaults by the troops of the United States. Ever since my inauguration, a large portion of the people of Kansas have been in a state of rebellion against the government, with a military leader at their head of a most turbulent and dangerous character. They have never acknowledged, but have constantly renounced and defied, the government to which they owe allegiance, and have been all the time in a state of resistance against its authority. They have all the time been endeavoring to subvert it and to establish a revolutionary government, under the so-called Topeka constitution, in its stead."

For a whole year a rebellion has been going on in a Territory; and by whom and against whom? By the majority against the minority? It is abundantly shown that the people have been all along divided in parties, in the proportion of about five to one; and it is said now that they are as ten to one. Thus the legal pro-slavery vote in favor of the Lecompton constitution, on the 21st of December, is certified by the President of the Council and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, who were present at the canvass, as "not over two thousand;" while the free-State majority against the constitution, at the election legally held on the 4th of January, fourteen days afterwards, was ten thousand and sixty-four. Now, sir, it is an extraordinary assertion by the President, that four fifths of a people in this country should be in active and open rebellion to the other one fifth, and that for a whole year.

But, sir, the President says the territorial government that has been thus enforced in Kansas, by the troops of the United States, is a "lawful government," "established by Congress," "to which the people owe allegiance." These three propositions are all erroneous. The so-called government was not "lawful;" it was usurped, as everybody knows, and none better than the President. Usurped authority is not lawful authority. It may have some of the technical forms of law, but it lacks the vitality which usurpation cannot give.

The President says Congress "established" the territorial government in Kansas. You know, Mr. Chairman, the President himself knows, that Congress never established that government. It is true, they authorized the establishment of a government there; they pointed out the means and forms by which the people of the Territory were authorized to establish a government. Congress never established that government, nor did the people of Kansas establish that government; nor did Congress ever authorize Missourians, or any other invaders, to establish any government over the people of Kansas.

The President further says, and he reiterates it repeatedly, as though a mere assumption, by its repetition, might be made truth, that "Congress has recognized that government." Now, sir, this story about Congress having recognized the Missouri usurpation as a lawful government in Kansas is all a sheer fabrication. Where, when, and how, did Congress ever recognize that government? The President says "in a variety of forms." Will he give us one of the forms? I recollect that this branch of Congress, the direct and immediate Representatives of the American people, distinctly refused to recognize that government, and pronounced it a usurpation, with no lawful authority whatever. Not only that; but it passed an act admitting Kansas into the Union under the Topeka constitution, which the President pronounces revolutionary and treasonable. It sent a committee out there to inquire into it, and that committee reported that the whole thing was a fraud and crime; that it was the work of an army of four thousand nine hundred men from Missouri, who went into the Territory, voted, and returned to their homes in military array, with banners flying, with arms, with artillery, with all the accompaniments of a conquering invasion. It passed what was called Dunn's bill, which declared the acts of the Territorial Legislature void. It repeatedly refused to make any appropriation for the expenses of that Legislature, though requested to do so by the Administration. The Senate and the House concurred in that refusal, and the item for that purpose was stricken out from the legislative appropriation bill.

Now, the President suppresses all this, and declares, in the face of what everybody knows to be the truth, that "Congress has in a variety of forms recognized that government," conveying the impression, by every fair rule of construction, that neither branch of Congress ever questioned the validity of that usurped Legislature. Sir, the national Legislature never recognized the usurpation which was forced upon the people of Kan-as by Atchison, Stringfellow, & Co., in conspiracy with the executive authority at Washington. That the President has recognized it nobody denies. Having aided and abetted in its establishment, of course he was bound to sanction and defend it. But he is not Congress; and if a majority of the Senate concurred with him, they are not Congress; he and they combined are not Congress. Thank God, the people of this country, through their local and immediate Representatives, have yet a voice in the Government; and that voice will only be awakened to clearer utterances and greater power by the attempts of the Executive to suppress and silence it.

At the election in 1856 there was a majority in the free States of more than five hundred thousand against the President; and if they could be polled to-day upon his Kansas policy, that majority would be swollen to millions. Nine tenths of the whole people in the non-slaveholding States, with very many at the South, are opposed to his attempt to coerce Congress into an indorsement of this Lecompton swindle. All these men fall under the ban of his displeasure. His denunciations apply to them as well as to the people of Kansas. Sir, he is endeavoring to force a measure through the national Legislature, not only against the wishes of the people immediately concerned, but contrary to the public conscience; contrary to the practice of the Government; contrary to the doctrines of the party which elected him; and contrary to his own solemn pledges. And all who dare to oppose this scheme are designated, directly or by implication, as traitors, rebels, and disturbers of the public peace!

The President says: "Had the whole Lecompton constitution been submitted to the people, the adherents of this organization [the free-State party] would doubtless have voted against it." This is among the excuses assigned by the President of the United States for not submitting the fundamental law under which a great people are to live, for their ratification or rejection! "They would vote against it." Why, sir, with all deference to the logic of his Excellency, it seems to me that is the very reason why it should have been submitted; for if the people would vote for it, and none against it, there could be no practical necessity for submitting it at all. The object of referring a law or a constitution to the people, is to enable them to reject it if they disapprove of it. But this is the best reason the President could give. It is the only one anybody has given. It is the one which induced the bogus Legislature to refuse, when called upon by Governor Geary to do so, to direct its convention to submit it. It is the only one given by the convention itself, notwithstanding many of them pledged themselves to the people before their election that they would submit it. And now we have the same reason assigned by the President. It was the only way to consummate the original fraud, and he must not falter in devising and defending the necessary means for its final triumph. He therefore inquires whether it was not "the right, as well as the duty, of the law-abiding people to adopt the necessary measures to establish a constitution?" There, sir, you have it all. The minority could not establish a constitution in any other way, and therefore it was their "right and duty" to do it in this way!

"Law abiding people!" In what complimentary terms the President speaks of his friends in Kansas! For Robinson, for Lane, for Walker, for Reeder, traitors, rebels, usurpers, are the appellations the President furnishes. For Jones, for Stringfellow, for Jack Henderson, for Calhoun, and their confederates—murderers, forgers, ballot-box stuffers—scoundrels of various degrees, most of them fugitives from justice—many of them with executive commissions still in their pockets—for these gentlemen he has a choicer vocabulary; they are preëminently the "law-abiding people," who were justifiable in making a snap-judgment against the majority, lest they should refuse to sanction their usurpation! This is the logic, the justice; this is the morality, the democracy; this is the popular sovereignty which commends itself to the favor and conscience of his Excellency!

The President sustains his charge of rebellion against the people of Kansas as follows:

"The enemies of the territorial government determined still to resist the authority of Congress. They refused to vote for delegates to the convention, because they had pre-determined, at all hazards, to defeat the establishment of any other constitution than that which they had framed at Topeka."

Mr. Chairman, I never before heard that a refusal to vote was resistance of authority, or rebellion, or treason. I supposed people in this country had a right to vote or not, as they pleased. But the people of Kansas did not refuse to vote for the reasons given by the President, but for others, which I shall presently refer to. One was, however—and it was sufficient—that they knew if they tried to vote they would be cheated out of the election, and then be charged with having waived, by their participation in it, their objections to the original usurpation and its consequences. But suppose they had voted and elected, as the President intimates they might have done, a majority of the convention: could they not, through their convention, still have adhered to their Topeka constitution? So that, whether they staid away from the election, or voted and carried it, they were still, according to the President, resisting the authority of Congress!

Sir, it has been impossible for them to satisfy the President. They found no difficulty in conciliating the Governors he and his predecessor sent to them. Those gentlemen discovered in that people something besides treason and rebellion. The President can see nothing else. What they do he blames them for; what they do not do he blames them for. Throughout all these proceedings in Kansas, he has seen nothing in the conduct of the free-State people to approve, nothing in the pro-slavery to condemn. In 1856, his friends proclaimed all over the North and the West that, if elected, he would make Kansas a free State. Pierce, they said, had been unfair—he was playing for a renomination. Buchanan had pledged himself not to take a reelection, and they believed he would repair the errors of his predecessor, and adopt such measures as would restore to the free-State majority in Kansas their rights and their supremacy. The appointment of Geary, and his early attempt to secure the submission of the constitution to the popular vote, were exultingly pointed to as conclusive proof of this. The intimation in the President's inaugural that the people should vote on their constitution, his instructions to Walker to that end, and Walker's pledges to the people to the same effect, seemed to justify this claim. But the moment these concessions on the part of the President began to excite opposition among his southern supporters, how suddenly they were arrested! Geary was called home in disgrace; Walker was censured and compelled to resign; Stanton was summarily removed, and the reign of terror, under the dictator Calhoun, was again established in the Territory.

I come back to the President's message:

"Should Congress reject the constitution under the idea of affording the disaffected in Kansas a third opportunity of prohibiting slavery in the State, no man can foretell the consequences."

Now, why should worse consequences ensue from the third opportunity than from the second? The people are now declared by all your Governors to be nearly unanimous in favor of excluding slavery. The whole country is adopting this conviction. The charge that the free-State men only went there from New England to vote, and then return, is exploded. Most of those who could give the people further trouble, have disappeared from amongst them. The very delegates—most, if not all, of them—who framed this constitution, are out of the way; some have returned to their homes in Missouri—some have succumbed to delirium tremens—some have escaped to the Federal capital, seeking, under the roof of the President, that immunity for crime which is denied them at home. Nothing but the Army of the United States remains to plague that people.

The President warns us against this "dangerous agitation" in the Halls of Congress, and in the country. Sir, there is no agitation save what he and his policy have caused. Would he stop it, let him first arrest his career of usurpation and wrong. The American people have a right to discuss and to agitate; all free people do agitate; and when the time comes that the freemen of this Republic, or their Representatives, shall cease to discuss public affairs, or to question the wisdom of the Executive, then should these Halls be turned into barracks; the Revolution, the Constitution, the records, the rich and glorious memories of the past, all, all should be forgotten; for then will the night of despotism have gathered over the land.

What are the lessons of history? From the time the world began, the necessity of suppressing agitation and quieting the turbulence of the people has furnished the pretexts for tyranny and usurpation. "Alarming discussion in the House of Commons," cried the Stuarts when they trampled on the magna charta of England; "unseemly agitation in the Senate," whispered the Roman consul, as he clutched the scepter of empire; "turbulent discussions in the National Assembly," exclaimed the two Napoleons, the First Consul and the President, as they slid into the imperial throne.

Sir, this agitation which the President deprecates is the inevitable consequence of the very act he so loudly applauds. As if he knew this were so, he volunteers its denial in advance, in the following remarkable passage:

"Every patriot in the country had indulged the hope that the Kansas and Nebraska act would put a final end to the slavery agitation, at least in Congress, which had for more than twenty years, convulsed the country and endangered the Union."

Now, everybody knows that directly the reverse of this is true. You, sir, remember the men—I will call them patriots, though I incur the contradiction of his Excellency—you remember the distinguished gentlemen whose services in the field and in the Cabinet have been acknowledged by their countrymen; you remember the patriots who, on this floor and on the floor of the Senate, denounced that act as a Pandora's box, from which would fly all over the land the elements of discord and strife. They "hoped it would be the final end of the slavery agitation?" They called their country and their God to witness that it would prove the beginning of that agitation, and that they washed their hands of its responsibility. The South not less than the North. What bitter, burning words of execration did the distinguished statesman from Missouri, then a Representative, formerly a Senator, always a pure patriot and an honest man, denounce it as a delusion and a snare; as an outrage upon the North, as a dishonor to the South; as a violation of her plighted faith; as the price of perfidy with which demagogues were pressing her palm. What said the distinguished Senator from Tennessee; what the gallant Senator from Texas? "If this bill passes, depend upon it, there will be a tremendous shock. It will convulse the country from Maine to the Rio Grande. We shall have seen the commencement of the agitation, but the youngest child now born will not live to witness its termination." Such was the warning, such was the prediction heard everywhere outside the circle of political tradesmen and party hucksters.

Hardly a man of the North, in Congress or out of it, could be found at first to support it. Even the venerable Senator from Michigan, now Secretary of State, who, six years before, had laid the foundation of the steps which led to its consummation, gave it an unwilling support, pronouncing it inexpedient and unwise; and he has since designated as "disgraceful to the age," a code of laws which was among the first of its legitimate fruits. Where, then, does the President find his authority for saying that every patriot in the country hoped it would "settle" the slavery agitation? Sir, it settled nothing; it unsettled everything. It unsettled the time-honored policy of the country respecting the Government of the national domain. It unsettled the "finality" which it was claimed the compromises of 1850 had established. It unsettled the obligations of compacts between different sections of the country. It has unsettled the foundations of southern chivalry, and destroyed forever all confidence in its faith or honor. It has unsettled the political boundaries of parties, displacing them with sectional and geographical lines. It has unsettled the confidence of the American people in the impartial integrity of their highest judicial tribunal.

Mr. Chairman, African slavery was early a source of anxiety to American statesmen. In various records before the Revolution, in the draft of the Declaration of Independence itself, it was enumerated among the wrongs inflicted on the colonies by the mother country, which justified the separation. Our independence achieved, steps were immediately taken to abolish it. Virginia, foremost in those days in vindicating the principles of human liberty, was first to devise plans for its extinction; and she entered upon the task of preventing its extension as the surest and speediest mode of its destruction.

This policy was continued all along in the progress of the country, until the few fanatics who had always resisted it, uniting under the leadership of the sagacious Calhoun, pronounced it heretical and unconstitutional. They declared that slavery was a national blessing; that it furnished the "most perfect relation that can exist between capital and labor;" that it reposes for its security and for its equality with all other proprietary rights in the provisions of the Constitution; that it is an institution ordained of God, and ought therefore to be protected, enlarged, and perpetuated. The singleness of purpose, the boldness and intrepidity with which they maintained their position, soon attracted attention, North and South; and those aspiring to Federal promotion paid their addresses to this new element of political power. The movement has since advanced with that steady, certain progress, which the timidity of its opponents, no less than the firmness of its advocates, insured. Its triumphs are epochs, bold and striking, in the history of the country. Annexation of Texas in 1845; squatter sovereignty in 1848; non-intervention in 1854; the constitutional establishment of slavery in all the national territory in 1857—these are the monuments which celebrate at once the abasement of freedom and the achievements of slavery.

Such events were not wrought by ordinary agencies. To effect them the old landmarks which divided the opinions of the American people, in their domestic or foreign policy, are removed, and the demoralization of all parties is complete. Adherence to the principles of Jefferson is no longer orthodox democracy. The modern test, rather, is, not how long have you been in the Democratic party, but how late were you out of it? Have you spent the vigor of life in hostility to it? then are you fitted to take charge of its interests. Are you in the Senate by virtue of a commission granted by its traditional enemies? you shall declare its principles and direct its policy. Are you in the House of Representatives? you shall control its Territorial Committee, you shall lead its Committee on Foreign Relations. Did you desert the Democratic nominations in 1848? you shall be at the head of its Committee on Commerce. All these posts of honor you shall hold, provided, only, you are sound on the Lecompton constitution; for that only is the test of modern Democracy. Do you claim to have been born in that party, and to have followed its fortunes for half a century? it shall avail you nothing, unless you submit to the dogmas which new comers have interpolated in its creed. Those whom you have met and conquered on many a well-fought field, are hereafter to be your masters, and when they crack the whip of party leadership, the old guard must bow in silent submission. You are free on all other questions; but on this project of extending African slavery, by fraud and violence, if need be, those who question its wisdom are denounced as heretics and renegades. The thunders of the central organ are awakened, and the laqueys who throng the national capital echo its anathemas.

Sir, it is time this retrogression of the civilization of the Republic ceased. I believe it has ceased. The people of the North, of all political parties, have determined to participate in the government of this country. "Acquiescence" has lost its charm over them. Such legislation only will be acquiesced in as is just and right. What is unjust and wrong will be corrected by the appellate power of the country—discussion and the ballot. If the exercise of this power shall indeed reform the Government; if it shall take it from the exclusive control of the slaveholding States which, the Senator from South Carolina says, have held it for sixty years, gentlemen need have no fears that it will not be administered with justice and impartiality. The Republican party, when, in 1861, it shall take charge of this Government, will endeavor to reinvest it with something of the purity, the justice, the civilization, the higher law, with which it was clothed at its birth. While it will not interfere with slavery in the States, it will see to it that the Federal Government be no longer made the instrument of its extension. In this respect, it will not go beyond the designs of that party which, ten years ago, carried the Empire State by eight thousand majority against the "national" Democracy upon this very issue. But there are other gentlemen—there may be some on this floor—who know more of that party than I do. They were its leaders; I was among the humblest of its followers; they did not then give so much importance to the exceeding virtue and intelligence of "short boys," "shoulder-hitters," and "dead rabbits" as they do now. Then they thought the people in the country had some knowledge of public affairs, some energy, and some political honesty. They came out into the rural districts, and, patting the country boys on the shoulder, exhorted them to stand firm, declaring that no more slave States should be admitted into the Union, especially from territory north of 36° 30'. They waxed eloquent upon this theme. Two of them, father and son, the one by elaborate manifestoes penned in the retirement of Lindenwald, the other by a running fire of speeches, gave themselves so thoroughly to the work, that uncharitable people suspected they were moved by motives not altogether free from personal considerations. The sequel demonstrates the justice of that suspicion.

Times change and men change with them. Ten years ago, there seemed to be an impassable gulf between these free-soilers and the pro-slavery hunkers, as they termed their adversaries. But the Wilmot proviso was struck down; the Missouri compromise has been repealed; territory, then free, has become as much the abode of slavery "as South Carolina or Georgia," and these gentlemen proclaim their "uncompromising" purpose to force that territory, with slavery, into the Union, in order that it may be perfectly free to regulate and form its domestic institutions in its own way! To this complexion has it come at last. This is the end of the entertainment to which Van Buren, Dix & Co., invited the people in 1848.

Mr. Chairman, there are three great facts respecting this Lecompton constitution, so plain, so universally admitted, and so conclusive, that I adopt them as the guide of my action upon it.

First, there is no proof that that constitution embodies the will of the people who are to live under it. This is admitted on all sides. Even the President does not deny it; and his friends in both Houses of Congress frankly acknowledge it.

Second, there being no proof that it embodies the will of the people, it ought to have been submitted for their ratification or rejection.

Third, it not having been so submitted, it is our duty to refer it back to the people.

The only pretext alleged here for not so referring it, is that the free-State men of Kansas have, by their factious, disorganizing conduct, forfeited all right to vote upon their constitution. Now, sir, I maintain that the proceedings in Kansas do not authorize us to violate the well-settled principles of popular government. I insist upon it, that looking at the whole history of that people, you cannot find an instance in the annals of the world where a community has shown itself, by its gentle wisdom, by its courageous forbearance, by its steady maintenance of right and resistance to wrong, better entitled to the full and free exercise of self-government. The great complaint against them is that they did not vote at the election of the Lecompton convention. Now, Governor Walker and Governor Stanton dispose of this objection. They show conclusively that the reason they did not vote at that election was threefold: first, they were all unwilling to acknowledge the legality of the Legislature which called it; second, many who proposed to waive this objection could not vote, because the pro-slavery officers had not taken the requisite census and registry; third, they were all assured by their Governors, speaking for the President, that the constitution to be formed by the convention should be submitted to them, and they could then act upon it as effectually as though they voted at the election of the delegates; and if not so submitted, it would be rejected by Congress.

All the Governors you have sent to Kansas, selected from the enemies of that people and prejudiced against them, concur, so far as they have made known their opinions, in the declaration that their conduct, taken as a whole, is justifiable; and that, to-day, they are clearly and indubitably in the right, while the pro-slavery minority are as clearly in the wrong. I take their testimony as good authority; I accept it as an admission from the other side, and they cannot escape from it. Who, of all men, are best informed, and, therefore, most competent to enlighten us on these questions? Surely, the Governors who were on the spot, and were themselves a part of the transactions they describe. They pronounce this constitution the legitimate fruit of a stupendous fraud and usurpation, and they declare that an overwhelming majority of the people of the Territory utterly abhor and reject it, and will never permit it to be forced upon them. Remember, these witnesses are southern men, themselves slaveholders, supporters of the Kansas and Nebraska act, prominent leaders in the Democratic party, whose reputation for truth and veracity rests on a long career of honorable public services. It is useless to malign their motives. If proper subjects of inquiry, how strongly would they be found to urge them to go with their friends and against their political enemies. Sir, I hope the day is far distant when an American citizen shall not be permitted to bear testimony, if legitimately called upon to do so, upon a question of fact, because it may prejudice the interests of the political party to which he belongs, without being denounced as false, treacherous, and hypocritical. When such shall be the sway of party, then, indeed, shall we have a despotism in our midst as absolute and as irresponsible as the public mind shall be debauched and enslaved.

Sir, we are not bound to admit a new State to the Union merely because a part of the people of a Territory make application, accompanied by what they call a constitution. Gentlemen need not tell me that we have no right to look behind the papers laid before us, and that if those papers are technically regular we are estopped from further investigation. The Senator from Georgia likens the discharge of our duty in this respect to the execution of a process by a ministerial officer—a sheriff—which must be enforced though it be wrong. Even in such cases, courts interfere, open judgments, grant new trials, and stay final execution, till the right of appeal is exhausted, and the ends of substantial justice attained. Away with this talk about our being estopped in our legislative duties by forms and technicalities! We owe it to the people of Kansas, to justice and truth, to investigate this whole matter; and if we find this constitution tainted in the least with substantial fraud, if we find it does not embody the will of the majority of the people who are to live under it, we ought to reject it.

The President of the United States supports his charges against the people of Kansas, by quoting from Governor Walker and Governor Stanton in a manner which at once betrays the weakness of his cause, and degrades the office he holds. He selects extracts from the letters of these gentlemen, written, as they themselves say, when they were ill-informed of the condition of affairs, and prejudiced by the misrepresentations of the creatures who infested the executive departments, against the people they were sent to govern; and he weaves these adroitly-scissored extracts into his argument, and parades them before the country in justification of the calumnies which he heaps upon that people. Now, why had he not the common honesty to say that these gentlemen, the moment they made themselves acquainted with the true state of affairs in the Territory, were forced to yield to the conviction, as their predecessors had done, that an infamous fraud had been practiced upon the people by the creatures of the Executive and their ruffian confederates from Missouri? Why did he studiously suppress their later communications, made at a period immediately connected with the history of the Lecompton constitution?

Mr. Chairman, let us not force this constitution upon the people of Kansas. Let us have no contest with them. They are in the right. They have been in the right all along. They have all along borne too much of wrong. They never should have allowed that Lecompton convention to meet. It never would have met only for the solemn assurances of Walker that its work should be submitted to the people. The frightened delegates made the same promise, and the people, preferring peace, suffered them to meet. It was a mistake; they should have driven them from the country, and if the army interfered, there should have been another Lexington and Bunker Hill. It is idle, sir, for the President to attempt a military despotism in this country. The American people are themselves accustomed to the use of arms, and they look upon the Federal Army as their servants, not their masters. The end of military rule in Kansas is at hand. The people are about to take charge of their own affairs in their own way. They have had enough of the "perfect freedom" of popular sovereignty. It has proved to them, what was predicted of it when it was inaugurated, a cheat and a delusion.

I call upon the President, then, to let that people alone. They can take care of themselves; they will take care of themselves. Let him cease the calumnies with which he is traducing them. Such conduct does not comport with his constitutional rights, the dignity of his position, nor the obligations he owes to truth. The freemen of Kansas have proved themselves worthy the name of American citizens, and the memory of their heroic virtues will live in history and tradition, when all of their traducer, save that he was once President of the Republic, shall have been forgotten.

Are not gentlemen satisfied with the experiments already tried? The President certainly has done all they ought to require of him. He cannot subdue the people of Kansas. He can place no obstacles to the full and free exercise of their constitutional rights, which they will not trample upon with scorn and contempt. He has tried faithfully to force slavery upon them. He has failed, and he is destined to fail as often as he renews the contest. No man, however high in position, however unscrupulous in the use of means, can triumph over the rights unless he shall first corrupt the virtues of the American people.

Let the President, then, retrace his steps. Let him give this constitution back to Calhoun, who made it. It was not made by the people of Kansas, it does not embody their will. There is not a man in this House, there is not an intelligent man in the country, who does not know that an overwhelming majority of the people now in Kansas are opposed to it. The President and his predecessor have sent six Governors, with an "army two thousand strong, with General Harney to command it, with dragoons and two batteries," to subjugate that people; and what have they accomplished? Nothing. Four of them have returned disgusted with the work required of them. The fifth (Shannon) nobody knows what has become of him. He was not of much account when he was appointed—he is of less now. The sixth will soon return, it is believed, to repeat the story of his predecessors. Then let the minority be advised to yield to the will of the majority. Let a Governor be appointed who will cooperate with the people in restoring peace to the country.

Mr. Chairman, it seems that the nation is to be called upon to determine which of the two antagonistic systems, freedom or slavery, is to prevail to the exclusion of the other. If the trial of this issue is insisted upon by our southern friends, the North will meet it. Thus far she has not sought to force her institutions upon the South. Whether she shall be compelled to do so, to adopt the policy of an aggressive development and extension of her system, is a question well to be considered by southern statesmen. If they will no longer abide by compromises—if they will insist upon crowding us to the wall—let them ponder the consequences. I tell them here plainly that this attempt to push slavery beyond the local jurisdiction which sanctions it, will not only fail, but it will lead, if persisted in, to an earnest inquiry on the part of the North into the means by which an institution so fruitful of continual evil may be removed entirely out of the way. The campaign, once begun on the broad plan laid down by the South, will end only in the permanent settlement of the great question, whether freedom or slavery is to control the destinies of this continent. That freedom will win is as sure as that the battle is to be fought in this country and in this age of progress and reform.

And that triumph will be at once the triumph of liberty and the triumph of the Union. There will be no disunion, no infringement upon State sovereignty, no secession. State sovereignty! When we speak of the Union there is no such thing!

There are powers, sovereign powers, which the States possess, and have not alienated; but when we speak of the unity of the States, of the Federal Government, we speak of a sovereignty absolute and indivisible. Secession! Sir, this Confederation of States is a partnership for life. As new members cannot come in, so none can go out of it save by the common consent. They are joined together for better or for worse, and there is no power of divorce.

Go on, then, "extending the area of freedom;" wage wars of conquest with your sister Republics of Central America, with Mexico, and Cuba; open the door to immigration; but all this time, be assured, Jonathan with his "organized colonization" will be there, and the free laborers of Ireland, of Scotland, and Germany will go with him; for he finds honorable employment for them; he works with them; he talks with them; he teaches them, in his homely, practical way, the new ideas of the New World about government, liberty, equality, and the dignity of labor. Thus are they drawn to him, and he to them. They assimilate; they form one body-politic; they are one people.

In his care to push forward the interests of the new community, the claims of education are not forgotten. In a little grove by the road-side is reproduced the old school-house of New England, where he learned, among his first lessons, that human institutions are founded in the Christian religion; that governments derive their just authority from the consent of the governed; that the American Union was established by the united wisdom, and cemented by the common blood, of the sages and heroes of the Revolution; and that it is to stand a monument of their virtues and their patriotism, now and forever, one and inseparable.

But, sir, the South begins to appreciate that the acquisition of new territory, in any direction, is her weakness, not her strength; and ere long she will give the order to halt in this career of southern extension. Some new dogma of "equality under the Constitution" will be found to stand in the way. Already the notes of warning have been sounded. The prophetic eye of Calhoun foresaw that annexation might endanger his theory of equilibrium, and while he was willing to take Texas, without war and with slavery already established, he opposed the invasion of Mexico, lest it should result in more territory than his peculiar institution could occupy. And northern men then in Congress were importuned to avoid the war for that very reason. In his letter to Mr. King, in 1844, deprecating the conquest of Mexican territory, he said:

"It is our policy to increase by growing and spreading out into unoccupied regions, assimilating all we incorporate; in a word, to increase by accretion, and not through conquest by the addition of masses held together by the cohesion of force. No system can be more unsuited to the latter process, or better adapted to the former, than ours."

It is a significant fact that these words were rephrased the other day in connection with the neutrality question by the Washington Union, and the attention of the South particularly called to them.

And the gentleman from Mississippi complains that annexation thus far has damaged the South. What would gentlemen have? We acquire new territory for the South, and because she cannot occupy it, they complain. Are we to stand still because she cannot advance? Are the vigor and energy of freemen and free labor to be forever repressed to the dead level of slavery? She has the Government, the Executive, the Legislature, the judiciary, all subservient to her behests, and yet, where is she? Compare her with the North and West. Take up two States of equal size that entered the Union together. What are their relative positions now? Trace the comparison all along from the beginning of the Republic—what do you find? A rapidity of growth unparalleled in the history of the world on the one side, and comparative stagnation or absolute retrogression on the other.

Let the South then abandon her insane project of slave propagandism. It and the management of the Federal Government—the enjoyment of its patronage and power, have too long absorbed her energies, preventing the development of the vast and varied resources of her material prosperity, and the moral and intellectual advancement of her people. Let her cease making this one idea of slavery the test of patriotism; let her abandon the cry of the "union of the South for the sake of the South." Let her people reassert their individual right to think and act, to form parties and combinations as their honest differences of opinion and various local and domestic interests may dictate. Let her do this, and she will again become in spirit and truth, as she is now only in form, a living, active part of the Union, sympathizing in the advancement of its common interests and its common glory.

Mr. Chairman, we are in the midst of the last act of this drama. Its opening, its incidents, its plot, its progress, have all been arranged secundum artem. Its first act was the repeal of the Missouri compromise; its second, the border ruffian invasion; its third, the usurped Legislature; its fourth, the Leecompton convention; its fifth is committed to the hands of the President and Congress, and the scene is transferred to the national capital. If it shall be conducted to its legitimate catastrophe, then, indeed, will have been committed a crime almost without a parallel in the history of the world. Others have been as violent, others have been more bloody; but they were perpetrated when and where, as there was less appreciation of civil justice and political rights, so there was less accountability for their violation. But here, in the model Republic, in the middle of the nineteenth century, with the examples of the Revolution and the principles of Christian democracy throwing a flood of light in our pathway, for an American Congress to deliberately enact so great a wrong—sir, I contemplate it with horror. I cannot believe it will be consummated.

And yet I know not but this bill is destined to pass. I remember the repeal of the Missouri compromise was condemned by the nearly unanimous voice of the country when it was first proposed. And yet it passed. I know the President's power. I appreciate his material arguments, far more effective than written messages. I remember how these arguments were plied in 1854. I am prepared to see this measure pass. But I hope for the best. I look for wiser counsels among those gentlemen of the South on this floor who, I believe, are actuated by a desire to promote the peace and welfare of the country. From those of the North who have determined to support this bill I look for nothing. I regret they should have felt it their duty to place obedience to the Executive above the obligations they owe their people and their country. For the fair fame of the North, which is so often taunted with venality, I hope subsequent events may give rise to no suspicion that the votes they are about to record are in the least tainted with dishonor.

Above all, let us who have arrayed ourselves on the side of the people in their unequal contest with power, stand firm and united, doing our whole duty, be the consequences what they may. I invoke the blessings of Heaven on our efforts. I pray that the ominous clouds which are gathering over us may be dispelled; that the sounds of domestic discord which now afflict our ears may cease; and that entire harmony may once more embrace the great brotherhood of American States.

Why should we continue this fratricidal war? Let us rather all submit to the destiny of our country. We cannot resist it. It will go onward and upward until the whole Union and its now unoccupied domain shall exhibit a picture of beauty abounding in all the attributes of Christian civilization, such as the world has never yet seen. All artificial distinctions before the law will have been merged in one political brotherhood, where none shall be master and none shall be slave—where honorable labor, with her attendants, health, happiness, and plenty, shall be free to all, and shall make all free. Then, indeed, will the dreams of the founders of the Republic have been realized; then will the principles of justice and equality, as enunciated in the Declaration of Independence, have accomplished their mission, and the country they gave to the world have become the perpetual abode of charity and peace.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the question of the admission of Kansas has been unjustly made to assume a sectional character. It has, for the most part, been regarded as a southern or northern question, and it is discussed less with reference to its own merits than its bearing on the interests of antagonistic sections. Appeals are made to local prejudices and passions on either side; the existence of the Union is menaced; and it seems as if there was a studied effort to kindle implacable feuds, and divide the nation into two warring camps.

Whatever personal advantage or consequence may be gained by mingling in this war of sections, I shall willingly forego. While the Union lasts—and I do not believe it is within the power of party zealots to so inflame the people with their own disloyal passions as to madden them to its destruction—I shall hold it my duty, as a national legislator, to look at all questions that come before this body in a comprehensive, American scope of view; to consider them as affecting the welfare of the whole country. And most jealously shall I withhold my suffrage from any scheme of party that seeks to build up the interests of one portion of the country at the expense of another.

Living on the southern verge of the northern States, representing a city eminently liberal in its political sentiments, and pledged to no inflexible line of party action, I am free to adopt such a course on this question as my own conscientious convictions assure me will be most propitious to its speedy and peaceful adjustment, and to the future tranquillity of the nation. Having the clearest evidence that a large majority of the people of Kansas are opposed to the Leecompton constitution, I shall not usurp their right to form their own fundamental law, and impose upon them an instrument which they detest and abhor. If political inconsistency were not of such frequent occurrence as to cease to excite surprise, we might well be astonished at the assertion of the right of Congress to dictate to the people of a Territory a constitution which is to bind them as a State.

It may be denied, but it is none the less true, that the power is claimed for Congress, in conjunction with a minority in Kansas, to establish a constitution for that nascent State, in defiance of the protesting voice of a large majority of its people. This arrogant pretension is made by those, strange to say, who repudiate the constitutional authority of Congress to prohibit slavery in a Territory, or to legislate upon it in any manner. While a clear and unmistakable provision of the Constitution of the United States, exercised to its full extent in the ordinance of 1787, with the subsequent sanction of the framers of the Constitution under the Federal Government and in the Missouri compromise, is set aside, the power of congressional interference in the domestic institutions of a Territory is attempted in a newer and far more questionable form.

To justify this position, every available expedient that sophistical ingenuity can suggest is employed. It is argued that it is not necessary to submit constitutions directly to a vote of the people for ratification, and that there are instances in which this has not been done. This may be so; but the necessity for popular ratification in this case arises from the policy inaugurated by the Kansas-Nebraska act. The apology for the repeal of the Missouri compromise was, that Congress ought to divest itself of all power to control the settlement of the question of slavery in the Territories, and confer it exclusively on the people. Such was the declared intent of the Nebraska-Kansas act. This was supposed to be the future and established policy of the Government. However much opposed at first by the friends of the Missouri compromise, it was gradually commending itself to the country as an easy and feasible mode of settling this vexed question; in other words, complete independence on all domestic concerns was conceded to the people of the Territories, and Congress waived all right of interference.

On this, the first application of this new policy, it seems, however, public expectation is to be disappointed as to its beneficent effects. Because a constitution, tolerating slavery, is presented to Congress, we are urged to admit Kansas into the Union under it, notwithstanding that we have the most indubitable evidence that that constitution outrages the sentiments and wishes of an overwhelming majority of her citizens. Frauds the most monstrous, and proved by evidence the most convincing, are not allowed to be investigated; and it seems to be determined to override every rule of fair action, for the purpose of securing another slave State.

All we of the Opposition ask, is that the will of the people shall be ascertained and respected; that fraud and violence shall not be indorsed by this supreme political tribunal; that a fatal precedent shall not be set, which shall hereafter encourage base men to violate law, and trample on the rights of their fellow-citizens. Our elections are vitiated enough by illegal practices, which are stimulated and tolerated by men in authority in the great cities to such an alarming degree, that they are rapidly degenerating into mere farcical exhibitions. If election frauds shall be connived at by this body, and their perpetrators be defended and patronized by the President of the United States, the ballot-box will lose all its moral influence, and venality, perjury, and ruffianism, will rule the destinies of the country. This question has a moral aspect of immense importance, and I beg gentlemen to look at it candidly, and see if its pernicious consequences are not enduring and far-reaching.

I beg gentlemen of the South to pause and consider if the toleration of fraud and defiance of the popular will in this case are not likely to react on the interests they represent? If Arizona, or a new State to be formed out of Texas, should apply for admission into the Union with a constitution prohibiting slavery; and the evidence should be as undeniable in that case as in this, that the constitution was carried by violence and fraud; and that two thirds of the people were opposed to it, what right would the South have to complain, if we should refuse to go behind the record, and examine into the truth of these allegations; if, determined on enjoying an illegal victory, we should close our ears to the remonstrances of a protesting people, and despotically make our will paramount and absolute? If the Representatives of the free States were disposed to avail themselves of the advantages of such a fraud-gotten triumph, they could appeal for a justificatory precedent to the action recommended by the President in the admission of Kansas.

"In these cases,
We still have judgment here; that we but teach
Bloody instructions, which, being taught, return
To plague the inventor! This even-handed justice
Commends the ingredients of our poison'd chalice
To our own lips."

God forbid that any northern man should countenance such transactions, even for the purpose of extending the area of freedom! It would dishonor the cause, and destroy public confidence in our characters as just-dealing and law-regarding men. For one, I will never aid in forcing a form of government on a people which they do not wish; and I am willing to give them full and exclusive power to regulate their own institutions. I have too high an opinion of the character of the people of the South to believe that they desire to profit by a dishonest victory, or that they will sanction anything but upright and honorable dealing. To do otherwise than the latter would be in direct conflict with that high-toned sense of honor and chivalric spirit of conduct which they have always claimed as attributes of southern character.

Rejoice to see that two veteran Senators—noble relics of a generous and patriotic party—rising superior to the prejudices of section, and the clamor of faction, have led the way in the vindication of the true character of the South. They cannot be tempted to sully her fame by rendering her a party to fraud, or, for any sectional advantage, support the cause of injustice, and trample under foot the acknowledged rights of the people. To denounce such men as traitors to the South betrays an obliquity of feeling that can only spring from the intensest party hate, or a bigotry of temper that brooks no difference of opinion. Were either of those two men of immortal memory—Henry Clay and Daniel Webster—with whom, for so many years, they fought the great battle of popular privilege against executive prerogative, now living, the walls of this Capitol would reverberate with the thunder of an eloquence greater than his who

"Shook the arsenal, and fulminated over Greece To Macedon and Artaxerxes' throne," rebuking, in indignant terms, the infamous scheme which this Congress is urged to consummate. Like Crittenden and Bell, they never faltered in the performance of their full measure of duty. The darker the crisis, the firmer and more lustrous shone their patriotic courage. As their gallant survivors, their motives were impeached, and their characters traduced; but the approving voice of conscience sustained them in the wildest fury of the tempest of abuse and calumny to which they were exposed. Their names now stand out in bold relief on the pages of history, in all their native grandeur of intellect, dignity of character, and purity of purpose; while no lapse of time, and no factitious consequence, derived from high station, can ever blind the discriminating eye of posterity to the base impulses and mean spirit of their calumniators.

It is an easy task, sir, to obey executive dictation, and serve the behests of power; but it requires an exalted moral courage, and a stern and unfaltering patriotism, to be ever loyal to the country and the people. The worship of power brings place and pelf; devotion to the country little else than a sense of duty honestly discharged, and the applause of the discriminating judgment of the wise and good. Sycophants have abounded in all ages; but patriotic statesmen of the temper of Cato, Chatham, Webster, Clay, Bell, and Crittenden, are as rare as they are illustrious.

From among the vulgar and ignoble hordes who, like fawning slaves, cringe and bow beneath the lash and nod of arbitrary authority, who

"Reneged, affirm, and turn their halcyon beaks
With every gale and vary of their masters, Knowing naught, like dogs, but following—" such men rise up supreme and majestic, in sublime grandeur, vindicating the higher qualities of our nature, and inspiring the latest ages by the example of their heroic championship of liberty and right.

I know, sir, the power of the executive branch of this Government, and the despotic and cruel manner in which the President exercises his short-lived authority. The advocates of the Constitution, in defending it against those who, in the State conventions, denounced the power and influence of the President as likely to become an overmatch for the coordinate branches of Government, never dreamed that, within half a century after its adoption, these apprehensions would be realized. Washington, Hamilton, Madison, Franklin, and the other framers of that instrument, never believed that the President of the United States could descend to such petty tyranny as to allow no difference of opinion even in the ranks of his own party friends; that he would require the meanest office-holder under him to surrender his private judgment and accept the will of the Executive as the infallible standard of truth; and that he would punish dissent, even on a single point of party policy, with expulsion from office. The one-man power has grown to formidable and dangerous dimensions; and supported, as it is, by an army of dependent servitors, and a venal, plundered press, and clothed with a most corrupting patronage, it threatens danger alike to the liberties of the country and the independence of Congress. Every engine is brought to bear against this body, to shake its fidelity to the Constitution and the people. Important offices are held waiting the decision of great questions; independent, high-minded members' names are entered on a proscription list, as infamous as that of Antony and Lepidus; and the Government organ is daily gorged with personal abuse and vile imputations against every man who, on this floor, dares to form and express his opinions with the independence that becomes an American Representative. It really seems as if it was designed to stifle free discussion, and make this body a mere registry of executive edicts—as servile as the Senate of Caesar and of Louis Napoleon.

But, sir, tremendous as is the power of the Executive, and demoralizing as is the influence of the immense patronage he wields, it cannot control public opinion, nor stifle its intimidating voice. Like the surges of the ocean, it cannot be lashed into quietude; it cannot be fettered by chains of party discipline; no haughty mandate of power can overawe or check its free and tumultuous roll. Flatterers may intoxicate the brain of him who wields the scepter into the belief that he is omnipotent, but a mighty and puissant nation, jealous of its freedom, once aroused, will vindicate its derogated rights, and chastise, with righteous rage, the insolence of executive usurpation, and those who abet and sustain it.

When the Territory of Kansas was duly organized and opened for settlement, all men were free to come in and make it their home. Whether they came singly or in organized bands, with or without arms, from the North or the South, no one had a right to dispute their entrance into the Territory. They who condemn the systematic plan of emigration set on foot in New England, impugn one of the most ancient and unquestioned privileges of the Anglo-Saxon race—a privilege which the most despotic sovereigns of Italy and the German States have occasionally fettered the exercise of, but which they have never dared wholly to deny or prohibit. Free and untrammelled liberty of emigration and movement, from the time that the Germanic tribes of the north first burst the barrier of the Alps, and poured down on the plains of Italy, mingling their blood and tongue with the people and language of imperial Rome, has to this day been a peculiar characteristic of the Teutonic stock. It is none the less so of the Anglo-American people.

The New England emigrants went to Kansas in quest of a new home; their object was as legitimate as that which inspired the landing at Plymouth and the settlement at Jamestown. If their aim was also to found a free State, to make a peaceful conquest for free institutions, that was purely just and proper, and it enhanced the merit of their enterprise. The founder of a free commonwealth was honored while living by the Greeks and Romans as a benefactor of his species, and raised to divine honors after death. Honor to the hardy descendants of the Pilgrim Fathers, whose enterprising and adventurous spirits carries American civilization into the remotest wildernesses of the remote West! And especial honor to them for having led the way in the achievement of this latest victory of freedom over slavery!

It was an honest victory, gained in a hard-contested battle, fairly fought and fairly won, between the advocates of opposite systems of polity. The repeal of the Missouri compromise line and the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska act rendered a contest between the friends of free and slave labor inevitable in the Territory of Kansas. It was the duty of the President to protect both the contending parties in the enjoyment of their respective rights; to act with impartial justice, and frustrate the efforts of either to accomplish its purposes by fraud or violence. It was within his cognizance that unlawful organizations, under the name of blue lodges, confederated together by secret oaths, had been formed along the Missouri frontier, for the purpose of opposing the peaceful operation of the Kansas-Nebraska act, and preventing the settlement of the Territory by free-State men; and yet he made no efficient effort to foil their iniquitous schemes.

These ruffian fraternities, which the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HATCH,] in his virtuous zeal against secret political societies, strangely overlooked, were the primary cause of all the disorders which have marked the history of Kansas. They it was who attempted to drive out of Kansas the first free-State colony of emigrants, under Branscomb, Pomeroy, and Robinson, and prevent them from laying the foundations of the town of Lawrence; who instigated the destruction of the free-spoken press of the Parkville Luminary; who tarred and feathered William Phillips, and turned the Rev. Pardee Butler afloat on a raft on the Missouri, for protesting against their arbitrary conduct; who besieged, with military array, the unoffending town of Lawrence, destroyed some of its chief buildings, and sacked, and plundered others; who lined the banks of the Missouri with armed bands, prohibited the passage of free-State emigrants, and entered steamers, and broke open and pilfered the trunks of this class of emigrants, and then forced them to return.

Not satisfied with covering Kansas with fire and blood, they determined to thwart the legal expression of the popular will at the ballot-box. Notwithstanding that provision of the Kansas-Nebraska act which declared that it was "the true intent and meaning of this act, not to legislate slavery into any Territory or State, nor to exclude it therefrom, but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States," they combined to defraud the legal voters of their rights, by polluting the ballot-box with illegal votes, and by intimidating, or violently preventing, the resident citizens from the exercise of the right of suffrage. In the first election, that for territorial Delegate, the report of the investigating committee appointed by the last Congress, shows that the polls were, for the most part, seized and kept possession of by bands of desperate men from Missouri, who did almost all the voting themselves. Of the two thousand eight hundred and seventy-one votes cast at that election, this report proves that one thousand seven hundred and twenty-nine were illegal. In the subsequent election for a Territorial Legislature, on the 30th of March, 1855, the same scenes were reënacted. The Missouri invaders polled four thousand nine hundred and eighty illegal votes; and of the one thousand three hundred and ten legal votes, seven hundred and ninety-one were cast for the free-State candidates.

This Legislature, elected by fraudulent votes, was an alien body, imposed on the people of Kansas by alien votes, and was rightfully regarded at all times as utterly destitute of legal authority. When it met, its first act was to deprive the only free-State member of the Council of his seat, and to expel from the House the free-State members chosen at the second election. If such a Legislature was legal, then a Legislature of Pennsylvania, chosen by armed bands of intruders from New York would be legal; and the people of any State could be justified in crossing into an adjacent State, driving its citizens from the polls, and imposing on them a Legislature of their own choosing, to enact such laws as might suit their peculiar notions. If the citizens of Pennsylvania would be right in refusing to recognize such a Legislature as clothed with legal authority, the people of Kansas certainly were not wrong in acting in the same manner under like circumstances. It is neither fair nor just to expect the people of Kansas to submit to an outrage which Pennsylvanians or South Carolinians would never have tolerated for a moment.

The infamous code of laws enacted by this Legislature, and properly designated as the black code, would have disgraced the most absolute Government in the Old World. A Legislature which could make it a penitentiary offense to deny the right to hold slaves in a Territory, where the question of slavery was expressly made a debatable one by act of Congress, and could require all voters and officers to take an oath to support the fugitive slave law; and its other unconstitutional, inhuman, and unchristian acts, was as unfit to pass laws for the government of a free people as the Turkish Divan itself. The only wonder is, not that the people of Kansas refused to recognize it, but that they permitted it to hold its sessions at all. Whatever this counterfeit Legislature did was right in the judgment of the ruling authorities at Washington; its laws must be obeyed, odious and despotic as they were, and utterly at variance with the first principles of free institutions. Whatever the people did by way of remonstrance to its tyrannical acts, or of opposition to its usurpations, the administration of President Pierce denounced as rebellion and treason. If Lord Chatham could rejoice that three millions of American colonists rose in arms against the tyranny of the British Parliament, I may be permitted to rejoice that the settlers of Kansas, loyal to the free spirit of their revolutionary ancestors, never could be coerced into subjection to the usurped authority of this bogus Legislature. The employment of the United States troops to sustain the execution of this Draconian code of law was as futile in its results as the attempt to enforce the stamp act by British regulars in America.

The Topeka Legislature, if it was not organized strictly according to law, was chosen by the people of Kansas. The vote cast for it came from legal resident voters, while that which met at Pawnee was elected by Missourians. The former was, to all intents and purposes, the legitimate representative of public opinion in Kansas. The latter might have the strict letter of the law in its favor, but the former had right and justice exclusively on its side. It was perfectly consistent in President Pierce to authorize Governor Shannon to employ the United States troops to enforce the odious and anti-republican laws of the Missouri chosen Legislature, and to order Colonel Sumner to disperse the Topeka Legislature at the point of the bayonet. Had he acted with equal promptitude and decision against the border-ruffians, the scenes of violence and bloodshed which subsequently disgraced the Territory never would have occurred. It was the tacit approbation then extended to these men, and since continued by President Buchanan, which has prolonged and fomented the civil war that so long desolated the plains of Kansas.

In perfect keeping with its other proceedings was the action of the Territorial Legislature in calling a convention to form a State constitution. In the thirty-four regularly organized counties, all of which were named as election districts for delegates to the convention, a census and registry of voters was required to be taken, according to which the apportionment of delegates was to be made. Says Governor Walker:

"In nineteen of these counties there was no census, and therefore there could be no such apportionment there of delegates based upon such census. And in fifteen of these counties there was no registry of voters. These fifteen counties, including many of the oldest organized counties of the Territory, were entirely disfranchised, and did not give, and (by no fault of their own) could not give, a solitary vote for delegates to the convention. The result was superinduced by the fact that the Territorial Legislature appointed all the sheriffs and probate judges in all these counties, to whom was assigned the duty, by law, of making this census and registry. These officers were political partisans, dissenting from the views and opinions of the people of these counties, as proved by the election in October last."

That the omission to take the census and registry was intentional, and that there was a deliberate design to cheat the people in these counties out of the right of voting, is shown by the fact, in the words of Governor Walker—"that where ever they endeavored by a subsequent census or registry of their own to supply this defect, occasioned by the previous neglect of the territorial officers, the delegates thus chosen were rejected by the convention. Surely, then," continues Governor Walker, "it cannot be said that such a convention, chosen by scarcely more than one tenth of the present voters of Kansas, represented the people of that Territory, and could rightfully impose a constitution upon them without their consent. These nineteen counties in which there was no census, constituted a majority of the counties of the Territory; and these fifteen counties, in which there was no registry, gave a much larger vote at the October election, even with the six months' qualification, than the whole vote given to the delegates who signed the Lecompton constitution on the 7th November last."

The report of the board of commissioners appointed by the Legislature shows how successful was this systematic scheme of fraud. They say:

"From the evidence taken before them, the board state that the returns from the Delaware agency precinct were honestly made out by the officers of the election; and subsequently three hundred and thirty-six names were forged upon them, by or with the knowledge of John D. Henderson; and that John Callhoun was particeps criminis after the fact.

"The board report that of the votes returned of the election of the 21st December, 1857, on the slavery clause of the constitution framed at Lecompton, held at the precincts of Kickapoo, Delaware, Oxford, and Shawnee, about the following numbers were illegal and fraudulent:

"At Kickapoo.....	700
Delaware City.....	145
Oxford.....	1,200
Shawnee.....	675
Total.....	2,720"

Of the 6,143 votes officially reported as cast for the Lecompton constitution, 2,720 are thus proved to be fraudulent, leaving only an actual vote of 3,423, much of which also is of a questionable character.

The election of January 4, 1858, witnessed a repetition of these atrocious proceedings. Of the votes returned at this election, for officers under the Lecompton constitution, the following numbers are found by the board to be illegal and fraudulent:

At Kickapoo.....	600
Delaware City.....	5
Delaware agency.....	336
Oxford.....	696
Total.....	2,458

Of the result of this latter election, held under officers appointed by Governor Callhoun, and obliged to make their returns to him alone, we have no certain information down to the present time. We have promises of certificates of election from a man as notoriously liberal in promises as he is unfaithful in their execution; but the certificates have not yet been given. Who are to be the State officers, this oracular pet of our law-and-order President refuses to give the slightest intimation. In vain may the President denounce the free-State men as recreant to duty in refusing to vote on the Lecompton constitution on the 21st of December and at other elections, when it was evident, from repeated trials, that a legal election was impossible. It was useless to cast votes when no account was taken of them, and when the perpetrators of fraud enjoyed the favor and seemed to have the approving sanction of the President of the United States. A decent self-respect justified them in withholding their presence from the polls.

The culminating fraud in this history of outrage was the mode of submitting the constitution to popular vote. One single feature—whether any more slaves may be imported—was alone submitted; while, let the result be what it may, the constitution recognizes and adopts the Oxford fraud as a basis of apportionment of legislative members from Johnson county. This constitution, if adopted, would have perpetuated the minority government, and placed the conspirators against the legal voters in full possession of the new State of Kansas. That a pledge was broken and the people betrayed in not submitting the whole constitution for ratification, is evident from the following address:

To the Democratic Voters of Douglas County:

It having been stated by that Abolition newspaper, the Herald of Freedom, and by some disaffected bogus Democrats, who have got up an independent ticket, for the purpose of securing the vote of the Black Republicans, that the regular nominees of the Democratic convention were opposed to submitting the constitution to the people, we, the candidates of the Democratic party, submit the following resolutions, which were adopted by the Democratic convention which placed us in nomination, and which we fully and heartily indorse, as a complete refutation of the slanders above referred to.

JOHN CALHOUN, A. W. JONES,
W. S. WELLS, H. BUTCHER,
L. S. BOLLING, JOHN M. WALLACE,
WM. T. SPICKLEY, L. A. PRATHER.

LECOMPTON, Kansas Territory, June 13, 1857.

"Resolved, That we will support no man as a delegate to the constitutional convention, whose duties it will be to frame the constitution of the future State of Kansas, and to mold the political institutions under which we, as a people, are to live, unless he pledges himself fully, freely, and without reservation, to use every honorable means to submit the same to every bona fide actual citizen of Kansas at the proper time for the vote being taken upon the adoption by the people, in order that the said constitution may be adopted or rejected by the actual settlers in this Territory, as the majority of the voters shall decide."

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me to call his attention to this fact as to the signature of Mr. Prather to that paper? I have received a letter from him, in which he states that it is a mistake, and that he never put his name to that paper, although others may have done so. He wished me, either in my place here or in some other public manner, to do him justice. He is an old Virginian, and as much opposed to the Lecompton constitution as anybody here.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. Then I am very glad to relieve him from the odium attaching to his name in being mixed up with such a combination.

Neither Calhoun, nor any of his fellow-conspirators, could have been elected delegates to the convention, had it been known that they intended to submit but one single provision of the constitution to the popular ordeal. They were aware of this; and, to deceive their constituents, issued the above false and deceptive address.

The State officers, elected under the Lecompton constitution, in their protest communicated to this House, against its adoption, says:

"The constitution, thus framed, was never submitted by the convention to a fair vote of the people for their ratification or rejection; but, on the other hand, their judgment was insulted, and their rights trifled with by the pretended submission of what is called the 'slavery clause,' in such manner as to present no question except that of the importation of slaves into the State in future, and forcing every one who voted to give his sanction to all the other provisions of the constitution, and to take, if required, a test oath to support said constitution, if adopted. Under the provisions of the schedule providing for said election those who voted a ballot marked 'constitution with slavery,' necessarily gave their sanction to the whole instrument, and those who voted 'constitution with no slavery,' necessarily gave the sanction of their vote to all the provisions of the constitution, except the slavery article, and in lieu thereof substituted an article prohibiting the introduction of slaves into the State in future, and confirming those now in the Territory and their posterity in slavery for all time to come. This was the simple result of the vote. It is scarcely necessary for us to say that the privilege of voting upon one proposition, thus beset with conditions so utterly inadequate and unjust, by the power of deciding upon a single, and, as submitted, by no means an important question, produced at the expense of giving the sanction of our votes to many provisions that our judgment condemned, was, and is considered by the people of Kansas, no boon; but, on the other hand, the offer is justly held to be an insult to a people who know and appreciate the rights of freemen; and hence, eight tenths of the people rejected the offer with contempt, and refused to participate in an election the terms of which thus compromised the dignity of an American citizen."

If any doubt existed as to the real state of public opinion in Kansas, it would be removed by the vote cast against the Lecompton constitution, at the election held on the 4th day of January, 1858, which, according to the certified returns, amounted to ten thousand two hundred and twenty-six; showing a clear majority over that cast for the constitution, on the preceding 21st December, of six thousand eight hundred and three votes. Governor Walker says:

"I state it as a fact, based on a long and intimate association with the people of Kansas, that an overwhelming majority of that people are opposed to that instrument. Indeed, disguise it as we may to ourselves, under the influence of the present excitement, the facts will demonstrate that any attempt by Congress to force this constitution upon the people of Kansas, will be an effort to substitute the will of a small minority for that of an overwhelming majority of the people of Kansas; that it will not settle the Kansas question, or localize the issue; that it will be attended by civil war, extending, perhaps, throughout the Union; thus bringing this question back again upon Congress and before the people, in its most dangerous and alarming aspect."

Shall this unanswerable evidence of the hostility of the people of Kansas to the Lecompton constitution, and these warning counsels, be heeded? or shall the factious spirit of party and sectional covetousness prevail over the dictates of patriotism and discretion? You have the assurance of almost every Governor the President has sent to rule over the people of Kansas, that they have been oppressed beyond endurance, harassed to desperation, and subjected to the most atrocious outrages in their persons, their property, and rights as freemen, by organized bands of ruffians from an adjacent State; that a vile conspiracy has been formed by men lost to every sense of honor, patronized by officers high in authority, reckless of their sworn obligations, to thwart the expression of the popular will, to commit political forgery, and force them to submit to the iron yoke of mob law. You are now invoked to give your approving sanction to this long line of continuous outrage, and, as the British Parliament turned a deaf ear to the remonstrances of our colonial ancestors, to close your ears to the oft-repeated prayer of redress sent to this body by the down-trodden people of Kansas; to refuse to listen to the story of their wrongs, and strike them down by the iron heel of military power. Beware how you shut your eyes to the lessons of history, and particularly to those of our own glorious annals.

The right of the people to elect their own rulers, to govern themselves, is as ancient as the settlement of this country. First asserted and put in force in the cabin of the Mayflower, ere she anchored in the frozen waters of Plymouth bay, and before her freedom-seeking band of exiles landed on the ice-bound coast of Massachusetts, it has been maintained through all stages of our history to the present day. The invasion of that right kindled the fires of the American Revolution; and the descendants of that little band of Pilgrims, from whom kings might be proud to claim descent, though their sacred memories are sneered at and traduced on this floor, were the first to raise their voices and draw their swords in defense of that freedom we have inherited from the common efforts of all our ancestors, North and South, in the tented field.

There is a higher principle involved in this question than gentlemen are willing to admit. Deny to the people of Kansas the right to elect their own system of fundamental law, as you will do, if you adopt the minority constitution framed at Lecompton, and you establish a new epoch in this country; you turn back the tide of American freedom; and you set a baneful example which future usurpers, executive and legislative, will only be too ready to follow, and plead in their own justification. No special pleading, no subtle quarter-sessions' pretexts can mitigate or extenuate the injury you will inflict on the dearest and most cherished principles of American representative government. Pause ere you strike the fatal blow! That free and unpolluted tide which, bursting from beneath the blood-stained fields of the Revolution, has flowed on in generous swell to our own times, watering and ever freshening the roots of free institutions, you cannot divert from its channel, or arrest in its resistless course: as well might you seek to turn back the flood-swollen waters of the Mississippi.

To palliate the wrong you commit in fastening the Lecompton constitution on the necks of an unwilling people, you are driven to the assertion of the most dangerous doctrines. The President declares that this constitution can be changed other than in the manner, and before the time prescribed in the constitution. He says that a majority "can make and unmake constitutions at pleasure." If this be true, then a majority of the people, in defiance of the mode of amendment laid down in the Constitution of the United States, can make and unmake that Constitution at pleasure, just as well as they can do the same with the Kansas constitution. Adopt this radical doctrine, and the Federal Constitution, and that of every State in the Union, will be at the mercy of every fluctuating majority. Unstable as the sand, as changeable as statute law, constitutions, under the operation of such a principle, will cease to be reliable guarantees of vested rights. They will be regarded only as mirrors reflecting the dominant passions of the day, and we shall cease to have any fixed principles of government. Real and personal rights will be equally insecure, and factious violence will usurp the place of law and order. Such a revolutionary doctrine would sound strange from any other statesman than from him, who, in the Ostend manifesto, proclaimed the piratical doctrine that we have a right to seize, and appropriate to our own uses, the possessions of a friendly nation, whenever we should deem it expedient for our own advantage.

Representatives of slaveholding States may well be startled at the announcement of such views. They know that it would justify an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, giving Congress power to legislate over slavery in the States; that it would justify an emigration into Kentucky from a free State in abolishing slavery in that State, or in any other slaveholding State. With such a policy fairly and firmly established, slave property would at any time be liable to be the sport of the majority of the moment, and it would not be worth holding.

This novel and self-refuting notion is one of the far-fetched pretexts always resorted to to justify tyrants in establishing despotism. It is a tacit confession that the Lecompton constitution does not deserve to stand, and is a crafty plea to induce credulous men to give it their sanction. Against the President's declaration, I set the provisions of the constitution itself, restraining its amendment until 1864, and the opinion of one of its ablest and warmest supporters in the Senate, Mr. GREEN, of Missouri, who, in his report to that body, says:

"However grievous its provisions may prove to be, they [the people] cannot change it, without resorting to revolution, until 1864."

My fellow Americans from the South are especially appealed to by the Administration in this its hour of trial. They are expected to sanction these new-fangled ideas of constitutional law. On the one hand they are coaxed, on the other they are cuffed. Lectures of sectional duty are daily read to them, and some of them are charged in one of the semi-official government presses, with having sold the mighty space of their large honors for filthy lucre. Not long since, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HART,] whose especial boast was that he owed his election to the foreign vote, in his eagerness to flatter the prejudices of his foreign constituency, went out of his way, to the great delight of the Administration party in this House, and its organs out of it, to denounce the American party in the most unscrupulous manner. To believe him, his Catholic Irish friends were paragons of American loyalty, while the American members on this floor, and the million of voters who think with them in the country, were the blackest of traitors conspiring the overthrow of the Republic. For my part, I see no danger to the country—in defending it against every kind of foreign aggression, civil or ecclesiastical—in resisting all efforts to pervert the common school system to sectarian purposes—in requiring of the stranger from foreign lands to pass a sufficient apprenticeship among us to understand our institutions, before assisting in their administration—in preventing foreign paupers and criminals from being disgorged on our shores from the plethoric hive of the Old World, to fill our lazaret-houses, and crowd our criminal docks—nor in advocating nationality, domestic peace, and in upholding the union of the States. Nor, sir, can I see any particular mischief to result to the nation, from proscribing religious intolerance, and in claiming the authority of the national Government to secure to American citizens abroad, native and naturalized, the same religious liberty which men of all faiths enjoy in this country.

Never, sir, was there delivered in this Hall a more unjust and indiscriminating impeachment of the motives and aims of honorable men, than in the speech of the member from New York. And yet, sir, he, and the Administration who applauded his philippic to the echo, are now earnestly appealing to my American friends from the South in this their hour of extremity. It is the same scene acted over in the pages of the great dramatist on the Rialto. Shylock, when his help was not needed, was a mercenary Jew—everything that was vile. But when his money was wanted, his revilers were very complaisant, and could flatter and cajole in the most nauseating style. His answer might well serve my South American friends at this time:

“Well, then, it now appears you need my help; Go to, then; you come to me, and you say, ‘Shylock we would have moneys;’ you say so; You, that did void your rheum upon my beard, And foot me, as you spurn a stranger car Over your threshold; moneys is your suit. What shall I say to you? Should I not say, ‘Hath a dog money? Is it possible A cur can lend three thousand ducats?’ or Shall I bend low, and in a bondman’s key, With ‘bated breath and whispering humbleness, Say this— ‘Fair sir, you spit on me on Wednesday last; You spurned me such a day; another time You called me—dog; and for these courtesies I’ll lend you thus much moneys.’”

No, sir, if I mistake not, my American friends will rally in sufficient force with the true friends of the country to save it from the horrors of civil war—to defeat the unconstitutional aims and doctrines of the President and his followers, and to vindicate their pledges of loyalty to the Constitution and the Union. Such an act they will never repeat, for they will be defending principles for which oceans of blood have been shed; they will prevent civil war; they will maintain the violated rights of the oppressed people of Kansas; they will restore peace to a troubled country; they will allay fanatical agitation on either hand, and they will earn the eternal gratitude of the country for a noble and inspiring exhibition of patriotic virtue, at a time when the union of brave men can ward off a dark and lowering cloud, ominous with evil of the most fearful character.

The friends of peace, they who uphold the sovereign rights of the people; they who look upon civil war as the greatest calamity that can befall the country; they who sincerely wish to put an end to the strife that has so long distracted the people of Kansas, by giving full effect to their wishes, have an easy mode of solving existing difficulties. That opportunity is presented in the amendment offered by Mr. CRITTENDEN, in the Senate, referring the whole subject back to the people to whom it belongs. If doubt rests upon such an important question, it ought to be cleared up; the true state of things ought to be ascertained, and the voice of the sovereign authority, that which makes constitutions, and to whose breath we owe our official existence, ought to be carefully sought for, and honestly enforced.

Let others act as they may, I shall stand by the people; I shall maintain their cause and rights against the excesses and usurping pretensions of power. If they are stricken down, I prefer rather to fall with them, than to rise by the betrayal of their interests.

Mr. LANE obtained the floor; but yielded to Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BOGGS reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 306) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1858, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. FLORENCE. I move that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday.

[Cries of “Oh no!”]

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. There is no quorum here to adjourn over.

Mr. HOUSTON called for a division.

Mr. FLORENCE. No member seems desirous of continuing this debate. If the House will consent to proceed to private business to-morrow, I will withdraw my motion.

Mr. HOUSTON. I call the gentleman to order. Debate is not in order.

Mr. FLORENCE. I withdraw my motion.

The motion to adjourn was agreed to; and thereupon (at five o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 27, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The SPEAKER laid before the House resolutions of the Legislature of Washington Territory relative to the construction of a national railroad across the continent, from the Atlantic States to the Pacific ocean; which was referred to the select committee on the Pacific railroad, and ordered to be printed.

EMPLOYÉS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. HOUSTON, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Clerk, the Doorkeeper, and the Postmaster, of the House of Representatives, each furnish to the Speaker, to be submitted to the House, a list containing the names of each and every person appointed by each one of them, respectively, and when appointed, together with the services performed by said appointee, the salary or compensation each appointee receives for said services—specifying the law under which said appointment was made.

Mr. HOUSTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COLLECTING CUSTOM'S REVENUE.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report two bills from the Committee of Ways and Means, in order to have them printed and re-referred to that committee. They are very short bills, but necessary to the business of the country, and my object is, to have them in the possession of the Committee of Ways and Means, so that we shall be able to have action upon them before the close of the session.

There being no objection, a bill making appropriation for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs was read a first and second time.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to inquire whether that bill does not make an appropriation and will not have to go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. It will. My object is (as this is not a regular appropriation bill) to have it within the reach of the Committee of Ways and Means, and printed, so that when the committee reports between this time and the adjournment of the House, we may be able to bring it up before the House, and have it put upon its passage.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. There is one point to which I would call the gentleman's attention, and which, I hope, he will take into his consideration. If I recollect aright, the expenses of collecting the revenue are appropriated by joint resolution, and that is a permanent appropriation. Since the passage of that resolution in 1850, or 1851, there have been no estimates and no appropriations made for that branch of the service. I think that such large amounts, and, in fact, all sums, should be appropriated every year. For my part, I think that the best way to provide for the payment of these expenses is by having the items inserted in the regular annual appropriation bills.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. My object is to get this bill within the reach of the Committee of Ways and Means. When it comes up, the gentleman may offer his amendment. I hope, therefore, there will be no objection.

The bill was recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

ORGANIZATION OF THE TREASURY.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES also, from the same committee, reported a bill modifying the first section of the act entitled “An act to amend an act entitled ‘An act to provide for the better organization of the Treasury, and for the collection, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenues;’” which was read a first and second time, recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

LAND OFFICES IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. COBB. I ask the consent of the House to have taken from the Speaker's table a Senate bill establishing additional land offices in California. It is a public measure of much importance to the country.

Mr. SEWARD. I object.

Mr. COBB. If the gentleman knew what it was he would not object.

Mr. SEWARD. If it does not take the gentleman long to make his statement I am willing to hear him; but I wish to introduce bills myself.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. COBB. Will the gentleman allow me to state the facts?

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will hear what the gentleman wants; but I see that objections are made all round.

Mr. COBB. The Government has ordered sales of public lands in California, and the bill is to establish land offices for the purpose.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I wish the gentleman from Alabama to understand that I am opposed to this irregular mode of doing business. I object.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I call for the regular order of business.

ORSAMUS B. MATTESON.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the consideration of the report of the select committee appointed in the matter of O. B. MATTESON.

Mr. SEWARD. In considering this question, and on looking into the authorities, I find that there is no well-settled judicial authority in this country in relation to the power of the House of Representatives or of the Senate. One of the first cases that I find where the question of the power of the House and Senate has been investigated thoroughly, is a case that occurred in 1798, on an impeachment before the House of Representatives, under the Constitution of the United States, which was supposed at that time to give jurisdiction to the House to impeach a Senator. It was the case of William Blount, to be found in the Annals of Congress, Fifth Congress, and volume 1, page 499, where his impeachment will be found.

The authority set up will be found in the third article, fourth section of the Constitution of the United States, which reads thus:

“The President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.”

It was believed that the term “civil officers of the United States” applied to Senators and Representatives, and hence articles of impeachment were drawn up in the House of Representatives, and the case sent to the Senate for trial. But that impeachment failed for want of jurisdiction, not only of the House, but of the Senate, to try him for any crime known to the laws of the country. The basis of the charge against him was for high crimes and misdemeanors in conspiring and contriving to create and set on foot a military expedition against the Government of Spain. The whole case came up for discussion in regard to the power of the House or Senate to try a member for any crime known to the laws of the country. After the question had been debated at great length, the Senate decided that they had no jurisdiction. The following is the decision in that case, delivered by the Vice President of the United States:

“The court, after having given the most mature and serious consideration to the question, and to the full and able arguments urged on both sides, has come to the decision which I am now about to deliver.

“The court is of opinion that the matter alleged in the plea of the defendant is sufficient in law to show that this court ought not to hold jurisdiction of the said impeachment, and that the said impeachment is dismissed."

I mention this case—the case of Blount—because it involves the powers of the House of Representatives and of the Senate. The position taken was, that the term "civil officers" did not apply to Senators and Representatives, but simply to the President, Vice President, and judicial officers. This question was discussed with great ability in the Senate by Mr. Dallas, who was the counsel for the defendant. I propose to read what he said on that subject:

"The Constitution declares, that 'the House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment'; and that 'the Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments.' Hence, it has been urged that as there is no description of the offenders or the offenses in the Constitution itself, where the power is vested, every offender and every offense, impeachable according to the common law of England, must be deemed impeachable here; and it is alleged that the common law power of impeachment extends to every crime or misdemeanor that can be committed by any subject, in or out of office. But Mr. Dallas insisted that this doctrine is contrary to the principles of our Federal compact; that it is contrary to the general policy of the law of impeachments; and that it is contrary to a fair construction of the very terms of the Constitution.

1. That the doctrine is contrary to the principles of our Federal compact, he deduced from the design with which the Government of the United States was established: For, although it is in some of its features federal, in others it is consolidated; in some of its operations it affects the people as individuals, in others it applies to them in the aggregate as States; yet, in every view, all the powers and attributes of the National Government are matter of express and positive grant and transfer; whatever is not expressly granted or transferred, must be deemed to remain with the people, or with the respective States; and as the motive for establishing the Federal Constitution arose from the want of a competent national authority in cases in which it was essential for the people inhabiting the different States to act as a nation, so far the people gave power to the Federal Government."

"Mr. Dallas repeated, that from a just consideration of the principles of our Government, it was thus manifest that the moment there was a departure from the immediate choice of the people, the law of impeachment became necessary to secure them from the favoritism or perverseness of the Executive Magistrate. Impeachment, he observed, is, with respect to executive and judicial officers, what expulsion is with respect to the members of the Legislature. As expulsion enables the people to decide whether they will restore the evicted member to their service, a conviction on impeachment enables the representatives of the people to decide whether the delinquent shall be partially or totally excluded from the honors and emoluments of public office. But the very circumstance of declaring that a pardon shall not avail in cases of impeachment, though a reelection shall avail in cases of expulsion, demonstrates (as was before intimated) that the people did not mean to guard against the exercise of their own sovereignty, but against an abuse of the power delegated to their agents. Nor is there any legal force in the objection that a Senator or Representative, convicted upon impeachment, should be rendered ineligible; for the people are the best judges to whom they ought to confide their interests."

Now, the point I want to impress on the House is that the action of the House of Representatives in regard to the case of MATTESON, as proposed in the resolution referred to the committee, would be undertaking on their part to limit and restrict the sovereign people in the choice of their Representatives, and to show that nothing short of an impeachment in this country of such officers as are contemplated by the Constitution of the United States can work a perpetual disqualification of a member of the House of Representatives or of the Senate. It has been decided already, by the Senate of the United States, that an impeachment cannot lie against a Senator or Representative; that the term "civil officers" in the Constitution was intended only to apply to the President, the Vice President, the judicial officers of the Government, and the appointees by the President under the Constitution of the United States.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the powers of the House and of the Senate over the members of either House only extends to the right of expulsion for disorderly conduct, and that cannot be understood as working a permanent disqualification of a member. I ask any gentleman here, whether the framers of the Constitution intended that the expulsion of a member of either branch of the national Legislature involved a crime so odious as to work a personal and perpetual disqualification?

Then, sir, in this case which we are considering, no expulsion ever took place. It is true, that the House of Representatives gave a vote of censure against the member, but, prior to any action being had on the resolution to expel, he resigned his seat as a member of this House. The resolution was then laid upon the table. Now, we are called upon to expel the member on a vote of censure given during the Thirty-Fourth Congress, and to extend the punishment to the fullest extent known to the Constitution. I should like some gentleman who may hold opinions adverse to my own to show me where the House, from some authority, the Constitution or the law, possesses the power to make the action of the last House the reason for affixing a continued disqualification? Show me where the House derives this power?

I argue that the Thirty-Fourth Congress had the whole jurisdiction of this question, either to have censured or to have expelled Mr. MATTESON. If this House has the right to declare the vote of censure of last Congress to be a disqualification, the House of the Thirty-Fourth Congress could have declared and affixed a disqualification to him by which his constituents would have been notified, and been enabled to resume the power to choose a Representative on this floor. It is evident that the Constitution never contemplated any such thing, from the fact that our elections take place every two years, while the House of Representatives possesses ample power to take jurisdiction over a member of the House then in session, to censure or punish him, yet it was never designed that a subsequent Congress could revive the same charges, assume jurisdiction, and pronounce judgment. A similar question arose in 1795. The Legislature of Kentucky preferred charges before the Senate of the United States against a gentleman by the name of Marshall, then a Senator from that State, alleging that he was guilty of perjury. The memorial was forwarded by the Governor of Kentucky, for the purpose of having the matter investigated. Mr. Marshall himself demanded an investigation, doing away with all constitutional impediments. The charge was that he committed perjury in answer to a bill in chancery in a case then in Kentucky. When the case came up in the Senate, a committee was appointed, and it decided against the jurisdiction. (American State Papers, Miscellaneous, 144.) The report of the committee, made in 1796, concludes as follows:

"And they are also of opinion that, as the Constitution does not give jurisdiction to the Senate, the consent of the party cannot give it, and therefore the said memorial ought to be dismissed."

I have read that, Mr. Speaker, because I know that gentlemen in this House believe that they have absolute power. If a man has a bad moral character, if he has committed a crime, if he has subjected himself to liabilities under any of the penal statutes in this country, so that his presence becomes odious, and they do not want to make a companion of him, they think that they have a right, by force of numbers, to expel him and rid the House of a man they conceive to be socially not their equal.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I will ask the gentleman whether a legislative body has not the right to protect itself against contact with one whose character, by universal consent, not by the opinion of one or two men, but by universal consent, is infamous? For instance, would we not have the right to protect ourselves from contact with a man who had been committed to the penitentiary for a high crime and misdemeanor?

Mr. SEWARD. The Constitution confers upon us certain powers, and those powers are limited. It is a question for the people to determine, and whenever this House undertakes to control and limit the sovereignty of the people of any congressional district of the United States, we may commit as great evils as were committed in the British Parliament in 1642, which, in two months, expelled forty-two members upon the theory of the gentleman from North Carolina. I put it to the gentleman from North Carolina as a State-rights man, and I wish him to answer it, whether this House has any powers beyond that delegated by the people of the States when they framed the Constitution? And if they did not delegate this power to determine the moral qualifications of its members, I ask whether it does not apply to the people?

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I think that every legislative body has the right to protect itself against contact with scoundrelism; and whenever a man's character is so infamous that all mankind, by universal consent, affix that stain upon him, has not this or any legislative body the right to protect itself from contact with him?

Mr. SEWARD. That is so, if we can fix the standard; but there is such a great diversity of opinion as to what is necessary to make a gentleman. What is the gentleman's standard?

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I will fix a standard.

Mr. SEWARD. Give me a legal standard.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. My standard is this: that when a man by universal consent has a character because of crimes committed which is infamous, a character for infamy about which there is no diversity of opinion among honorable and high-minded men, then we have the right, I say, to protect ourselves from contact with such a man.

Mr. SEWARD. I am neither the prosecutor nor the defender of Mr. MATTESON. The law defines infamous crimes. I stand here to give the law as I understand it, and to speak the truth. I ask the gentleman from North Carolina to put his finger upon the proof to show that Mr. MATTESON was interested pecuniarily one cent in this transaction.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I have not examined the facts of the report, but if the gentleman wants my opinion of Mr. MATTESON, I will give it. I will tell him that Mr. MATTESON, by universal consent, is regarded in this House and out of it, as an unfit associate for any man. It is his character throughout the country, and so decided by the last House.

Mr. SEWARD. I will say to the gentleman that, be that as it may, he is not bound outside of this Hall, or outside of the Constitution, to associate with Mr. MATTESON more than any other man. This House never did determine in regard to the motion to expel MATTESON upon the original question as presented.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. It was so reported, any way.

Mr. SEWARD. No, sir; there was neither a report that way, nor a resolution that way. I know it is generally asserted here that MATTESON did commit bribery—he did enough, God knows—but the record does not show that he committed bribery, or that he was bribed. One of the charges against the gentleman was, that he libeled this House. Well, sir, if he did I am not disposed to say, even in that case, that you could expel a member; for I hold that a libel upon the House of Representatives is an indictable offense, just as much as a libel against an individual. He is liable to the criminal law, precisely as was the individual in the case of Marshall, in 1795, to the criminal courts, and not to this tribunal.

I have authority upon that subject, and while I refer to that, I beg to call the attention of the gentleman who made the minority report to the fact that he is inaccurate in regard to the Wilkes case decided by the British House of Commons. The gentleman who made the minority report says:

"In 1764, Wilkes was expelled from Parliament for being 'the author of a libel,' and many cases are cited to support the decision. Again, in 1768, he was expelled for the same libel. So far, this is a case in point. He was expelled because of the commission of a crime; and was, therefore, as the writer says, 'disabled and incapable to sit as a member.' In 1769, Wilkes having defeated an opposing member, the House resolved that he was incapable of sitting in that Parliament, simply on the ground of his having been expelled from the House. It was this last resolution of 1769, that, in 1783, was expunged from the Journals, as being subversive of the rights of electors, and not the action of Parliament in 1764 and 1768. The case, therefore, supports the text of Mr. Blackstone, showing that a crime of libel was ground of expulsion, but that a former expulsion is not a ground of expulsion."

Well, now, that is the case here. It is true that MATTESON was not expelled from the Thirty-Fourth Congress, but acting upon the presumption that he was expelled, according to the gentleman's own authority, the former expulsion is not ground for his being expelled from this House.

Again, the gentleman has fallen into the mistake of saying there was but one libel in the case of Wilkes, whereas there were two. I have searched all the authorities I could find upon that case, and I say, that the British House of Commons came to the conclusion that the expulsion of Wilkes was a violation of the rights of the electors of the kingdom. But it is said that if MATTESON had been elected since the action of the last House, and since the publication of the letter which was one of the grounds of complaint, then the House would have lost its jurisdiction. Now, I ask the gentleman from Iowa to tell me, if a former expulsion is not a ground for a subsequent expulsion, what the decision of a people has to do, at all, with the question of the jurisdiction of the House? Now, the House of Representatives, and the people of his district cannot have jurisdiction over the crime at the same time, and the power to disqualify him rests here, or it rests with the people of his own district. Now, it is very well known to the Presiding Officer of this House, that during the investigation of this case in the last Congress, the testimony of Mr. Johnson disclosed the fact that the letter constituting the chief charge, was made public prior to the election of Mr. MATTESON to this Congress, so that so far as this letter was concerned, which letter was said to show that MATTESON had attempted to use money to corrupt the legislation of the House of Representatives, that letter was made public, discussed, and understood, not only in his district, but in Mr. MATTESON's district during his election. So, then, the people of his district did pass judgment upon that letter, and upon the qualification of that member by reason of any transaction connected with the letter, or the consideration which induced him to write it.

Suppose the House of Representatives assumes jurisdiction, and expels MATTESON, if you please, according to the gentlemen's theory upon the other side of the House, they take the position that the House, having the right to decide upon the moral qualifications of a member, can expel him if returned to the next House of Representatives, a course which necessarily works a permanent disqualification.

As was very properly remarked the other day by the gentleman from Louisiana, the various States of this Union in regard to this matter have acted upon the principle and upon the theory that unless there was some law or some provision of the Constitution disqualifying an individual from holding office, he cannot be disqualified. Hence, all the State constitutions, so far as I have examined them, have distinctly specified the crimes and offenses working a disqualification or disability for holding a civil office, or of becoming a member of a Legislature. And I venture the assertion that no gentleman can show me a solitary case in this country where an individual has been expelled from a legislative body, outside of the constitutional and legal provisions of that State.

This same question came up in 1807, in the Senate of the United States, and the Senate assumed jurisdiction in the case of John Smith, who was indicted for treason in Virginia, as an accomplice of Aaron Burr. Mr. Adams made a report to the Senate, setting forth the crime for which the party was arraigned; and when the vote was taken, there was not a sufficient number of the members of the Senate voted in favor of the jurisdiction over the cause; and the Senate refused a conviction upon the charge. They acted upon the principle that the criminal courts had jurisdiction when either the Constitution or the laws of the United States were violated, because the facts established were clear, and the refusal to convict must turn upon the want of jurisdiction and power. (American State Papers, 703, Miscellaneous.)

I might give many illustrations of the danger of establishing such a precedent. Suppose that we of the South, holding our peculiar political opinions on the question of slavery, had a two-third majority here and should undertake to expel a member because his opinions on that question might subject him to indictment in the courts of fifteen States of this Union. Would any gentleman hold that we had any right to do so? And reverse the picture; suppose that gentlemen on the other side of the House, who look upon our opinions in the South, in regard to slavery, as a crime, should have a two-third majority here, and could exercise the power of expelling us, how would the gentleman from North Carolina like that? So that the only safe course to be adopted by this House, is to adhere to the Constitution of the United States, or the laws, in relation to the qualifications or disqualifications of members.

Now, as I said before, I am not the defender of Mr. MATTESON. I voted for the resolutions censuring Mr. MATTESON in the last Congress. But, nevertheless, I am prepared here not only to do him justice, but to vindicate what I believe to be a correct principle. In point of importance Mr. MATTESON is scarcely entitled to even a secondary consideration on this question of power. We are not merely deciding what is to be done with him, but we are establishing a great principle which is to affect those who are to come after us. If we were to assume jurisdiction in reference to political offenses or to corruption in the past, we would disqualify a great many men. Besides, I think it is not a very Christian view of the subject, because a man will sometimes repent. I do not care how bad a man may be, for it does not follow that a man who was once bad is always bad. I do not care how infamous a man may have been, whenever the people come to the conclusion that he has reformed his habits and become a good citizen and wish to confide to him representative or judicial power, (when he has not been impeached,) they have a right to do it.

Having said thus much, and not being willing to detain the House, I shall move the previous question, unless some other gentleman wants to make some remarks in regard to that subject.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I trust that the gentleman will withdraw his call for the previous question.

Mr. SEWARD. I will, if the gentleman wants to be heard.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I do not want to speak upon it at present; but I suggest to the gentleman that this is a question of too much importance to be disposed of in this summary method. I move to postpone the further consideration of this subject till next Saturday.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to submit a question of order touching this report; and it is this. A resolution was introduced into this House proposing to expel the member from New York. That resolution was referred to a select committee. The committee has reported back, and recommended the adoption of a resolution that it is inexpedient to take further action in regard to ORSAMUS B. MATTESON, without reporting back that which was referred to them. I take it, sir, that the committee should have reported back the resolution referred to them, and have recommended what should be done with it, and what should be the action of the House.

Mr. SEWARD. I will relieve the gentleman. The omission of reporting back the resolution was a piece of negligence on our part. Here it is.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the question of order taken by the gentleman from Tennessee is properly taken; and that the original resolution referred to the committee should have been reported back as part of their report; and any recommendation which the committee chose to submit should be offered as a substitute to the original resolution. The Chair desires to call the attention of the gentleman from Georgia to the Manual, page 86:

"Even if they (the committee) are opposed to the whole paper, and it cannot be made good by amendments, they cannot reject it, but must report it back to the House without amendments, and there make their opposition."

Mr. SEWARD. That is what we propose to do. We have recited the whole transaction in the report that we have made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia can be permitted to report the original resolution now, and move the recommendation of the committee as a substitute for the resolution referred.

Mr. SEWARD. That was my design. I intended to incorporate the whole proceedings in my report. If the gentleman from Tennessee will refer to the latter part of the report, he will see there express reference to the proceedings of the House. If the House order Mr. MATTESON for trial, we ask that the House shall determine the proceedings that shall be had.

The SPEAKER. The pending proposition will be the original resolution, and the amendment thereto proposed by the committee.

Mr. RITCHIE. I move to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. How did I understand the Chair to decide?

The SPEAKER. That the committee had no right to retain the original resolution; that it should be reported back to the House; that that was the main question before the House for consideration; and that the views of the committee could be presented in the shape of an amendment to the original proposition.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The House can vote on the original resolution; and if it be rejected, it will be carrying out the views of the committee.

Mr. SEWARD. I call the attention of the gentleman to the latter part of the report in which the resolution is referred to, and the House asked to decide upon it.

Mr. GROW. The understanding of the committee was that the resolution was to be reported back, but the form of the report may not be correct.

Mr. WARREN. The question of order having been decided by the Chair as well taken, it strikes me that the better way is to recommit the whole subject; and I make that motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RITCHIE] moves to lay the whole subject on the table; and that motion precludes the motion to recommit.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Read the original resolution.

The original resolution was read, as follows:

"Whereas, at the last session of Congress, a select committee of this House reported the following resolutions, to wit:

"Resolved, That ORSAMUS B. MATTESON, a member of this House from the State of New York, did incite parties deeply interested in the passage of a joint resolution for constructing the Des Moines grant, to have here and to use a large sum of money and other valuable considerations corruptly, for the purpose of procuring the passage of said joint resolution through this House.

"Resolved, That ORSAMUS B. MATTESON, in declaring that a large number of the members of this House had associated themselves together and pledged themselves, each to the other, not to vote for any law or resolution granting money or lands, unless they were paid for it, has falsely and willfully assailed and defamed the character of the House, and has proved himself unworthy to be a member thereof.

"Resolved, That ORSAMUS B. MATTESON, a member of this House from the State of New York, be, and is hereby, expelled therefrom.

"And the said committee also reported the facts on which said suggestions were predicated, which are published with the reports of the House.

"And whereas, the first of said resolutions was adopted by the House of Representatives on the 27th of February last, by a vote of 145 yeas to 17 nays; and the said second resolution was adopted by the House on the same day without a division; and whereas, said MATTESON had, prior to any vote being taken on the last resolution, resigned his seat in this House, and thus avoided the effect of the same, had it been passed; and whereas, the said MATTESON is a member of this House, with the imputation conveyed by the passage of the first two of the foregoing resolutions still upon him, and without having been subsequently reelected by his constituents: Therefore,

"Resolved, That ORSAMUS B. MATTESON, a member of the House of Representatives from the State of New York, be, and he is hereby, expelled from this House."

Mr. KUNKEL, of Maryland. I desire to propound a question to the Chair: inasmuch as the gentleman from Georgia failed to present this resolution with the report, is it competent now, if objection be made, for the House to receive the report?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that the gentleman from Georgia has the right to report the resolution at any time, inasmuch as it involves a question of privilege.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Maryland. My object was to arrest this proceeding where it is; and therefore I desired to know whether the report was in order, and whether it was in order for them to report until the committee was called in its regular order.

The SPEAKER. The question before the House is on the adoption of the following resolution reported by the select committee:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient for this House to take any further action in regard to the resolution proposing to expel O. B. MATTESON.

Mr. SEWARD. I move to amend the resolution by striking out the word "further."

Mr. FLORENCE. I trust the gentleman from Georgia will not press a final disposition of this question to-day. It was understood that there should be no business transacted in the House pending this Kansas discussion.

Mr. RITCHIE. I insist on my motion to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. FLORENCE. Is it in order to move to postpone the subject?

The SPEAKER. It is not, pending the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. If the motion prevails, will that carry with it the original resolution referred to the committee?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I ask for the yeas and nays upon the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 96, nays 69; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Andrews, Arnold, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Bowie, Brayton, Bunfinton, Burlingame, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Corning, Covode, Cragin, Danrell, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foley, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gilmer, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Hickman, Horton, Howard, Jewett, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, Montgomery, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Nichols, Otis, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Purviance, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Seward, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Samuel A. Smith, Spinner, Stanton, Stephens, William Stewart, Tappan, Miles Taylor, Thayer, Tompkins, Tripp, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Israel Washburn, Whiteley, Wilson, and Wood—96.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anderson, Atkins, Burnett, Burns, Burroughs, Clemons, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockrell, Cox, Burton Craig, Curry, Davidson, Dowdell, Elliott, Eustis, Florence, Garnett, Garrett, Gillis, Goode, Greenwood, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Hoard, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Jackson, Jenkins, George W. Jones, J. Clancy Jones, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lawrence, Leidy, Letcher, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Miles, Millson, Moore, Niblack, Peyton, Phelps, Powell, Quitman, Beady, Reagan, Reilly, Ruffin, Sandidge, Savage, Scales, Scott, Henry M. Shaw, Sicksles, William Smith, Stallworth, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, Ward, Warren, Watkins, Wortendyke, and Augustus R. Wright—69.

So the whole subject was laid on the table.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. LETCHER stated that Mr. CLARK, of Missouri, had been called away to meet his family, and could not be present.

Mr. GOODE stated that his colleague, Mr. CASKIE, had been called home under very unpleasant circumstances, and that he had paired off on the Kansas question, with Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois.

Mr. WORTENDYKE stated that his colleague, Mr. HUYLER, was detained at his room on account of sickness.

Mr. LAMAR stated that he had paired off with Mr. THOMPSON.

Mr. FLORENCE stated that his colleague, Mr. LANDY, was detained at home in consequence of indisposition in his family.

Mr. FLORENCE also stated that his colleague, Mr. PHILLIPS, had paired off with Mr. EDIE.

Mr. SPINNER stated that his colleague, Mr. SEARING, had paired off with Mr. MORGAN.

Mr. REILLY stated that his colleague, Mr. AHL, was necessarily detained from the House.

The result of the vote was then announced, as above recorded.

Mr. RITCHIE moved to reconsider the vote by which the subject was laid on the table, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LAND OFFICES IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask the consent of the House to call up the bill from the Senate to create additional land districts in the State of California, and for other purposes. The request was made this morning by the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, and was then objected to by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GIDDINGS.] I have since had a conference with that gentleman, and he has kindly consented to withdraw his objection. This, sir, is a matter of much importance to my State, and, as it is a matter in which I may be supposed to have some personal interest, I ask that the House will hear a statement from the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. COBB.]

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I object to this bill being taken up, for the reason that there are still many gentlemen who desire to speak on the Kansas question, and it is injustice to them to have the time of the House taken up with other matters.

Mr. SCOTT. I desire to make a speech about Kansas myself, and if the gentleman from Georgia wishes to make a speech, I will give way.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I do not wish to make a speech myself, but there are others who do.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from California propose to put the bill on its passage, or have it referred?

Mr. COBB. It is proposed to put it on its passage. If the House will listen to me for three minutes, they will have no objection.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I will withdraw my objection.

The bill was taken from the Speaker's table, received its several readings, and was passed.

Mr. SCOTT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

J. C. G. KENNEDY.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. Yesterday when I reported from the Committee of Claims a bill for the relief of J. C. G. Kennedy, at the request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] certain papers in his possession were ordered to be printed. It becomes necessary now, in order to present the whole case, that other papers in possession of the committee should be printed. I ask that they be ordered to be printed with the report.

There was no objection; and the order to print was accordingly made.

RESOLUTIONS OF A LEGISLATURE.

Mr. CURTIS, by unanimous consent, presented joint resolutions from the Legislature of Iowa; which were referred as indicated below:

A joint resolution asking that land entries made with warrants and cash may be confirmed. Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

A joint resolution asking for increased mail service in Iowa. Referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. SHAW, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I rise to what I regard as a privileged question. I see by the published proceedings of yesterday, that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] used this language in reference to the Illinois delegation:

"I allude to the successor of the gallant Richardson. I take it to be true. He told me that they had a conference; that in that conference they came to the conclusion that the only chance for the reelection of Mr. DOUGLAS to the United States Senate was in the course he has pursued."

I wish to say that no such consultation was ever held to my knowledge; that I never participated in any such consultation.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. I say the same for myself.

Mr. GREENWOOD. This is not a privileged question, and I object to any further statement.

Mr. ENGLISH. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection, so that the gentleman who has been referred to may make an explanation. [Cries of "Withdraw it!"]

Mr. GREENWOOD. I withdraw the objection, since it appears to be the desire of the House that I should do so, but with the understanding that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] shall also be heard. [Cries of "Agreed!"]

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I have been informed that, in my absence from the House on yesterday, the honorable member from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] stated on the floor of the House that the Illinois delegation, or the Democratic portion thereof, had held a caucus or consultation, (at some time and place not mentioned,) in which they had determined that the only chance for securing the reelection of Judge DOUGLAS to the United States Senate, was to oppose the admission of Kansas into the Union under the Lecompton constitution.

I now distinctly state that no such consultation was ever held to my knowledge; and I am confident that none such was ever held, or contemplated being held, by any portion of said delegation. And I have never had any intimation, directly or indirectly from Judge DOUGLAS, or any of his friends, that he has been influenced in any degree in his action by any such motive, nor do I believe such to be the fact.

I have frequently stated, (and probably have done so to the gentleman from Virginia)—I so stated in a speech delivered in this House—that nearly the entire Democracy of Illinois had taken their stand against forcing the Lecompton constitution, or any other constitution, upon the people of Kansas against their will, long before Congress convened; that they looked upon it as a great wrong, and an abandonment of the principles of the Democratic party, and a violation of the principle of self-government; and that neither Judge DOUGLAS, or any body else, who would support the Lecompton constitution, could, would, or ought to be sustained by the people of Illinois; and that our southern friends, who were so bitter and denunciatory in their course, and for whom we have battled so long and against such fearful obstacles, ought to have some regard for our position and our convictions of duty. These views I entertain yet. If I have ever been understood to say more than this in substance, I have been wholly misapprehended.

In expressing these sentiments I have spoken for myself, and no one else. The statement that any such conversation as that mentioned by the gentleman from Virginia was ever held, I repeat, as far as my recollection is concerned, is wholly unfounded.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, it will be recollected by gentlemen that on yesterday I made reference to a member of the Illinois delegation substantially, in the language which has been quoted by the gentleman near me, [Mr. SHAW.] That member, I stated in another part of my remarks, was the successor of the gallant Colonel Richardson. I referred to the gentleman who has just spoken, [Mr. MORRIS.] I stated, on that occasion, and my purpose is to repeat with, if possible, more distinctness than then, that after this Congress had commenced its session—I do not recollect the exact time—in a free conversation on public questions with the honorable gentleman from Illinois, he stated to me distinctly, explicitly, and precisely, according to my present recollection and my past recollection, that the Illinois delegation held a conference as to the policy that a distinguished Senator—Judge DOUGLAS—should pursue on this Lecompton question, with a view to securing his reelection to the Senate of the United States; and that the one he has pursued was deemed the only course by which he could hope to effect it. I have said this in private conversation on various occasions. It was the result of a very distinct recollection. I stated this yesterday, and I repeat it to-day, as my recollection—a recollection clear, distinct, and emphatic. When this was told to me by an honorable member from the Prairie State, I believed it, because I am in the habit of believing what gentlemen tell me, unless I have strong reasons for not believing them. If I am correctly informed, the gentleman told these things to others.

I have, in this statement, confined myself to what passed yesterday. There are other matters which might have been mentioned, if I had seen fit to do so, but which were not necessary in connection with the position I then took. I will, however, state now, though not necessarily connected with this matter, that the gentleman informed me that the delegation to the Cincinnati convention—I think it was to the Cincinnati convention—had recommended various appointments to the President of the United States for the State of Illinois; that those recommendations had been disregarded; and that that was one grief upon the part of the delegation.

I might go further, and make other statements of a similar character, but it is not necessary. [Cries of "Go on!" "Go on!"] I regret very much indeed, that there should be this collision of recollection; but, as I trust I am always careful in regard to the statements I make, I hope the House will allow me to ask the honorable member from Kentucky [Mr. BURNETT] if he had not a similar conversation with the gentleman from Illinois?

[Cries of "Hear him!"]

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. I would ask the gentleman from Illinois if that was not a private conversation?

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I suppose I am the gentleman referred to. All I have to say is this: that the conversation which occurred between the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRIS] and myself, was in the presence of another gentleman; and I do not feel at liberty, placed in the position that I am, to retail or to give the conversation which occurred between the gentleman from Illinois and myself, unless he calls for it. That, I think, is the correct position, and the one which I must take under the circumstances.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. The conversation to which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] refers, he says, took place somewhere. I would inquire of him, where?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. If I report the gentleman truly, it does not matter where the conversation occurred; if falsely, I should be exposed. The place is a matter of no consequence. I will answer the question after we get at the main facts.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. If I ever had a conversation with the gentleman from Virginia, (and I

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, MARCH 30, 1858.

NEW SERIES....No. 88.

recollect having one,) it was some time in December last, in my private room at the United States Hotel, in the presence of my family. I invited the gentleman to my room, for the purpose, as I think the gentleman will bear me witness, mainly of introducing him to an old soldier friend who formerly lived in Virginia, and who had come on here for the purpose of obtaining a pension, and I was desirous of enlisting the members of the House in his favor. The conversation to which the gentleman alludes came up incidentally. I entered into it with him with a view of ascertaining if this Kansas question could not be settled without any serious division in the Democratic party. In that conversation much was said. I remember remarking to the gentleman from Virginia that he ought to recollect that in Illinois we were differently situated from himself, that we had a different constituency; that the Democracy of Illinois had, before the meeting of Congress, with scarcely an exception, taken their position in opposition to the Lecompton constitution, and that neither DOUGLAS nor any other man could be returned from that State to the United States Senate, if he favored an instrument of that character. I recollect stating to him that southern gentlemen ought to have some charity and feeling for our position. I recollect stating further, that I had had no conversation with Judge DOUGLAS, (and he will say so himself,) in reference to his views upon this question, after the Lecompton convention had refused to submit the constitution to the people, until after my arrival in Washington, and that I did not know what his private views were. I had, however, taken my position at home, and had expressed my views freely and unreservedly, and they were in opposition to the Lecompton constitution.

I recollect, further, (and I apprehend that out of this has grown this whole trouble,) having a conversation with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BURNETT] upon this subject. However he may have understood me, I have a distinct recollection in regard to it, and of stating that, after our arrival here, and after ascertaining that Judge DOUGLAS would take a position antagonistic to the Lecompton constitution, the question occurred as to the time when he should make his speech. The conference upon that subject, however, took place between Judge DOUGLAS, Colonel Richardson, and myself, without any knowledge of it on the part of the other members of the Illinois delegation. It was a mere casual meeting at Brown's Hotel, where Colonel Richardson was stopping. I remarked to Judge DOUGLAS, in that conference, that if he had made up his mind to oppose the Lecompton constitution, in my judgment he should avail himself of the earliest opportunity to deliver his views in regard to it; for if he should wait until after the election on the 21st of December, when the vote was to be taken upon the adoption of the constitution, his motives would be impugned, and his enemies thereby gain an advantage of him. This, as he freely expressed himself, corresponded with his own opinion. So far as I have now any knowledge, this is the only conference which ever took place between the Senator from Illinois, Colonel Richardson, and myself upon the subject; and in that, allow me to repeat, none of the other members of the delegation from Illinois participated; nor did they know anything about it. Why I should go to the gentleman from Virginia, and state to him that our course was dictated solely by a view to the return of Judge DOUGLAS to the Senate of the United States, I cannot imagine.

I am at a loss to know why the gentleman should imagine that I, the Senator's warm personal and political friend, should assail and impute false motives to him and the delegation from my State; particularly since no such conference ever did take place. My colleagues have stated here to-day that they know nothing about it, and never heard of it; and therefore I repeat, I am at a loss to know why I should pursue such a course, and it will be difficult to make an impartial man believe I did. The story is not a probable one. If the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SMITH], or any other person so understood me, it must have been an entire misapprehension on his part.

The gentleman from Virginia has said to-day that much more occurred in that conversation. He has represented me as saying that the delegates to the Cincinnati convention had recommended certain appointments to Mr. Buchanan, which he had disregarded. Now it is a very easy matter, Mr. Speaker, to misapprehend such a conversation. I may have said, in the course of that conversation, that the congressional delegates had made such recommendations; but how could the delegates to the Cincinnati convention have made such recommendations, when that convention was held long before the election, and when the delegates have not met since? I may have said to the gentleman, and doubtless did say to him, (though I have no recollection of it,) that the Illinois delegation in Congress had made certain recommendations to the President, and that the persons recommended had not been appointed. Here then, he substitutes for the recommendations of the delegation to Congress, the recommendations of the delegates to the Cincinnati convention.

I do not seek, Mr. Speaker, to carry this matter any further. I do not want to detail all that was said on that occasion. I do not desire to retail here private conversation, as the gentleman has. I recollect that the gentleman made some remarks which it is not necessary to repeat now. I can only say, in conclusion, that I could not have stated—as the gentleman supposes I did—that a conference of this kind had taken place. All of my colleagues have spoken on that point, except Major HARRIS, who is not now in his seat; and if he were here he would state the same thing.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I should like to make a very few remarks on this subject, unless the gentleman from Illinois should allow the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BURNETT] to speak.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I have no objection to hear what his recollection of the matter is.

Mr. BURNETT. The position in which I am placed in this matter is somewhat embarrassing. If the gentleman from Illinois prefers that I should not speak, I will not.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I object to this thing going on. I do not see what it has to do with the deliberations of the House. Here is a question of veracity between the gentleman from Virginia and the gentleman from Illinois, and we are not to sit here and take evidence.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will see at once that it would be a great injustice to smother or suppress any fact which the gentleman from Kentucky may know. I hope gentlemen will withdraw their objections; and if there are any facts to be brought out, let them come out as they may.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. I understood that general consent was given that this matter might be brought out, and that any person interested might be permitted to speak thereon; and I make the point that it is now too late to object to any explanation being made. For myself, I want to hear it all, and I want to make some remarks myself in regard to the matter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand that every gentleman in the House might have permission to participate in this personal explanation.

Mr. BURNETT. I ask the unanimous consent of the House—

Mr. STANTON. I desire to say that when a gentleman is called upon to withdraw his objection to the repetition of a private conversation, it is very difficult to refuse to do so; and I object to the gentleman going on.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STANTON] if it is just for him now to suppress the statement to which the gentleman from Illinois referred? He has been allowed to make a statement in regard to a conversation between him and the gentleman from Kentucky, and it is unjust to suppress the facts.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I appeal to my colleague to withdraw his objection, as a matter of justice.

Mr. ADRIN. The gentleman from Illinois is perfectly willing that the conversation should be repeated.

The SPEAKER. Debate is out of order.

Mr. BURNETT. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to permit me to make a few remarks. My reason for making that request is, that I am now placed in a position where I ought to speak.

Mr. STANTON. I withdraw any objection, if the like privilege is to be extended to other persons.

Several MEMBERS. Certainly, certainly.

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand that the House gives its consent to any personal explanation connected with the matter that any gentleman may desire to make?

Mr. LEITER. I object to any such thing. I have no objection to the gentleman from Kentucky going on, but I object to any other.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I wish to understand from the gentleman from Kentucky whether he considers his honor involved in this matter? If he does, I will not object. If he does not, I will object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio furthest from the Chair [Mr. LEITER] objects.

Mr. LEITER. I wish it understood that I do not object to the gentleman from Kentucky proceeding, but that I will object hereafter to any person else engaging in this personal explanation.

Mr. TOMPKINS. I object to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. LEITER. I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. The objection is renewed on the left of the Chair.

Mr. WARREN. I understand the objection is withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. It is not withdrawn.

Mr. TOMPKINS. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] referred to me as having had a conversation with the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MORRIS.] The gentleman from Illinois also referred to the same conversation, and stated his understanding of a portion of that conversation. I will say this in advance, in order that my own position may not be misunderstood. The gentleman from Virginia, some time ago, in a conversation between us, when we were discussing the action of the Democratic party upon the Kansas question, or of those of the Democratic party who differed with us, and the reasons for their course, said to me substantially what he has stated here. I remarked to him then that I had had a conversation with Mr. MORRIS, in which he had repeated substantially the same language to me. Subsequently, the gentleman from Virginia came to me and told me that he intended to make the statement publicly, and asked my consent to use my name in connection with it, which I declined to give. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRIS] approached me this morning, and said that he understood that I had stated that I had had substantially the same conversation with him which the gentleman from Virginia repeated yesterday. I then said to him what I stated to the House this morning, that I would not make any statement in regard to the conversation between us, unless he authorized or called for it.

That was what occurred between us this morning. Now, sir, as to the facts. The time, I cannot fix. Some time early in the session, I in company with another gentleman, who is a member of this House, met the gentleman from Illinois on the street. I introduced him to the gentleman, and some conversation passed between us of a light and trivial character, I do not now recollect what. He then asked me to call at his room, saying that he desired to talk with me. I was then on my way, I think, to the War Department. I did call at his room on my return, and a long conversation took place between us. I cannot pretend to give the whole of that conversation, nor will I undertake to give the language used, because every gentleman, whether he be a lawyer or not, knows how impossible it is to give the details of such conversations, or the precise language used by any individual. I do not desire to do the gentleman from Illinois any injustice. The conversation was commenced by him. I did not know what his purpose was. He commenced by speaking of the position which had been taken by the distinguished Senator from Illinois, and by his colleagues in this House, upon the Kansas question. I understood him distinctly to say, that upon a conference of the friends of Judge DOUGLAS—the friends from Illinois—it had been agreed that he should take the course which he has pursued in reference to the Kansas question, as the only means by which he could sustain himself at home; that unless he did take that course, he would not but inevitably suffer defeat at home himself, but his friends would fall with him.

During this conversation, which, as I have said, was one of some length, and which was held with me as a friend of Judge DOUGLAS, something was said about some arrangement by which the Democratic party could act together, and stand a unit upon this question. We talked a good deal upon that subject. During the conversation there was a statement made, that one reason why Judge DOUGLAS felt himself aggrieved, and why he had pursued this course, was, that there had been an attempt upon the part of the present Administration to destroy him, to crush him, to break him down; that his friends had been neglected in appointments, and the claims of Illinois overlooked; and that Judge DOUGLAS did not intend to be crushed by the Administration.

This, sir, is the substance of the conversation which occurred. I do not pretend to give the language; but I have given substantially the facts which were involved in that conversation.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. I wish to remark that I have nothing to do with the question of recollection, or the question of veracity, whichever it may be, between my colleague and the gentleman from Virginia, or the gentleman from Kentucky. I was never more surprised in my life than when the gentleman from Virginia yesterday made the charge, I know not upon what authority. It was the first time I had ever heard such an intimation, in any manner, shape, or form. I felt it to be my duty then to get up and state that the charge that any such conference had been held by the Illinois delegation was untrue. I repeat here to-day, upon authority, that no such conference, in any manner, shape, or form, was ever held by the Illinois delegation, or any part thereof. I was astonished at the charge made yesterday by the gentleman from Virginia. I consulted the members of the delegation last evening, and I now state distinctly and emphatically that the charge that any such consultation or conference was ever held by the Illinois delegation is untrue. That, I suppose, is distinctly understood.

While I am up I desire to allude to another subject, and I shall speak of it more at length in future, if I can get the floor. I had not intended to submit any remarks upon this Kansas question until I heard the gentleman from Virginia yesterday. It seems to be the policy of gentlemen upon this question to make it a personal one. I understood the gentleman from Virginia, and I desire to know whether I understood him correctly or not, to say that the plan adopted for submitting the Lecompton constitution had been directly or indirectly sanctioned by Judge DOUGLAS; that Mr. Calhoun, the president of the convention which framed the constitution, had written to Judge DOUGLAS upon the subject.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Illinois, that if he goes into another personal explanation upon another subject it is difficult to tell where it would lead to.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. I merely desired to call the attention of the House to the subject, and to say that such a charge, if the gentleman intended to make it, is wholly unauthorized, and not in accordance with the facts.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. A word or two in reply to what the gentleman has said, and also personal to myself. I will be very brief, however, because with many of the questions I now have nothing to do.

Whether, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, there was a conference or not, is a question of fact with which I have nothing to do. The only question of fact with which I have to do is that in reference to the conversation that I had with the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MORRIS.] Upon that fact I have now nothing further to say. There are, however, one or two other matters incidental to it to which I desire very briefly to refer. It is said by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MORRIS,] that this conversation occurred in his room, in the presence of his family. That is true, sir; but I went with a view to consult with him, as he has stated, and this public subject came up in conversation after that private matter was disposed of. It was not in any degree, directly or indirectly, with an understanding of confidence. On the contrary, the gentleman and myself agree in opinion that when public men converse on public subjects, without an understanding of confidence, they can, each and all, speak at their will and pleasure. Such is the opinion of the gentleman from Illinois, and it is rather singular that he should introduce the question here for the purpose of affecting my personal position. I wish it understood, having no political secrets of my own, that, when I speak of political questions or am spoken to about them, I regard them as a part of the political interests of the country, and shall so consider and treat them, unless there is a different understanding. The honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BURNETT] has stated, what no doubt he correctly understands, that I applied to him for liberty to use his name, and he declined to agree to it. There were two gentlemen present at the conversation, one of whom did decline, and, no doubt, the gentleman from Kentucky meant to be so understood. I venture to say that I did not so understand him, because if I had I would not have referred to him. But it is a matter of no consequence. I make this explanation for the purpose of having the thing rightly understood and without any intention of pressing anybody to the wall. I say this, and I say it briefly, that I hold it to be a duty to the country if I can trace out, by any proper and legitimate means, the secret motives and private purposes of public men, to do so; and not to let them carry out their selfish objects in the name of patriotism and the country.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I call for the regular order of business. We might as well stop this matter now as at any other time. [Cries of "No!" "No!"] Permit me to say a word. I think this controversy might stop here without the character of either gentleman suffering in the public estimation, or in the estimation of this House. If it is allowed to continue, it must of necessity run into personalities. Permit me to say now, sir, that this is not the arena to indulge in personalities, or the results of personalities. I deprecate it at all times, and there seems to be a tendency just now to drive everything to this point.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I object.

Mr. FLORENCE. I move that the House adjourn.

The question was taken; and the motion was disagreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I desire to repeat what I first said, or to be understood as repeating it, and to add, I have not sought to implicate the gentleman from Virginia by any private conversation. I might state what he said to me in the one he refers to, but I do not choose to follow his example. So far as the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky are concerned, they substantially agree with my statement, and I am satisfied will be so regarded. He does not say that I informed him that there had been a meeting or conference of the Illinois delegation with a view to advise Mr. DOUGLAS to oppose the Lecompton constitution to secure his reelection to the Senate, or for any other purpose, as is charged by the gentleman from Virginia; but speaks of my having alluded to a conference of Illinois friends, not delegates, which I have explained in my preceding observations. Hence he does not sustain the allegation made by the member from Virginia, and he is thrown back upon the private conversation had with me in my private room. He announces to the House it is his settled purpose and determination to use all such conversations when he thinks the public interest requires it.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I think it well to say here, Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I do not know that the gentleman draws the distinction between a public and a private conversation. He seems, or pretends to hold, that a casual conversation which occurred, as he has admitted this did, in my own private chamber, is a public conversation. I leave it for the members of the House and the country to determine whether that conversation was a public one, and to judge of it and its pretended disclosures, if it was not, as justice may require. It is a gratuitous and unauthorized remark of his, that I agreed with him as to the propriety of disclosing what passed at such interviews.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I have only one sentence to utter. I did not say, as the gentleman supposes, that I would use private and confidential conversations for public uses; but I said this, that without the injunction of confidence, I regarded no conversation on public questions, between public men, as private conversations; and I will not permit a traitor to the great interests of my country to carry out his purposes in the name of patriotism and duty. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I am glad to find the gentleman is so full of patriotism; and that he is determined to guard each avenue of danger, and defend it to the last.

But I did not rise to discuss that matter. I wish simply to say this, that although we may not, in our social and familiar conversations each to the other, request that they should be regarded as secret and confidential, still, sir, loose and idle remarks sometimes occur, and, without an injunction of that kind, they are not used by any man's friends. What member of this House would desire every conversation he may have had with his fellow members or his friends, in his private room, in a hotel, or at a private boarding house, to be brought in here and retailed to the country in a speech? There is not a man in this House who could not be placed, by such a course as that, in a position which he would not desire to occupy. Supposing he is talking to confidential and intimate friends or to other gentlemen, he may use expressions and make remarks for which he might not desire to be held responsible, and which, if taken isolated and alone, might be made to bear a different construction from that which he intended. Such—

Mr. GROESBECK. I rise to a question of order. Is this discussion in order? I want to put a stop to it.

The SPEAKER. It is a difficult matter for the Chair to determine what is, and what is not, in order, when permission is given to gentlemen to make a personal explanation.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I desire to say, that there is no necessity for any personal feeling in this matter. The statements of both gentlemen can easily be reconciled. It all turns upon the word "conference," whether this delegation had a conference or not.

Mr. SEWARD. I call for the regular order of business.

The motion of Mr. LETCHER was then agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BOGGS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the deficiency bill.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LANE] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. LANE. My reason for seeking the floor to-day is to place myself right before my constituents, this House, and the country, in regard to the affairs of Oregon.

It will be recollected, sir, that about the last of January I had the honor to present to the House the constitution of the State of Oregon. It was presented, referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed. I believe it has always been the custom, or rule, of both Houses of Congress, when a document is ordered to be printed, to print two copies for each member of the House and for each member of the Senate.

About the 3d day of February, if I recollect aright, the constitution of the State of Oregon was printed, and placed in the boxes of members of the House, and one copy laid upon the desk of each member of the Senate, and a copy for each member of the Senate was retained in the document-room. We are not so kindly waited on here, for we have not the pleasure of having documents placed upon our desks; though we can always have them by sending to the document-room.

In a debate, Mr. Chairman, which took place a few days ago upon the floor of the Senate upon the subject of the Oregon constitution, remarks were made by my honorable friend from California, [Mr. GWIN,] and the distinguished Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] that would, if they should go to the country without being corrected, do me great injustice; and therefore I have felt it due to myself, and to the people I represent, to place the matter fairly before the House, that my people may know that I have not been neglectful of the duty which I owe to them upon this floor. I will refer to the report of that debate. Mr. GWIN inquired of the Senator from Illinois if there was any objection at that time to taking up the Oregon constitution, and to providing for the admission of Oregon and Minnesota at the same time. In reply to the inquiry, the distinguished Senator from Illinois said:

"I will say, in response to the Senator from California, that I have not brought up a proposition for the admission of Oregon, for the reason that I have received no official information that she has made a constitution. She has sent no constitution here. We have no facts, no evidence, before us, showing that to be the case. Nor has the President so informed us; nor have we any official information, from any source, on the subject. Having learned, from the newspapers, that a convention had been held there; that it had formed a constitution, and it had been submitted to and ratified by the people, I have wondered why it was that it had not found its way here. I spoke to the Delegate to the other House, General Lane, about it, and I told him that I understood that he had presented it to the House of Representatives. He said he had; but he thought he had better let it sleep until the contest about Kansas and Minnesota was over. I said to him that whenever he desired action here, and would furnish me with a copy of the constitution of Oregon, properly certified, I would take great pleasure in initiating the steps at once for her admission. He thanked me for the suggestion, and said he would attend to it. He has not done so yet, and hence we have nothing here to act upon."

Now, Mr. Chairman, I introduced the constitution here as soon as I received it, and had it referred to the Committee on Territories. The chairman of that committee informed me that he heard no objection to it; that at a proper time a bill for the admission of Oregon would be brought in; and that he could see no good reason why it should not go through at once.

I told Mr. DOUGLAS that I did not desire to embarrass Kansas with Oregon, or to have Oregon mixed up with Kansas. I said that Oregon had come here without an enabling act, without authority of Congress, and without the interference of the people of any State or political organization in her domestic affairs. But on learning that the Kansas matter had been disposed of in the Senate, I saw no good reason why Oregon should not be then taken up and disposed of at the same time with Minnesota. I therefore went to the Senate with the constitution of Oregon in my hand, to see the Senator from Illinois. He was not in his seat; and, after waiting some time I told the Senator from California that I would feel very much obliged if he would take the constitution and bring the matter up. The copy of the constitution which I presented was as thoroughly certified as need be—for it was a printed copy properly authenticated, which I had also presented here. The Senator from Illinois, in reply to the Senator from California, expressed himself surprised that the constitution had not been presented. He says:

"I should do so, but I have never seen the constitution of Oregon. I do not know what is in it; I do not know the boundaries of the proposed new State; I do not know anything concerning it. I have never set eyes on the document; and, if I should offer a proposition, it would be at random. I do not know whether her constitution is such a one as I could sanction or not; but I suppose it is. I should think, however, the Delegate would present it to the Senate, and refer it to the committee. Let the committee read over the constitution, and report the facts. I should take great pleasure in calling a special session of the committee at any moment for immediate action upon it; and I would hurry it through as fast as I could; but I do not feel authorized to take a paper which I have never yet had an opportunity of reading, and move the admission of a State on it, when I do not know what it contained."

Now, Mr. Chairman, if the Senator from Illinois had not read the constitution of Oregon it was his own fault, for it had been printed and laid on his desk. I have not the privilege, as yet, of presenting any measure in the Senate. The time is some three or four months distant when I can have that privilege, and it is not very certain that I shall have it; but I hope I shall. I am satisfied that the people of Oregon will regulate that matter as to them may seem just and right. I shall be content with their action; believing, at the same time, that if I am permitted to occupy a seat in the Senate, it will be for the advantage of the people of Oregon and of the whole Union.

But, Mr. Chairman, if this report were allowed to go out uncorrected, the people of Oregon would at once say that their Delegate did not care a cent whether Oregon was admitted or not. Now, I think that every gentleman who has served with me on this floor will bear witness to my fidelity in the discharge of my duties. I understand my duties toward the people of Oregon, and I think they understand me. I have not been unmindful of this thing. I have not failed to speak to the chairman of the Committee on Territories from time to time; but it was his opinion that the matter had better rest until the Kansas difficulty should be disposed of, when he said he would bring in a bill for the admission of Oregon; and I am certain that all sides of the House will go for such a bill.

I conversed yesterday with the Senator from Illinois on this subject; and he said at once that he saw by the report of his remarks that he had done me great injustice, and that he would avail himself of the first opportunity to place me right. I know he will do so. And now I desire it to be understood that I shall lose no time in urging action on the application of Oregon for admission; and I hope to do so successfully, for I have yet heard no objection to it from any gentleman with whom I have conversed on the subject.

I will say, however, Mr. Chairman, that it has been unfortunately my lot here to have to wait, on many occasions, for action of the two Houses on Oregon matters. You will remember that at the last session of Congress an enabling bill for Oregon passed this House, but failed to pass the Senate, authorizing the people of Oregon to hold a convention and form a State constitution, and providing for the admission of Oregon into the Union under it. The House at the same time passed a similar bill for Minnesota. The latter passed the Senate; and a law was passed, by which a grant of lands, to the amount of six or eight million dollars, was made to that Territory. We were told over and over again that Oregon should have an enabling act; and I waited in the Senate, night after night, watching for such action, but waited in vain.

I only speak of this as a matter of fortune. It is our fortune on some occasions to be neglected. All these things were done for Minnesota, and not for Oregon. I certainly do not complain that they were done for Minnesota, but I think they should also have been done for Oregon, or at least that an enabling act should have been passed.

I see no good reason, now that Kansas is nearly disposed of, why the two new States of Oregon and Minnesota should not be admitted together. But if the Senate chooses to admit Minnesota first, and Oregon afterwards, I suppose I should be content, satisfied as I am at all times that Oregon will be admitted during the present session.

Now, sir, after I have said thus much about Oregon, I must be pardoned by my friends on both sides of the House if I express, very briefly, my views in regard to this perplexing question which has agitated the country for the last three or four years, and which continues to engross almost the entire attention of both House of Congress—the Kansas question.

Since I have been honored with a seat upon this floor, gentlemen upon the other side of the House have proclaimed, almost day by day, that no more slave States shall be admitted into this Union, and that there shall be no further extension of slavery. This declaration has been made by gentlemen from the North. Now, sir, I live in the North, further North, perhaps, than almost any gentleman in this House. I am a northern man, but a national man. My affections embrace the whole soil of this Union. If I should see any attempt upon the part of the southern States to infringe upon the rights of the North, I would be the first to rebuke them and to resist their aggressions. If I should hear my southern friends proclaiming that slavery should be extended by the power of this American Government, I would say, "Hold, my friends, you have no right to extend slavery by such means." The South, however, has proclaimed no such purpose.

But, while I would rebuke the South for thus seeking to extend slavery, I would also rebuke the North when they proclaim that no more slave States shall be admitted into the Union. They have no right, in justice or in equity, to carry out such a policy. They have no right to say that slavery shall not be extended into Oregon, or any other Territory or State. In Oregon we have taken the liberty of regulating that matter for ourselves; and a majority of our people have decided that slavery shall not exist there. For aught I know, that will be their decision for all coming time. I say, then, to my northern friends, that it is not just, nor is it patriotic—it is not in conformity with that feeling of equality and fraternity which should exist among the people of this Union—for them to say that no more slave States shall be admitted into the Union. It is unjust, and in a bad spirit. I regret to see such a feeling exhibited upon the floor of this House.

Mr. Chairman, my affections rest on every inch of this country. The Constitution is my pillar of strength, and the rights of the States are as sacred in my view as the Constitution itself; and he who would infringe upon a single right of a State guaranteed in that Constitution, or would refuse to admit a State, with or without slavery, if her constitution be republican in form, has not, in my judgment, a proper estimate of the duties of an American citizen.

But, sir, this question of slavery is a perplexing one, and ought not to be agitated. Leave it where the Constitution leaves it. Let the people of every State regulate their own institutions for themselves.

You recollect, Mr. Chairman, that in May, 1854, the Kansas-Nebraska bill was the cause of such excitement as was never before seen in Congress—an excitement which spread all over the country. That bill passed. It secured to the people of the Territories, when they come to form their own State constitutions, the right to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States. Every means was resorted to by gentlemen on the other side of the House to defeat the bill. They fought it step by step through this House, and through Congress. Failing, however, to defeat the bill in Congress, they resorted to the plains of Kansas to defeat there the principles of the bill. They went there under the auspices of emigrant aid societies, and under the press of violent anti-slavery propagandism. They used every means and appliance to defeat the object of the bill. They did everything in their power to prevent the administration of the territorial government of that Territory. They went there not only with these agencies and appliances, but with Sharpe's rifles, for the purpose of resisting the laws of the Territory and of the United States. All their movements were revolutionary. They got up revolutionary conventions under the lead of some of the worst men that ever disgraced humanity, for the purpose of thwarting the execution of the laws and the honest endeavors of the late and present Administrations to maintain peace and quiet in the Territory.

This question, Mr. Chairman, has continued to agitate the country from the time of the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill to this moment; and I think gentlemen will agree with me that the country requires that Congress shall settle this question. Gentlemen will agree with me in saying that there has been agitation enough; that the people are surfeited with the discussion upon this Kansas question; that it ought to be settled; and that the time of Congress ought to be devoted to more important measures—to the construction of the Pacific railroad; to providing for the protection of the country; and to looking after the interests, not of the South alone, not of the North alone, but of every inch of our country. We want peace, harmony, and good feeling; and while this agitation is kept up there cannot be that harmony which ought to exist among the great sisterhood of States.

The Lecompton constitution is now before Congress, in all respects, legally and legitimately. The people of Kansas have the right to claim admission under it, and Congress has the right to admit them under it, because it is legal, because it was formed in accordance with the laws of the Legislative Assembly; first, in taking the sense of the people upon the subject; then in providing for the election of delegates to the convention; in the election of delegates; and in the action of the convention in framing the constitution. That convention had the right to submit the constitution, or any question incident to it, to the people, for their indorsement or not, as they pleased. To deny it would be to place many of the new States without the pale of the Union, for many of them presented their constitutions without such submission. And, sir, as it is here legally, rightfully, and properly presented, I most earnestly trust the day is not far distant when Congress will bring in Kansas under that constitution.

Any man who has listened to the debates in this House for the last four months, as I have done, must come to the conclusion at once—yes, the conclusion is forced upon him, that there are but two reasons why gentlemen on the opposite side of this House refuse to vote to admit Kansas under this constitution—because the constitution recognizes slavery, or because they desire to keep up the agitation. Those gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, who live, as I do, in that portion of the Confederacy north of Mason and Dixon's line, are opposed, as they have proclaimed, to the admission of any more slave States. Every Republican Senator who voted against the admission of Kansas under this constitution favored the admission of Kansas under the Topeka constitution—a constitution which was the offspring of violence, and which was without authority of law and revolutionary in every sense. But it was seized upon here and attempted to be forced through, in order that Kansas might be brought into the Union. Is it not, then, singular that those gentlemen who were urging the admission of Kansas into the Union under the Topeka constitution, are now opposing her admission under the Lecompton constitution, which comes here under all the sanctions of law? When the Topeka constitution was presented here for admission, I believe it had not been submitted to the people for their adoption or rejection at all; and now when Kansas comes up here legally and legitimately, gentlemen oppose her admission because she tolerates slavery by her constitution.

But that is not the worst of it. Some of our good friends on this side of the House, men who have heretofore stood firm in the Democratic ranks, and have been looked upon as national men, and whose political character has heretofore been trustworthy, are now cooperating with gentlemen on the opposite side in this matter, who, for the purpose, I was going to say, of political benefit, are for keeping this slavery question before the country. If, as I firmly believe, they are keeping up this trouble and agitation for political purposes, will our friends, who have heretofore been good Democrats, act with them under such circumstances? Will they strengthen the Opposition in this way, and by these means defeat the policy of the Democratic Administration, and divide and break down the Democratic party? I know that the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] has felt it to be his duty to place himself in opposition to the policy of the Administration, by opposing the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution. He has fought the battle gallantly, and comes up to my ideas of a good soldier. He has fought fair and gallantly, and has died nobly, but in a bad cause. No man can regret the action of that distinguished Senator more than I do; for he has been my candidate for the Presidency for a number of years. I had looked upon him as a man of the greatest intellect, as a Democrat, as a Union-loving man, as a national man. I may say that when the Cincinnati convention met in 1856, he was my choice for the Presidency. I went to the Cincinnati convention to aid and assist in getting him the nomination; but I think it a glorious thing for the country that the present Chief Magistrate received the nomination. As soon as he got the nomination, of course he was my candidate. I have been voting for Presidents for many years, and I never gave any but a Democratic vote, for I look upon the success of the Democratic party as essential to the honor, the integrity, and the existence, of the union of these States; and if must be sustained, for it would not be safe to risk the Government in the hands of a sectional party, which would deny the equality of the States of this Union, and which declares that no Territory shall be admitted as a slave State, though every man, woman, and child, in such Territory, should be in favor of it. That sectional idea will not do, sir. I look on the Democratic party as the Union itself. Its principles are the true principles of the country, and cannot be compromised; they must be maintained, for everything depends upon that party; and I earnestly hope the day is not distant when we shall find our friend, the distinguished Senator from Illinois, again laboring for the success of the Democratic cause. I have not yet given him up.

But, sir, it is surprising to find gentlemen on the other side of the House who voted for and favored the admission of Kansas under the Topeka constitution, now opposing its admission under the Lecompton constitution; and it is more surprising still to find men who heretofore occupied high positions in the Democratic party and in the councils of the nation, now cooperating, acting, and voting with them. I would appeal to these Democrats, and say to them that it is not good for them to continue in the position they have taken; they should get rid of their present political associates, for they are not good company for them to keep.

I listened yesterday to the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MORRIS,] in which he appealed to the six South Americans, and said to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD,] who stood up and asked him if he referred to him, "No, sir; you are not included in the six." Now, I ask these South Americans what are they going to do? The question now to be decided for all time to come, is, whether another slave State shall be admitted? Everybody knows that Kansas will not be long a slave State. Her people have the right to change, alter, and amend their constitution as they please. Slavery will not long exist there; but the principle, nevertheless, does exist; and that is, whether another slave State shall ever be admitted into the Union? Are the Democrats of the North willing to join those gentlemen on the other side of the House, who have proclaimed, all the time, that no other slave State shall be admitted into the Union?

Mr. ENGLISH. I should like to ask my distinguished friend from Oregon whether he knows of any northern Democrat—Lecompton or anti-Lecompton—who takes the ground that no slave State shall hereafter be admitted into the Union?

Mr. LANE. I will answer my friend with a great deal of pleasure—for he is one of those gentlemen whom I respect—that the effect is precisely the same. There is no difference. He may say he is willing to vote for the admission of a slave State, but when it comes to the point he will not do it. How are we to know that he will do it?

Mr. ENGLISH. I desire to ask my friend whether he means to say that I would not vote to admit a slave State into the Union if it were the will of the people of the State to recognize slavery?

Mr. LANE. I intend to say, and do say, that the effect is precisely the same as though he determined never to vote for the admission of a slave State into the Union, and will be so understood on all sides. This settles the question forever. This is passing a verdict which shall do justice or injustice to that portion of the country where slavery exists. Every southern member of the House is ready to vote for the admission of Minnesota and Oregon without slavery, and to live up to the doctrine that the people have a right to settle their own institutions in their own way. But while they thus walk up to that honorable position, and discharge their duty to the whole country, we find our friends acting with that party which has proclaimed over and over again that they would not vote for the admission of Kansas with slavery, if every man, woman, and child, in the Territory, should ask it.

Mr. CURTIS. Does the gentleman mean the Republican party?

Mr. LANE. I mean every one of those gentlemen who have proclaimed that no more slave States should be admitted, and those who vote with them.

Mr. CURTIS. That is not the Republican party. That party has not assumed such a position.

Mr. LANE. I want to ask my friend whether he would vote for the admission of Kansas with slavery?

Mr. CURTIS. Not while I knew the people were opposed to it.

Mr. LANE. You have no right to go behind the record at all.

Mr. CURTIS. Oh, yes; I have a right to go behind the record.

Mr. LANE. Would you vote for it if you knew the majority favored the institution of slavery?

Mr. CURTIS. I would not, because that was made free territory by the Missouri compromise.

Mr. LANE. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have heard gentlemen on the other side say, over and over again, that they would not vote for the admission of Kansas with slavery, if every man, woman, and child, should favor slavery there. The position taken by the gentleman from Iowa is the position, as I understand it, taken by the Republican party; and I regard it as a mere subterfuge.

Mr. CURTIS. Does the gentleman hold the Republican party accountable for the expression of individual sentiment in regard to this matter?

Mr. LANE. I hold it accountable for its platform.

Mr. CURTIS. The platform of the party does not say that no more slave States shall be admitted.

Mr. LANE. It pledges the party against the extension of slavery, and against the admission of any more slave States.

Mr. CURTIS. I beg the gentleman's pardon. Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. I would ask the honorable gentleman from Oregon to point out a single anti-Lecompton Democrat who does not profess to be as ready to admit Kansas into the Union with as without slavery? If he knows one, I ask him to name him.

Mr. LANE. I want to answer that question, and answer it in such a way that the gentleman will remember it; for it is an important question. I say that Kansas is here legally. Her constitution is a legal one, and you are estopped from going behind it. If that constitution says slavery shall exist, you are bound to admit the State with slavery, and leave the people free to change their constitution when the proper time arrives, if they desire to prohibit slavery. Slavery is, therefore, the only objection which can be urged to the admission of Kansas; yet the gentleman will not vote for it; and then asks me if I know of an anti-Lecompton Democrat who will not vote for the admission of Kansas as soon with as without slavery?

I repeat, sir, that that constitution is before us. The people have had a chance to vote upon the question of slavery, and nine tenths of those who have voted have voted in favor of slavery. I have no doubt that a majority of the whole people of the Territory, at the time the question was submitted, were not in favor of slavery. But their opposition to slavery did not go to the extent of recording their vote against it. What I mean to say is this, that, in ascertaining the will of the people, you are to look to the votes given for and against, not to the votes withheld, whether they be withheld on account of indifference to the result, or from factious motives. And when gentlemen say they are ready to vote for the admission of a slave State, if they are satisfied that the people of the State are in favor of slavery, and yet propose to vote against this constitution, I say, that with the constitution before us recognizing slavery, they are estopped in that argument. They cannot go behind that constitution. It is here legally; it is here legitimately; it is here properly. If there have been irregularities, bloodshed, and disorder, in the Territory, you know how it has been caused. You know it has been caused by the instrumentality of men armed with Sharpe's rifles, sent out by the emigrant aid societies, for the purpose of defeating the ends of justice, and thwarting the will of the people. The fault rests with them; and let the consequences rest upon the guilty. Do not permit the Territory and the country to suffer. It is in behalf of the country that I speak. I appeal to this House to stand by the constitution, and to allow the majority of the people to regulate their own institutions. Bring Kansas into the Union. Raise her to the dignity of a State. Place the sovereignty in the hands of her people, and they will regulate their own affairs as they please, and peace will be restored to the country. Let us not do injustice to our friends of the South, now, and for all time. I am sure my friend from Iowa [Mr. CURTIS] would not desire to do injustice. I have a very high personal regard for the gentleman. I know him to be a man of good heart, and strong mind, although he is wrong in politics. He has only to take one step further, and come over to the Democratic party. I say to that gentleman that the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States upon this question of slavery commends itself to my judgment; that slavery nominally exists in the Territories subject to the control of the people when they come to form a State government; that Congress has no power over the subject. It cannot establish or prohibit slavery; it is not in the book; no such powers were conferred upon Congress by the Constitution. Our forefathers had the good sense to confer, in plain and unmistakable terms, all powers necessary for the good of the whole country, and they took care to provide that the powers not conferred upon Congress should be reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

Congress, then, cannot interfere with the subject of slavery; and the people living under a territorial government cannot do, under an organic law framed by Congress, that which Congress itself could not do. It does nominally exist, and must always exist, in the Territories, until they come to form their State governments, and then it is their right to regulate the matter as they please. I appeal to gentlemen, then, northern men and southern men, to maintain and protect the rights guaranteed by the Constitution.

Now, in view of all these facts, how, I ask, can a South American, let him love or hate the Democratic party as he may, go with a party which says that slavery shall not be extended, and that no more slave States shall be admitted into the Union; how can he go for keeping Kansas out of the Union, under the Lecompton constitution, because it has slavery in it?

I have no idea that any South American can take that leap. He is too high minded, too noble, too devoted to the district or State he represents, to associate with a party that would heap an insult and indignity upon his portion of the country. Gentlemen of the South American party will do no such thing, in my judgment.

But, Mr. Chairman, my time has nearly expired, and I will return for a moment to the constitution of Oregon, to show what the people out there say about the right of the people to amend, alter, and change their constitution as they please. The first section in the bill of rights of the people of Oregon, as found in their constitution, is as follows:

"We declare that all men, when they form a social compact, are equal in rights; that all power is inherent in the people, and all free governments are founded on their authority, and instituted for their peace, safety, and happiness; and they have at all times a right to alter, reform, or abolish the government in such manner as they may think proper."

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HALL, of Massachusetts. I speak to-day against the admission of Kansas as a State into this Union under the Lecompton constitution, because I deem it proper that my constituents should have a voice in determining the grave issue which is under discussion here. I am not content to give a silent vote against what I consider a consummation fraught with fraud and villainy. It is due to those whom I represent, for special reasons, that their protest should be made vocal here. I have the honor to represent a people who dwell upon the shores where the first written popular constitution in the world was drawn up and promulgated; a people who are faithful to the traditions of their fathers; a people hardy, enterprising, industrious, and intelligent; a people who abhor tyranny in any and all its forms, and who are instinct in every fiber of their being with that spirit of liberty which has come down to them from their illustrious ancestors. They pride themselves on their allegiance to democratic principles and democratic institutions. When they speak of democratic principles they speak of them in their true, noble, and original sense. But I confess, Mr. Chairman, that they have but little sympathy with these phrases as they are now applied in partisan use—in the indefinite, sectarian, fanatical sense which is the parlance of the day. They are democratic in believing that the people should rule. They are democratic in believing that the people are the source of all power. They are democratic in believing that the voice of the people, so far as political affairs are concerned, is, and of necessity must be, the voice of God. Proud of their ancestry, and rejoicing because to them belongs the honor of being the descendants of the founders of the Republic, they are emulous of that high praise which the great Roman orator has bestowed upon those whose mission it is to preserve the institutions of founders—in their case, the liberty which was bequeathed to them with the Rock of Plymouth.

Various ideas of a constitution have prevailed in the world. Constitutions have sometimes been given by royal authority as a boon to subjects. But the American idea of a constitution is the simple idea of an organic act which embodies the will of the people, and is indorsed by them. It is granted that any instrument purporting to be a constitution need not of necessity be submitted to the people in form. There are constitutions of several States which now shine in the constellation of the Union, which have never been thus submitted. But in each and every such case there have been means by which it has been practicable to ascertain what the will of the people was, and that it has been embodied in them. I do not deny the doctrine laid down by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. KERR], that it is possible for the people to delegate their sovereignty to a convention, and that when they have thus delegated their sovereignty fully, they are bound by the act of their agents. I am disposed to affirm this as sound doctrine, and have no desire to deny it. But the marvel is that such a doctrine should be set up in this House, as applied to the proceedings in Kansas by the convention which produced the instrument which comes here purporting to be a constitution.

The history of this case shows that the people of Kansas, so far as they participated in the preliminary steps which called the convention into being, meant that their delegates should propose a constitution. But nowhere can be found traces of authority given to that body to adopt one. In their primary meetings they exhibited a steady indication of their purpose. The proof of this is found in the record of the pledge made by Calhoun and his associates, when they were inquired of in regard to that particular point. That pledge is in the following terms:

To the Democratic Voters of Douglas County:

"It having been stated by that Abolition newspaper, the Herald of Freedom, and by some disaffected bogus Democrats, who have got up an independent ticket, for the purpose of securing the vote of the Black Republicans, that the regular nominees of the Democratic convention were opposed to submitting the constitution to the people, we the candidates of the Democratic party, submit the following resolutions, which was adopted by the Democratic convention which placed us in nomination, and which we fully and heartily indorse, as a complete refutation of the slanders above referred to.

JOHN CALHOUN,	A. W. JONES,
W. S. WELLS,	H. BUTCHER,
L. S. BOLLING,	JOHN M. WALLACE,
WM. T. SPICELY,	L. A. PRATHER.

LECOMPTON, Kansas Territory, June 13, 1857.

"Resolved, That we will support no man as a delegate to the constitutional convention, whose duties it will be to frame the constitution of the future State of Kansas and to mold the political institutions under which we, as a people, are to live, unless he pledges himself fully, freely, and without reservation, to use every honorable means to submit the same to every bona fide actual citizen of Kansas at the proper time for the vote being taken upon the adoption by the people, in order that the said constitution may be adopted or rejected by the actual settlers in this Territory, as the majority of the voters shall decide."

It is also a fact, known and acknowledged on every side, that the President himself was in favor of such a procedure; that Governor Walker, who acted under his authority and by his advice and with the consent of the Cabinet, was also of the same opinion; and that distinct pledges were given to the people of Kansas that the constitution which should be drawn up by the convention at Lecompton would be submitted to their approval or rejection. The following extracts from official documents will establish this point beyond all contradiction. Says Governor Walker:

"I accepted [the appointment of Governor of Kansas] on the express condition that I should advocate the submission of the constitution to the vote of the people for ratification or rejection.

"These views were clearly understood by the President and his Cabinet. They were distinctly set forth in my letter of acceptance of this office, of the 26th of March last, and reiterated in my inaugural address of the 27th of May last, as follows:

"Indeed, I cannot doubt that the convention, after having framed a State constitution, will submit it for ratification or rejection by a majority of the then actual bona fide resident settlers of Kansas.

"With these views, well known to the President and Cabinet, and approved by them, I accepted the appointment of Governor of Kansas."—Governor Walker's Resignation.

"I repeat, then, as my clear conviction, that unless the convention submit the constitution to the vote of all the actual resident settlers of Kansas, and the election be fairly and justly conducted, the constitution will be, and ought to be, rejected by Congress."—Governor Walker's Inaugural Address to Kansas.

"When such a constitution shall be submitted to the people of the Territory, they must be protected in the exercise of their right of voting for or against that instrument; and the fair expression of the popular will must not be interrupted by fraud or violence."—Buchanan's Instructions to Walker.

The Union, the organ of the Administration, seems fully to appreciate the ground then held by the President, and, in defending that position, gives a most satisfactory reason for assuming it. I will read an extract from that paper:

"When there is no serious dispute upon the constitution, either in the convention or among the people, the power of the delegates alone may put it in operation. But such is not the case in Kansas. The most violent struggle this country ever saw, upon the most important issue which the constitution is to determine, has been going on there for several years, between parties so evenly balanced that both claim the majority, and so hostile to one another that numerous lives have been lost in the contest. Under these circumstances there can be no such thing as ascertaining clearly and without doubt the will of the people in any way except by their own direct expression of it at the polls. A constitution not subjected to that test, no matter what it contains, will never be acknowledged by its opponents to be anything but a fraud."

I will not attempt to elaborate this point more, because it has been frequently sustained on the floor of the House in the course of this debate.

Now, Mr. Chairman, under these circumstances, what did this convention assembled at Lecompton do? Were they faithful to their pledges made in the election? Did they truly and really represent the sentiments of the people of Kansas? Why, sir, they not only made a constitution, insuring, by the most ingenious contrivances possible, that a certain institution, which was known to be repugnant to the feelings and wishes of these people, should be made perpetual; but the constitution that they manufactured is unchangeable, generally, till 1864. And more than this, they have inserted an express provision that, even then, no power shall touch the slavery question. This instrument was submitted to the people in an unusual form. The only question which could come before them was not whether they would adopt the constitution or would not adopt it, but whether they would adopt a constitution with slavery, or a constitution without slavery. And in this strange and anti-republican form every man who was permitted to deposit his vote was subject to a test oath, and made to swear that he would support that constitution in all its provisions; thus effectually cutting off any opposition to it, and stifling the free expression of the will of the people.

It appears to me, on a careful review of the facts and history of the case, that no evidence whatever exists that the people of Kansas do desire, or ever did desire, to have this constitution as their organic law. I will not go back to examine the authority under which this convention was called, and refresh the recollection of the committee with the fact that it was by the power of a usurped Legislature, which is proven, of record now among the archives of this House, to have been elected by fraud. The convention was called by a minority of the inhabitants, as the proof at hand conclusively shows. Governor Walker says on that subject, in his letter of resignation:

"In nineteen counties out of thirty-four there was no census; in fifteen counties out of thirty-four there was no registry; and not a solitary vote was given, or could be given, for delegates to the convention in any one of these counties. Surely, then, it cannot be said that such a convention, chosen by scarcely more than one-tenth of the present voters of Kansas, represented the people of that Territory, and could rightfully impose a constitution upon them without their consent. These nineteen counties, in which there was no census, constituted a majority of the counties of the Territory; and these fifteen counties, in which there was no registry, gave a much larger vote at the October election, even with the six months' qualification, than the whole vote given to the delegates who signed the Lecompton constitution on the 7th of November last."

Nineteen counties, it appears, were disfranchised, and many others were imperfectly registered. These facts, so familiar to us all, establish it, beyond question or doubt, in the mind of any reasonable man, that it was only by a minority of the inhabitants of the Territory that the Leecompton convention was authorized. It is also a very important and significant fact, that during the time between the first assembling of the Leecompton convention and the meeting when its sessions really commenced, the opinions of the people of Kansas were taken on the very question which is the question on which turned the acceptableness or non-acceptableness of this constitution. During that very time a free-State Delegate was elected to Congress, who holds his seat among us here; and yet these men proceeded, in defiance of the known will of the people, thus contemporaneously expressed, and in the most distinct and solemn manner, to the work which they had assembled to perform. In the face of these facts, there can be no evidence that the people of Kansas desired this constitution. But on the other hand, Mr. Chairman, there is abundant evidence that these people do not desire this constitution. I will not pause to cite the testimony of numerous individuals, citizens and officials, which might be used here. I pass over the voice of the press and the sad historical incidents which prove this proposition. They have been rehearsed here, time and again. I merely point out the conspicuous fact that cannot be denied, which is of graver significance than any other fact in connection with this controversy, that on the 4th of January, there was had a fair and legal election, acknowledged to be such by the authorities, a certificate of which is signed by the Governor of the Territory and all the proper officials, and recognized by the Administration here, and on that 4th of January, ten thousand majority of the people of Kansas voted distinctly and directly against this constitution. The following is the official certificate of the result of this election:

In accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act submitting the constitution framed at Leecompton under the act of the Legislative Assembly of Kansas Territory, entitled 'An act to provide for taking a census and election of delegates to a convention,' passed February 19, A. D. 1857," the undersigned announce the following as the official vote of the people of Kansas Territory on the questions therein submitted on the 4th day of January, 1858: Against the Leecompton constitution, 10,225; for the Leecompton constitution with slavery, 138; for the Leecompton constitution without slavery, 24.

Some precincts have not yet sent in their returns, but the above is the complete vote received to this date.

January 26, 1858.

The following is extracted from the instructions to Governor Denver by the President:

"The Territorial Legislature doubtless convened on the 7th instant; and while it remains in session its members are entitled to be secure and free in their deliberations. Its rightful action must also be respected. Should it authorize an election by the people for any purpose, this election should be held without interruption, no less than those authorized by the convention. While the peace of the Territory is preserved, and the freedom of elections is secure, there need be no fear of disastrous consequences.

"The authority of the government must necessarily be maintained; and from whatever quarter it is attempted to interfere by violence with the elections authorized by the constitutional convention, or which may be authorized by the Legislature, the attempt must be resisted, and the security of the elections maintained.

"The President relies upon your firmness and discretion to give effect to these instructions. It is vitally important that the people of Kansas, and no other than the people of Kansas, should have the full determination of the question now before them for decision."—Secretary Cass to Governor Denver, December 11, 1857.

Then, sir, since we have been in session in this Hall, we have had presented to us the protest of the Legislature of the Territory of Kansas—the solemn protest of that Legislature, which is acknowledged on all sides of the House to be a lawful and rightful Legislature—one which was not elected by fraud and which is confessed to express authentically the will of the people. That protest is on record, and is in these terms:

Preamble and joint resolutions in relation to the constitution framed at Leecompton, Kansas Territory, on the 7th day of November, 1857:

Whereas, a small minority of the people living in nineteen of the thirty-eight counties of this Territory, availing themselves of a law which enabled them to obstruct and defeat a fair expression of the popular will, did, by the odious and oppressive application of the provisions and partisan machinery of said law, procure the return of the whole number of the delegates to the constitutional convention recently assembled at Leecompton; and whereas, by reason of the defective provisions of said law, in connection with the neglect and misconduct of the authorities charged with the execution of the same, the people living in the remaining nineteen counties of the Territory were not permitted to return delegates to said convention, were not recognized in its organization, or in any sense heard or felt in its deliberations; and whereas, it is an axiom in political ethics that the people cannot be deprived of their rights by the negligence or misconduct of public officers; and whereas, a minority, to wit, twenty-eight only of the sixty members of said convention, have attempted by an unworthy contrivance to impose upon the whole people of the Territory a constitution without consulting their wish, and against their will; and whereas, the members of said convention have refused to submit their action for the approval or disapproval of the voters of the Territory, and in thus acting have defied the known will of nine tenths of the voters thereof; and whereas, the action of a fragment of said convention, representing, as they did a small minority of the voters of the Territory, repudiates and crushes out the distinctive principle of the Nebraska-Kansas act, and violates and tramples under foot the right and the sovereignty of the people; and whereas, from the foregoing statement of facts it clearly appears that the people have not been left "free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way," but on the contrary, at every stage in the anomalous proceedings recited, they have been prevented from so doing.

Be it therefore resolved by the Governor and Legislative Assembly of Kansas Territory, That the people of Kansas, being opposed to said constitution, Congress has no rightful power under it to admit said Territory into the Union as a State, and we, the representatives of said people, do hereby in their name, and on their behalf, solemnly protest against such admission.

Resolved, That such action on the part of Congress would, in the judgment of the members of this Legislative Assembly, be an entire abandonment of the doctrine of non-intervention in the affairs of the Territory, and a substitution in its stead of congressional intervention in behalf of a minority engaged in a disreputable attempt to defeat the will and violate the rights of the majority.

Resolved, That the people of Kansas Territory claim the right, through a legal and fair expression of the will of a majority of her citizens, to form and adopt a constitution for themselves.

Resolved, That the Governor of this Territory be requested to forward a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolutions to the President of the United States, the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to the Delegate in Congress from this Territory.

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

SECRETARY'S OFFICE,
LECOMPTON, (K. T.) January 12, 1858.

I certify the above to be a true copy of the enrolled resolutions deposited in this office.

HUGH S. WALSH, Clerk.

Originated in the House of Representatives.

C. F. CURRIER, Chief Clerk.

I claim, on these grounds, that the evidence is complete and irrefragable that the people of Kansas emphatically repudiate the Leecompton constitution as the expression of their will. Without dwelling on this point longer, I proceed to inquire what are the right and duty of Congress in these premises. The Constitution of the United States says that Congress "may admit new States." This implies to every reasonable mind a large discretion. It therefore gives us, by an implication which cannot be denied, the power to reject the application of any State for any reason that may appear to Congress to be right, if not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States.

The Kansas-Nebraska act is sometimes said to have been an enabling act. Mr. Chairman, I deny it. It is in no sense an enabling act; it is chiefly a declaratory act. The pith of it is a certain declaration, hard to be understood, and more difficult to be interpreted, if we may judge from the variety of interpretations given to it by gentlemen on the other side of the House. But in no sense was it such an enabling act as to override or to restrain the power of Congress in a case like that now before us. We are called upon to admit a State into the Confederacy against the will of the people thereof; and certainly, among the rights of Congress, under the Constitution, no right has ever been given to force a constitution on an unwilling people. Whatever may be said as to the right of Congress to admit or to reject new States, nowhere can be found anything like a color of power to force a constitution on a people who, in every form and shape possible, have repudiated and rejected it.

What, then, is the duty of Congress in a case like the present? Let us look at the nature of this case. I undertake to say that there has been fraud proved in every step of this procedure, from the inception of the convention to its final action. But if that is denied in any quarter, there is no man who will deny that there is reasonable suspicion of it in all these transactions—transactions which are very hard to be explained by the most subtle and acute reasoners. At any rate, sir, this pretended constitution comes not here with a clean record, and no man has stood up here to defend it as a clean record; and no fair man will. On all sides it is allowed that some irregularities exist; and these irregularities are of such a kind as to make it wise for us to stop here, even if it is not our imperative duty so to do, and let the matter be disposed of in the future.

We are told here that every State must be admitted which has the requisite number of population, and whose constitution is republican in form. But no constitution can be republican in form which does not express the will of the people. It is anti-republican unless it embodies the will of the people in some distinct and unequivocal form. I plant myself on the Declaration of Independence, that great charter of our liberties, underlying our most sacred rights; and that Declaration says that "all free governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed." There can be no free government, there can be no such thing as a republican government, that does not derive all its rightful powers from the consent of the people who live under it.

Besides this, we have a duty which we owe to Kansas. I regret that so little has been said in regard to our duty to Kansas. Gentlemen have seemed to think it was our only duty to admit her into the Union because there had been an application on the part of somebody; though who this somebody is, is hard to determine. Sir, there is a duty higher and nobler than this, which we owe to Kansas. She sustains to us, in her territorial capacity, a peculiar relation. We also sustain to the people of the Territories a peculiar relation. It is a relation which ought to be marked on each side by principles of integrity. We ought to have some regard for their good name, and they should show due respect for Congress. Kansas ought not to be thrust in among this sisterhood of States with a stain upon her honor. Kansas ought not to be permitted to become one of us in this glorious Union with a constitution that is not free from the blot of fraud and iniquity. Kansas should come here with clean hands; she should come with spotless robes to take her place in the circle of independent and sovereign States. Her territorial history has been sad; it is marked with ruffianism, rapine, blood. Be it ours to see to it that her history as a State shall not commence with foul stains overspreading her organic act. To admit her under present circumstances is not to take her by the hand with words of gratulation which awaken the sympathies of her people, but to forcibly drag her into your association, imposing on them a constitution which they repudiate and abhor. You chain her unwillingly to your victorious chariot wheels as the old Romans graced their triumphs with their captives. She cannot greet you with uplifted eyes and queenly port; but, veiled and manacled, she submissively bows her neck, and waits your pleasure; and this record will be yours and hers forever.

Sir, what is the necessity that Kansas should be admitted in this way? Why must we be called upon to contradict and deny the fundamental principles of republican government? Why depart from the wisdom of the fathers of the State? The President, who stands as sponsor for this proceeding, and urges us onward to this act, says that Kansas must be admitted to give peace to that Territory and to the country. Was there ever such a pretense as this? Restore peace to Kansas by forcing a constitution upon her which she has repudiated by her decisive vote! Peace to Kansas by denying her her rights! Peace to Kansas by heaping upon her injustice and wrong! Sir, it is most delusive. There can be no peace to Kansas while you attempt to stifle the voice of her people, and trample down what is dearer to them than life.

But we are told by gentlemen on the other side; we were told by the gentleman who has just taken his seat, [Mr. LANE,] that the reasons urged on this side of the House for resistance to the admission of Kansas are not sincere reasons; that the true reason is founded in opposition to slavery in that Territory. Well, Mr. Chairman, what are the facts in regard to the character of this discussion? Has not the admission of Kansas been urged upon the ground that the constitution recognizes slavery? Have we not been told over and over again that Kansas must be admitted with slavery as a right, chiefly for the reason that she has made a constitution which contains slavery? This has been the spirit of the remarks of a large portion of the gentlemen who have spoken in favor of her admission.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if any gentleman on this floor has urged that Kansas should be admitted into the Union because her constitution recognizes slavery?

Mr. HALL, of Massachusetts. I said that was the spirit of the remarks of southern gentlemen; otherwise why is it a violation of southern rights, of which gentlemen have so much complained, to refuse her admission? But, in respect to the question of slavery in Kansas, if that is the question in issue, I tell gentlemen, all other reasons apart, that we have the vantage ground in reference to this same Territory of Kansas. Every foot of the soil of that Territory has once been irrevocably consecrated to freedom by the Missouri compromise. It is said that this compromise was unconstitutional, and there seems to have been what some gentlemen seem to regard as a decision of the Supreme Court, affirming the constitutionality of that compromise; but, sir, there are authorities at least as strong upon the other side of the question. The Cabinet of the President under whose Administration the Missouri compromise became a law, contained wise men and eminent constitutional lawyers. Their opinions are on record, and are worthy of as much respect as any opinion pronounced by a part or the whole of the Supreme Court of the United States, as now constituted.

Mr. Chairman, we of the North were juggled out of our rights by the repeal of the Missouri compromise—rights for which a consideration was paid.

Mr. SINGLETON. I wish to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if the South, in 1850, did not ask to have the Missouri compromise line applied to the Territories of New Mexico and Utah, which were then organized?

Mr. HALL, of Massachusetts. I am willing to allow it.

Mr. SINGLETON. How, then, can you say that the South has been unwilling to stand by that line which she offered to extend across the country to the Pacific?

Mr. HALL, of Massachusetts. It is a matter notorious, that that compromise was repealed by the votes of the South, and by their allies, upon a specific occasion; and no matter what other propositions may have been made from time to time, that fact stands out patent and uncontroverted. Therefore I say we have been juggled out of our rights by a breach of good faith, and we, rejecting all your refinements, are determined to avail ourselves of every opportunity to redress that wrong. Within the limits of that compromise, at least, we will have no more slave States. Never!

Mr. SINGLETON. Will the gentleman be kind enough to state what the consideration of that bargain was?

Mr. HALL, of Massachusetts. The admission of the State of Missouri, and the admission of other slave States south of that line.

Sir, the President and his advisers, prompters or guardians, would have been wise if they had well considered the effect of the repeal of the Missouri compromise before they invented and produced this Kansas embroglio. They should have considered that the non-slaveholding States were released from all obligation to the admission of any more slave States. They were bound by it to a certain extent while it existed; but, by its repeal, they were exempt from such obligations forever. The President might well inquire what party organization it had given rise to, how large it had become, and how near it reached success in the last campaign. The President is a minority President as it is. What wise man will approve of urging this irritation of northern sentiment further, and especially by such low acts of petty finesse and chicanery as we have before us in this record? Everybody must see that the progress of events is towards change, and on the side of freedom.

A Senator from South Carolina told us, in the other end of the Capitol, a few days ago, that the South had ruled the nation for sixty, out of seventy years; and the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. DAVIS,] who is not now in his seat, was pleased to say that the time was rapidly approaching when power would be in the hands of the North; and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BOYCE] made use of language of a similar character, yesterday. They say true; and their prescience is to be commended. Whoever turns his vision to the political firmament will behold the star which symbolizes the scepter of power tending northward. Then, the true policy is, by an enlightened spirit of moderation and forbearance, to conciliate. The time is past for martyrdom to abstractions. Your Kansas-Nebraska bill, which was to be the panacea for all political troubles, has made a very chaos of the political elements. By its interpretation and effects, confusion worse confounded has been introduced into the political system. Nobody has been found who can say what the "true intent and meaning" of it is. As applied to Kansas, to leave the people to settle their institutions in "their own way," it appears to mean upholding a constitutional convention, sitting under the protection of United States bayonets, to manufacture an organic act which the people repudiate on the first fair opportunity at the polls; and yet the Kansas-Nebraska act is said to illustrate the principle of popular sovereignty. The theory of the Democratic party is, that it recognizes all the rights of the people; that it is the very summum bonum of all political truth; that it, above all other things, is to be revered by the people, after the Declaration of Independence; but, mark you, whether at the North or the South, gentlemen are unable to agree wherein its manifold virtues consist.

Now, sir, I repeat that your Kansas-Nebraska act has made a perfect chaos of all political elements—such a chaos as always precedes a new creation. We live in a formative period, and the policy of the country is about to be changed. The indications of it, everywhere, are so distinct and marked that no man in his senses can overlook or deny them; and as out of original chaos, by the omnific word, the green earth arose fair and beautiful, so from the elements all around us the party of the future will spring. I say we live in a formative period. The elements thus far have been resistant, but they will become conservative as they are consolidated, and acquire power and strength. Such a party cannot have a taint of sectionalism about it, and from the necessity of its constitution it seems impossible that it can become aggressive on any constitutional or covenanted right of any portion of the people of these United States. This is the inevitable result of the forces now in operation. It is impossible that things should continue as they are. The dominion of the slave power is over, or is drawing to its close; and as it draws to its close the star of hope for the reorganization of this Government on its original pattern will rise in the ascendant. The convulsions through which we have passed have shaken the country to its very center. The convulsions through which we are now passing are but its nascent throes; and when its birth-time shall fully come it will spring up among the people, among all conservative men, among all lovers of the Union—like Minerva from the head of Jove, complete, and full-armed with all the attributes of power. Hereafter we shall strike for constitutional liberty, union, and progress, and the Government will be restored to its original pattern and parity.

There are already constituencies enough in the length and breadth of the land to produce this effect, and the men will be found to fill these seats, to regenerate your Senate, to occupy your places of executive power, and in due time to wear the purified robes of judicial authority.

In the course of this debate, dark intimations of secession and disunion have been thrown out, and we are told that if Kansas is not admitted under the present constitution, that the bond which unites us is to be broken, that there is to be no more fraternity between the North and the South, and that the rejection of this act will be a sufficient ground for a movement in favor of disunion. Sir, we do not believe in the probabilities of any such thing. We do not believe in the possibilities of any such thing. It has not been asserted on authority that any such thing will occur; but, as I said before, dark intimations have been thrown out that such a thing may occur if a certain course be pursued. Now, sir, this Union is not one of opinion. This Union is one of interest and necessity, and while the interest is recognized, the necessity continues, and while that necessity continues, the Union will be intact. There is no portion of the Union that can afford to do without the other portion. The interests of all are interlinked and interwoven. They are and must be one, not by mere political constitution, but by the necessities of the case. This Union rests on a compact which no one party can repudiate, or be permitted to repudiate. The constitution and practical operation of the Federal Government are matters which need to be better understood among the masses of the people. It contains in itself the elements of perpetuity—it must be a perpetuity. All sorts of combinations against it must be insurrectionary, and ephemeral in their nature, while the Federal Government is clothed with authority, and has, therefore, the essential elements of stability. All hostile combinations, illegal as they are, must be suppressed and will be suppressed in due course of law. I speak not, Mr. Chairman, of war; I speak not of fratricidal strife; there are other means to be tried before so dire a result can be reached, or even thought of.

I have faith that there is a spirit underlying all this superficial excitement of to-day—a spirit of intense love to the Union among the masses of the people. It is possible for politicians, with their ambitions before them, with their disappointments and their restless machinations with personal aims, to endeavor to inflame and excite the minds of the people. They may succeed to this point, but no further. On the second sober thought, there is a loyal feeling of attachment to the ancient bond; and the larger your Union becomes, the stronger are the ties which bind you. The very diversity of interests that connect you with one another is the strongest assurance that such a Union must exist and must endure.

I was pleased with the reply of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] the other day, when he was catechized by a gentleman on this side in regard to the interpretation of the recent resolutions of the State of Texas. They seemed at first to be minatory, and involving within themselves something fearful to contemplate. But the gentleman from Texas interpreted them by saying that they did not mean that Texas would secede from the Union, but that they were afraid that the Union would secede from Texas. And so the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. BOYCE,] and the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. MOORE,] do not undertake to say that the result of these conventions called in the southern States is to effect the dissolution of the Union, but that they are only to contemplate the steps they ought to take to redress the imaginary grievances under which they suffer.

And this always will be the case when the result comes. The people cannot be moved to such fanaticism. On the surface all this excitement may appear, and unwise men may indulge in violent declamations, but the heart of the people is always true; and the heart of the masses, North and South, will ever beat in faithfulness to the Union.

But another spirit has been evoked by this controversy which calls for animadversion. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SHORTELL] was pleased to say, a short time since, that "he despised the memory of the Pilgrim fathers," and took the opportunity of availing himself of the singular and unenviable privilege of reviling them and their principles accordingly. This, sir, is the language of irritated perplexity, and the petulance of despair, and was in keeping with the line of argument which he chose to pursue in sustaining this Lecompton constitution. Why, sir, the true idea of popular sovereignty was first announced on this continent from the cabin of the Mayflower. When the Pilgrim fathers first anchored at Cape Cod, they found themselves beyond the limit of their patent, and consequently without any delegated powers for the establishment of their community on a political basis. They were thrown back into circumstances approximating as nearly as possible to that ideal "state of nature" of which philosophers have dreamed. Prepared in the school of discipline, they were at no loss what steps to take when the exigency arose which compelled them to action. Their promptness in providing for the emergency demonstrates that their theory of government was fixed, while history renders it certain that they had originally no intention of setting up a voluntary organization. On the next day, they formed themselves into a body-politic, on the basis of republican principles, by the signature of this brief and famous instrument which is the original charter of our present liberties:

"In the name of God, amen. We whose names are under written, the loyal subjects of our dread sovereign Lord, King James, by the grace of God, of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, King, Defender of the faith, &c. Having undertaken, for the glory of God, and advancement of the Christian faith, and the honor of our King and country, a voyage to plant the first colony in the northern parts of Virginia; do by these presents solemnly and mutually, in the presence of God and one another, covenant and combine ourselves together into a civil body politic, for our better ordering and preservation, and furtherance of the ends aforesaid. And by virtue hereof, do enact, constitute, and frame such just and equal laws, ordinances, acts, constitutions, and officers, from time to time, as shall be thought most meet and convenient for the general good of the colony; unto which we promise all due submission and obedience. In witness whereof we have hereto subscribed our names, at Cape Cod, the eleventh of November, in the reign of our sovereign Lord King James, of England, France and Ireland, the eighteenth, and of Scotland the fifty-fourth, Anno Dom. 1620."

A sight like this the world had never seen, and such again the sun will never look upon. By that deed alone the Pilgrim fathers are immortalized. The Mayflower became classic, like the bark of Æneas, and around her cluster associations of more romantic interest than the proudest galley of the Argonauts, or the noblest of the fleets of Cæsar could ever boast.

I could not reach the theme if I were to attempt the eulogy of the Pilgrims. They need not my defense. Some words of pious recollection of their deeds, and their results, are all that the time will allow. Their history is the more attractive because it is the record of humble efforts and small beginnings. It becomes illustrious when regarded in the light of its results. If this our nation has thus far in its course gone onward and upward, and we have attained a pinnacle of greatness which lifts its fair proportions to attract the admiration of the world, it is not too much to claim that the essential elements of that greatness spring from the germ which they planted.

The fathers of New England owe their celebrity, not so much to the circumstances in which they were thrown, as to the fact that they were equal to those circumstances. They were no ordinary men who were able to establish new forms of society, to develop new principles of government, and to open new sources of human happiness and human improvement; and all these, in the face of most adverse and discouraging circumstances. The project of exploring a home in a foreign wilderness, a home for delicate women and children, was a daring enterprise in the seventeenth century, when the experiment was new. By weak minds it would be deemed absurd, and to common men it would seem rash and visionary. But to them it presented an object congenial with the brawny strength of their intellectual powers, and precisely suited to their lofty aspirations and sublime daring.

Our fathers were the true progressives of their day. They were not the slaves of precedent, but they despised not the wisdom of the past; they paid small reverence to usage and prescription, but yielded themselves ever to truth and right. The principle announced by Robinson for their guidance in religious matters was exemplified yet more perfectly in their science of government. Unflinching in their loyalty to well-ascertained principles intelligently embraced, they revered them as supreme, and used a wise policy in the selection and prosecution of the measures necessary to develop them, and to secure their ascendancy. To them we owe it that we have free elections in place of hereditary rule—that the privilege of birth has given place to equality before the law; that the power to transmit vast accumulations of wealth in perpetuity is done away; that military organizations are composed of citizens themselves; that arbitrary exactions are superseded by a system of taxation by which the revenues of Governments are provided by the voluntary assent of the people; and, above all, the system of free and universal education was of their origination. They reposed their hopes for institutions like these in the virtue and intelligence of the people. Invested with these attributes, they inaugurated the sovereignty of the people, and placed the scepter of power irrevocably in their hands. The first ornaments of every plantation were the church and the school house. And, from these points of light, have radiated the glory which sparkles in the diadem of our national greatness.

The memory of the men who originated the system which has produced such results, is safe from the assaults of men less illustrious than themselves. Their children think they best honor them when they seek to imitate their example, and will ever be ready to defend their fair fame. They ask to be pointed to some other ancestry who have been equal benefactors to their race, ere they blush at the sneer of ignorance, or quail before the railings of the calumniator when directed against their revered names. They are content with the world's verdict, and the almost unanimous applause of their kind. The rancor of sectional hate exhausts itself in vain. The memory of the men, and the principles associated with Plymouth Rock, must endure forever.

Mr. HILL obtained the floor, but yielded it to Mr. UNDERWOOD, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BOCOCK reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 306) to supply deficiencies in the appropriation for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1858, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. JOHN COCHRANE, (at half past four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday next.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, March 29, 1858.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE.

On the appearance of a quorum, at sixteen minutes past twelve o'clock,

WILLIAM HICKEY, Esq., Chief Clerk (in the absence of the Secretary, occasioned by sickness) called the Senate to order.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Senators, perhaps it is proper that I should explain the cause of the delay in the organization of the Senate this morning. I will state to the Senate that I received a communication from the Vice President, Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, informing me that he was compelled to return to his family in the South, and that he expected to leave this morning. I have delayed calling the Senate to order to be assured that he has left, and I think there can now be no question of the fact.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I can state that he has left; for I went with him to the boat.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I will state further that, as the Senate is well aware, I was honored with their confidence at the opening of the session, and I know it to be the opinion of many Senators that the President pro tempore elected at the opening of the session remains in office during that session. I have inquired, however, of those who are intimately conversant with the practice, and who understand the history of the manner in which this officer is elected, and the prevailing opinion is that when you elect a President pro tempore, the appearance of the Vice President vacates that election; and when he vacates the chair again, the Senate has to proceed to elect another presiding officer. It now devolves on the Senate to elect a presiding officer.

The CHIEF CLERK. As the Constitution of the United States requires the election of a President pro tempore in the absence of the Vice President, Senators will be pleased to prepare their ballots for the election.

The ballots having been collected and canvassed, the result was announced, as follows: Whole number of votes cast, 41. Necessary to a choice, 21; of which—

Hon. Benjamin Fitzpatrick received.....	23
Hon. William Pitt Fessenden.....	12
Hon. Hannibal Hamlin.....	1

The CHIEF CLERK. The whole number of ballots cast is 41, of which 21 are necessary to a choice. Of the whole number, Mr. FITZPATRICK has received 23, Mr. FESSENDEN 12, and Mr. HAMLIN 1; so that Mr. FITZPATRICK is duly elected President pro tempore of the Senate. Mr. SLIDELL and Mr. DIXON will be pleased to conduct the President pro tempore to the chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore, having been conducted to the chair, said: Senators, I tender my grateful acknowledgments for this renewal of your confidence; and beg to assure you that I shall impartially, and to the best of my ability, discharge the duties of the situation to which you have called me. The Journal of Thursday will be read.

The Journal of Thursday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PUGH presented a petition of citizens of Sandusky county, Ohio, praying that a pension may be granted to each of the surviving officers and soldiers who have been in the regular or volunteer service of the United States since the 1st day of January, 1848; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented two petitions of citizens of Cincinnati, Ohio, praying that a quarter section of land may be granted to actual settlers in the proposed Territory of Arizona, including the right to the minerals in the soil, upon the same conditions that lands are granted in the other Territories and States; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a memorial of members of the bar and others, at Toledo, Ohio, praying that a term of the United States district and circuit courts for the northern district of Ohio, may be held at Toledo; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of Cincinnati, Ohio, praying that a system of instruction may be introduced on board the United States ships-of-war, as a means of improving the personnel of the Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of Cleveland, Ohio, remonstrating against the repeal of the law establishing the Light-House Board; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a resolution adopted at the State military convention, held in the city of Columbus, Ohio, on the 19th of January, 1858, relative to the officering of the four additional regiments recommended by the President in his message in December last; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

He also presented additional papers in relation to claims to lands lying within the Muncie Reservation, in the Territory of Kansas; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. BRODERICK presented resolutions of the Legislature of California, against the renewal of the present contract with the Atlantic and Pacific Mail Steamship Companies, and in favor of the letting of two distinct weekly mail contracts, on separate routes, to two distinct companies; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. JONES presented a resolution of the Legislature of Iowa, in favor of the enactment of a law legalizing certain locations of land under land warrants for which more than one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre was paid; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Iowa, in favor of the establishment of certain mail routes in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. GWIN presented a resolution of the Legislature of California, in favor of the cession to that State of the Monterey redoubt, for the establishment of a military school, or for other purposes of education; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

He also presented the petition of David D. Porter, a lieutenant in the Navy, praying for the settlement, upon principles of equity, of his accounts for certain secret services performed by him in the island of St. Domingo, under an order of the Secretary of the Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented the petition of Alexander Copeland, praying for confirmation of his title to certain lands in the county of Sonora, in California; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. KING presented a petition of citizens of New York, praying that the public lands may be granted free of cost, in farms or lots, to actual settlers only; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CHANDLER presented the petition of Cassandra S. Witherell, praying that a land warrant may be issued to the heirs of her late father, Major General Hugh Brady, of the United States Army; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. HAMLIN presented the petition of Hannah Thompson, praying that her pension may be continued; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, presented a petition of citizens of Detroit, Michigan, praying that the public lands may cease to be considered a source of public revenue, and that hereafter all entries thereof may be confined to actual settlers; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. POLK presented a petition of citizens of the city and county of St. Louis, Missouri, praying for the organization of the Territory of Arizona, and that lands may be granted to actual settlers therein; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PEARCE presented the memorial of Beverly Diggs, late an officer in the revenue service, praying for some relief in consideration of his having been, as he alleges, without cause, dismissed from the service; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of Ann E. Smoot, widow of Joseph Smoot, late a captain in the Navy, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented the petition of A. G. Allen, late navy agent at Washington, District of Columbia, praying to be allowed additional compensation for disbursements to officers and others entitled by law to extra pay; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. KING, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Agnes Slacke and the heirs of De Repentigny be withdrawn from the files and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

On motion of Mr. EVANS, it was Ordered, That the petition of Oliver Towles and others, heirs of Captain Oliver Towles, deceased, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

On motion of Mr. HAMLIN, it was Ordered, That the petition of Lemuel Worster, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

RECOMMITTAL OF A REPORT.

Mr. YULEE. At the request of the parties concerned, I ask that the adverse report heretofore made at this session by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, in the case of William Moss, be recommitted. I will state that I have no authority from the committee to make this motion, nor has anything occurred to change the view of the committee thus far; but, at the suggestion of the Senator representing the State from which the parties come, I move the recommitment, with a view of affording them an opportunity of presenting the further testimony and further considerations, which they think may prevail with the committee to change their opinions.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HENDERSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 214) to provide for the compensation of the judges of the district courts of the United States for the two districts in the State of Texas, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KENNEDY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 215) for the relief of the executor of Brevet Brigadier General James Bankhead, late of the United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

Mr. YULEE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 25) explanatory and amendatory of the resolution approved March 1, 1845, entitled "A resolution amendatory of the resolution passed April 30, 1854, respecting the application of certain appropriations heretofore made;" which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BENJAMIN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 84) to provide for the better regulation of night signals on board of sail vessels navigating the north-western lakes and their tributaries, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 138) further to provide for the safety of passengers on steam vessels, reported it with amendments.

Mr. IVERSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of J. W. Sullivan, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Bacchus Webster, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of A. L. Pennock and George Pennock, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Findley Patterson, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the petition of Findley Patterson, praying to be allowed for work done in the erection of the capitol of Kansas, at Leecompton, under a contract with the Governor of that Territory, and indemnity for losses sustained in consequence of the suspension of the work, together with the papers in the case, be referred to the Court of Claims for the action of that tribunal.

Mr. SEBASTIAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of D. Meriwether, submitted an adverse report.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed, without amendment, Senate bill to create additional land districts in the State of California, and for other purposes.

SHIP BILLS OF SALE.

Mr. HAMLIN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be directed to inquire into the expediency of amending the law relating to recording bills of sale of vessels, passed July 29, 1850.

MAJOR JEREMIAH Y. DASHIELL.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I appeal to the courtesy of the Senate to indulge me by taking up and passing now the bill (S. No. 202) for the relief of Major Jeremiah Y. Dashiell, paymaster in the United States Army. It is to indemnify him for the loss of some $20,000 of money of the United States, which was in his possession. The loss occurred in landing him in a yawl on the coast of Florida. All the facts are proved. The yawl was upset in crossing the bar. The passengers in the yawl with Mr. Dashiell, and his son among the rest, clung to the wreck for an hour before they were relieved. They came very near being lost. The money, which was in a leather valise, was lost on the upsetting of the yawl. Every effort has been made to recover it since, but it has been found impossible; and the amount stands charged against him on the books of the Department. It is a case of peculiar hardship, and the committee are entirely satisfied that relief ought to be granted to him against any further responsibility on this account. I ask the consent of the Senate to pass the bill now, so that he may obtain that relief which, if delayed much longer, he cannot get.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the accounting officers, in settling the accounts of Major Dashiell, as paymaster in the Army, to credit him with the sum of $23,115; that being the amount of public money accidentally lost by him on the 1st day of May, 1857, in attempting to cross the bar of Indian river, Florida, for the purpose of paying the troops at Fort Capron, in that State.

The troops stationed on and near Indian river in Florida were in arrears of pay from two to six months in April, 1857, and Major Dashiell, in the due performance of his duty as paymaster of the district, drew from the assistant treasurer at Charleston, South Carolina, the sum of $23,115, which was placed in a leathern bag ordinarily used and put in charge of an escort. There were two routes by which to reach his place of destination, Fort Capron, one by sea, and the other (the river route) partly by land and partly by water; an the latter route, owing to the shallowness of the water, as well as to certain outrages and massacres which had been lately perpetrated by the Indians in that vicinity, was considered not only unsafe, but impracticable. Major Dashiell, therefore, took the only alternative, and proceeded by sea, in the schooner William and John, to the mouth of Indian river; when he arrived there, acting under the advice of the captain of the vessel, who had six years' experience of the bar at the mouth of the river, he, with his son, proceeded to land. The bag containing the funds, which was duly identified by size, weight, and appearance, was lowered into the boat, being taken for that purpose from the iron safe in which it had been deposited. The bar, as appears from the officers of several vessels who were present, was in a favorable state for landing, and that it was so considered by Major Dashiell, appears from the fact that himself and son unhesitatingly accompanied the treasure in its transit to the shore.

It further appears that, while crossing the bar, the yawl boat which contained the party was suddenly capsized by a cross-breaker, and the bag containing the funds sunk. Major Dashiell, his son, and the crew, after clinging to the bottom of the boat for more than an hour, in imminent peril, were rescued by the boat of one of the vessels near by. Immediately after his rescue he applied for a guard to watch the spot, which was furnished by the commanding officer of the post, and took prompt and active measures to recover the money. A large reward was offered, and the most strenuous and constant endeavors made by the major and others to recover the treasure; but owing to the high winds and heavy seas which then prevailed for several days, these attempts met with no success; and he was finally compelled, with reluctance to abandon the search. The guard, however, remained, and the attempts to recover the funds were continued by the commanding officer of the post, but without a favorable result.

The Military Committee are of opinion that the funds in charge of Major Dashiell, the property of the United States, were lost by an unforeseen and unavoidable accident, and that the loss was in no manner due to negligence or want of proper precautions on his part.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DEPARTMENTAL MESSENGERS.

Mr. YULEE. There is a joint resolution on the table, reported from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, some time ago, which I ask the Senate now to take up and consider. It is a very small matter, and will require no discussion. It is intended only to prevent the misconception of a joint resolution passed at the last Congress.

The Senate proceeded as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the joint resolution, (S. No. 17,) explanatory of the "joint resolution, giving an increased compensation to all laborers in the employment of the executive and legislative departments of the Government in the city of Washington," approved 18th August, 1856.

It provides that the joint resolution of 18th August, 1856, which provides that there shall be "one principal messenger in each of the bureaus of the several Executive Departments, at an annual salary of $840 each," shall be understood to embrace within its true scope and meaning the offices of the three Assistant Postmasters General, entitling each to a messenger at an annual salary of $840.

Mr. YULEE. The correction of the construction which is proposed by this resolution conforms to the intention of the Finance Committee, as I learn from the chairman of that committee, in reporting the original resolution at the last Congress. This is designed to give effect to the resolution passed by the last Congress, which was intended by the committee that reported it.

Mr. HUNTER. I had always supposed that the Assistant Postmasters General were at the head of bureaus. Undoubtedly they are. I do not know why this construction was given; but this resolution is proper, in order to do justice.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MAJOR JAMES L. DONALDSON.

On motion of Mr. KENNEDY, the bill (S. No. 145) for the relief of Brevet Major James L. Donaldson, assistant quartermaster United States Army, was read a first and second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for the allowance to Brevet Major James L. Donaldson, of a credit for the sum of $400, being the amount of public funds stolen while in his possession as acting assistant quartermaster of the Army, near Monterey, in Mexico, on the 10th of October, 1846.

The petitioner was acting assistant quartermaster at Walnut Springs, before the city of Monterey, Mexico, after the city was taken by the American Army, (in the month of September, 1846), and as such had in his possession public funds to the amount of $400, which he kept in a box or chest in his tent, this being the only means he had of keeping it. On the 10th of October, 1846, he had occasion to go to Monterey with Captain Webster, the officer in command, on official business, and left his tent in charge of a sentinel; during his absence his tent was entered in the rear and the money stolen, and although the most diligent search was immediately made, the funds have not been found, though the box was afterwards discovered in the neighboring bushes rifled of the money. Lieutenant Bowen, who occupied the same tent, corroborates the statement of the petitioner as to the circumstances of the robbery, and gives it as his opinion that the amount lost was $400. The testimony of the commanding officer and of the non-commissioned officers and privates all support Major Donaldson's statement; and the Committee on Military Affairs being satisfied that the money was lost without any negligence or fraud on the part of the petitioner, report a bill for his relief.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that its Speaker had signed an enrolled bill to create additional land districts in the State of California and for other purposes; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

CAPTAIN CHARLES G. RIDGELY.

On motion of Mr. KENNEDY, the bill (S. No. 144) for the relief of Captain Charles G. Ridgely, of the United States Navy, was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for the payment to Captain Charles G. Ridgely of $6,000 for extraordinary expenses incurred when he commanded the United States squadron in the Pacific ocean, in the years 1820 and 1821, in receiving and entertaining on board of his ship the head officers of the Governments in whose ports he was, who were compelled to seek a temporary refuge under the flag of the United States, and for other extraordinary expenses which he incurred in the execution of the orders of the Navy Department.

Mr. BIGGS. I ask for the reading of the report in that case.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report made by Mr. POLK from the Committee on Foreign Relations, but was interrupted at one o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will remark to the Senate that the hour has arrived for the consideration of the special order, and this bill cannot be further proceeded with, unless by an order of the Senate.

Mr. KENNEDY. I am inclined to think there will be no objection raised to it at all. The bill has passed the Senate, as well as the lower House, on several occasions. There has been no objection to it before, and I think it can be disposed of in a few moments. I move, therefore, that the special order be passed over for a short time.

Mr. STUART. I think it will be hardly worth while to do that. From the reading of the report, so far as it has gone, there is no evidence of the amount of expenditure at all; and, at all events, it seems to me that it is likely to involve more or less of discussion. I will say to the honorable Senator that he can take it up any other morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It lies over, under the rule, the hour having arrived for the consideration of the special order, which is the bill for the admission of the State of Minnesota.

ADMISSION OF MINNESOTA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 86) for the admission of the State of Minnesota into the Union, the pending question being on the amendment offered by Mr. MASON, in section two to strike out all after the word "Representative" in line two, to the end of the section, and insert "in the Congress of the United States," so that the section will read:

That the said State shall be entitled to one Representative in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. HUNTER. It seems to me that there is much reason for the adoption of this amendment. This new State can claim no more than the other States. It can only ask to be put on a footing of equality with the other States. What would be a footing of equality? It would be this: if the apportionment had to be made now, we should divide the total federal numbers by two hundred and thirty-three; and we should apply the ratio thus obtained to Minnesota in common with all the other States. She would thus be represented proportionately to the others with regard to her population. We can only come at it conjecturally; but if we were to do that; if we were to take the federal numbers, and suppose they had increased at the rate of three and one third per cent. annually, which is about the average rate of increase of our population, as shown by the last census, it would be found, I think, that the ratio would be somewhere about one hundred thousand, or a little over. If we apply that ratio to the actual census (and we can have no other safeguard than the census taken according to law) it would leave a fraction, not equal to half the ratio, and she certainly would not be entitled to be represented for her fraction. I think, therefore, that one member is as much as she can be entitled to, under any fair view of the case. For these reasons I shall vote for the amendment.

Mr. PUGH. If the Senate is disposed to vote on the question I will desist; otherwise I should like to make some reply to the suggestions made by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MASON,] and the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] at the last session of the Senate; but if no other Senator wishes to speak I will desist. ["Go on."] The burden of their argument was, that inasmuch as by the Constitution of the United States there was a general census required to be taken every ten years with a view to the apportionment of Representatives in the other House, therefore the census required by the enabling act of the last Congress to be taken in Minnesota is entitled to peculiar solemnity and even conclusiveness. That I understand to be the weight of the whole argument in favor of the pending amendment.

Now, sir, it is obvious, I think, or will be on reflection, that the regular decennial apportionment can have no manner of application to the case of a new State. What is the object of that census? It is to ascertain the population of the various States at the time it is taken, with a view to the apportionment at that time of Representatives. That was done almost or quite eight years ago. It is impossible for us to imagine that this decennial census can reach any degree of accuracy, or at least can retain its accuracy for any length of time. But the rule never was applied to the case of a new State; and it is only necessary to look at the manner in which the last apportionment was made to be satisfied of that fact. As I understand the law, a particular number was assumed for the members of the House of Representatives; the House was not to exceed so many members, and that number was apportioned among the States then in the Union. The very principle of that apportionment excludes its application to any new State. It can have no manner of application; and no legitimate argument, in my judgment, can be derived for that census. In fact, sir, in the case of all the new States, we never have attached any importance to the decennial census. I do not mean to say that the ratio ascertained by that act ought not to be regarded, though I say it is not conclusive. But when it is sought from the circumstances of the last census, and from the ratio then ascertained, to carry forward the argument to the point of asserting that the census of Minnesota, taken under the enabling act of the last Congress, stands on the footing of the decennial census, and is entitled to the same controlling force, it seems to me that the inference entirely fails.

Why, sir, not so far as I can ascertain or have ever heard, has there been a census taken in the case of any new State except this one. This is the first instance. We have settled the representation of all the new States before this time without reference to any particular census. I do not mean to say that this census taken in Minnesota ought not to be regarded; but I say that it is not conclusive, and that it does not stand on the same foundation with the regular decennial census. It seems to me, therefore, that the line of argument pursued by the Senator from Virginia, not now in his seat, [Mr. MASON,] and the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] is completely broken by the suggestion of those two facts.

Now, on what principles are we to deal with this discussion? For the first time, so far as I am aware, in an enabling act Congress required a census to be taken in Minnesota. Has that census been truly taken? That is the question. If it has been truly taken it ought to bind us; but here the Committee on Territories—I think a majority of them, certainly several members—have stated to us, that from the evidence in their possession, they are satisfied the census was not a fair one; that in many places the deputy marshals threw the returns into the fire; that in other districts of country they did not pretend to complete them; that in still others they made it a mere formal matter, adding a few names; and the constitutional convention, or rather this double-headed convention in Minnesota, from the information which its members had, and from official documents, I suppose laid before them from the authorities of the Territory or some other sources, arrived at the conclusion that the population of Minnesota was much larger than the official returns of the census showed. I do not presume there can be a reasonable question of that. I think that Minnesota has far more population than would entitle her to two Representatives according to the ratio established by the last census.

My friend, the Senator from Kentucky, thought we ought to regard the fact that our States have been increasing in population since the last census; that we should be entitled to an increased representation; and therefore, we ought to restrain Minnesota. Well, sir, no doubt, in some sections of the Union, there has been an increase of population since the census, and probably a right to an increased representation; but that is not the case in all parts of the Union; I will undertake to say that it is not the case in a majority of the States of the Union. It is not the case with any of the Atlantic States. Their population has decreased since the last census; I do not know but that the population of the State of Ohio has decreased since the last census, in proportion to the whole Union. It has decreased by the emigration westward. Hundreds and thousands of the very persons who have been enumerated in Minnesota, were citizens of the other States; and they aided, when their names were registered in the census, in sending Representatives from other States to the House of Representatives. We ought to consider that the largest proportion of the actual residents of Minnesota are emigrants from the old States; that they are no longer any portion of the political communities to whom representation is assigned, and that many States are having a disproportionate representation in the other House by reason of this very emigration.

There was a little controversy, not an unpleasant one, but a little discussion, between the Senator from Virginia, not now in his seat, and the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. POLK,] the other day, in reference to the character of the population of Minnesota; and it disclosed the difference between the residences of those two Senators. The Senator from Virginia is from an old settled community. My friend, the Senator from Missouri, is from a new country; and he understood much better than the Senator from Virginia what was the character of this population. The great bulk of the settlers of Minnesota—I mean the agricultural portion of them—have gone there for the purpose of clearing their farms and building their cabins. They have not yet taken their wives and their children, because it is not the habit of the agricultural population, at least in the northern and middle States, when they migrate, to take their families with them, until they have provided homes for them. The residence of these people is in Minnesota; they intend that their families shall be there; and it is only because they have not yet fully prepared their homes that their families are not now in them. Yet this census has been taken in such a way as to exclude a large portion of that which will be the population of Minnesota. The Senator from Virginia thought that most of the settlers were young men and unmarried. Probably in the towns that may be true to a great extent; but the character of the agricultural population which migrates to the West is not that. A young farmer marries his wife, and then he goes out to the West to locate his farm.

It seems to me, therefore, that we have no constitutional obligation, as the Senator from Virginia seems to think, at all on the subject, except that we shall not give an undue representation to any State, new or old. We are pursuing the policy which has always been pursued with the new States, looking upon them as rapidly increasing in population, taking notice of the fact that of the families, of the women and children, who will inhabit the State, very few of them are there at present. Congress has always dealt liberally by them; and if Congress does not deal liberally by Minnesota, she will make an exception.

But it is suggested, in addition, that there will be very great injury to the southern section of the Union by giving more than one Representative to Minnesota. I would not allude to this, for I believe I am as little in the habit of alluding to sectional arguments as almost any Senator on the floor, but inasmuch as several gentlemen from the South have alluded to it, I feel at liberty to speak on that point. Now, sir, the Senate has passed a bill for the admission of Kansas into the Union. I do not suppose that any one seriously pretends that there are more than fifty thousand people in Kansas. I doubt if there are. There are certainly not ninety thousand; I think it will not be pretended by any one that there are eighty thousand; yet we give her one Representative in the other House. When we come to the case of Minnesota, we find that she has an actual population, according to this census, of one hundred and fifty thousand, and according to the best evidence we can get showing the insufficiency of this census, and referring, therefore, to other sources of information, her population is brought up to nearly or quite two hundred thousand people; can gentlemen complain of unfairness in allowing her three members? What would be more unfair than that Kansas, if she is to be a slaveholding State, (and I do not care whether she is such or not, if her people wish her to be so,) should be represented in the other House by one Representative, and the great empire of Minnesota be represented only by one? I am no enemy to the extension of the institutions of either section of the Union; I want them to go wherever the people wish to have them; but I object to the Procrustean system, that because one of them is not developed quite as fast as the other, that other shall have this absolute and arbitrary rule applied to her. Minnesota has three times, four times, five times, the population of Kansas, and she ought to have her full representation, and she ought not to be reduced down. My own conclusion is from the information derived from the Committee on Territories, and from other sources, that this census which was ordered to be taken by the enabling act of Congress was never perfectly taken.

Mr. COLLAMER. There was no information whatever before the committee, except the census.

Mr. PUGH. I understood the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. GREEN,] the other day, to state that he had letters and papers in his drawer showing the facts I have stated.

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not know what he has got. The committee had no information on the subject except the census.

Mr. PUGH. The Senator from Missouri was satisfied, and the Senator from Illinois was satisfied, as to the real number of the population, and the imperfection of the census. I take it, their means of information are greater than mine. They correspond with all that I have ever heard as to the population of this new State.

This enabling act has a double aspect. The enabling act is a contract on both sides. When one of the Senators elect from Minnesota presented his credentials, some weeks ago, and demanded to be sworn in, on the ground that Minnesota had complied with the conditions of the enabling act, and was therefore entitled to admission, we rejected his application because there was such informality in the proceedings of the State, that we denied that the contract had been executed on her part. Minnesota had a right to require of us a perfect census. That is a condition which we agreed to perform. We took this census; she did not; we took it by marshals of the United States; it was not her act; and when it is shown to us substantially that, from the lack of proper compensation for our own officers, or from the neglect of our own officers, or from the difficulty of the work to be performed, we on our side have not given Minnesota an honest census, the least we can do is to allow her constitutional convention to act for the present, and then adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. Toombs,] and give her a new census, and apportion her representation finally according to the result of a true census.

These are the reasons which will induce me, as I said before, to vote against every proposition which restricts Minnesota to one Representative. I believe she is fairly entitled to three Representatives, and I shall vote to give her three. If the Senate does not agree to give her three, I shall then vote for two. I shall vote for the most that I can carry. I think she is entitled to the whole three, and I hope the Senate will allow them.

Mr. FITCH. The restriction proposed to be imposed by the amendment is wrong; and I am very sure if the Senator from Virginia knew as much of the population of Minnesota as other Senators do, he never would have moved it. The Senator from Ohio has well said that the defect of the census was our own fault; the fault of the Government. It was entirely so. The enabling act provided, it is true, that a census should be taken; but it provided no means for taking it; and I understand that the convention which framed the constitution now before us, asked that instructions and blanks, and other means for taking the census, might be sent to the Government officers in the Territory; but their request never was complied with. It was utterly impossible, therefore, that any perfect census should be taken. None was taken. One half, or nearly half, the returns are simply estimates made by the assistant marshals in their rooms, without taking the field to ascertain the exact number of inhabitants.

This was well understood by the members of the constitutional convention, and they, consequently, hoping for more correct returns, postponed their own local apportionment until the last moment, until the constitution was framed in other respects, and it became absolutely essential that they should agree on some manner of apportioning the prospective State for its local or State representation. They made this apportionment on knowledge possessed by the members of the convention—members who had come up fresh from every portion of the Territory, and who were infinitely better judges of the amount of population than the deputy marshals, who never went, in several instances, beyond their own dwellings to ascertain the number of inhabitants. The members of the convention made their estimate upon their own personal knowledge, and by comparison of notes on the part of those from different portions of the Territory; and there is a sufficiency of local jealousy there to prevent any one portion of the Territory obtaining any undue influence or advantage in representation over the others. It is known that the constitutional convention consisted, in fact, of two bodies. They had their mutual political as well as local prejudices.

Mr. GREEN. I ask permission of the Senator from Indiana to interrupt him for a moment.

Mr. FITCH. Certainly.

Mr. GREEN. I understood the Senator from

Vermont to express himself as having forgotten that there was any evidence before the committee showing that returns had been burned by deputy marshals, or that any refused to act. I wish to call attention to a letter, a copy of which was sent to us, and was before our committee, previous to the time when this bill was reported. I will read it:

OFFICE OF THE UNITED STATES MARSHAL,
ST. PAUL, MINNESOTA, December 23, 1857.
SIR: I have forwarded to your Department, as by instructions, the census returns of the different counties of the Territory, as they have been received and examined at this office.

No returns have yet been received from the counties of Mower, Waseca, Nicollet, Le Sueur, Sibley, Manomina, Pierce, Cass, Mille Lac, Itasca, Pembina, and a part of Fillmore—nearly one half of the Territory, geographically, and embracing an area of thirty-three thousand two hundred and eighty-six square miles.

Every exertion has been made on my part to get through with the census of the Territory, and report finally upon it before the meeting of Congress. Many causes have operated to produce the delay. The work was commenced too late in the season for a latitude like this, where traveling in the winter over northern prairies is a matter both difficult and hazardous. It was, moreover, very difficult to get proper and competent officers to undertake the work, for the compensation provided by the law of Congress for the census of 1850.

In many counties of large extent and few inhabitants, the compensation will not more than cover, if it does at all, the traveling expenses of the assistants. The expense is necessarily much greater in this Territory than in the States. Several of the assistants who commenced the work, threw it up, some on account of the inadequate compensation, others from sickness and business engagements. The assistant for Sibley county, after being engaged in making the enumeration for more than a month, refused to make his returns, and burned them, rather than the Government should have them for the pay. All of these causes have made my returns backward. I have written, however, and sent to the assistants of the counties not heard from, and appointed new ones in those counties, and will forward returns as soon as they are received and examined. I would respectfully request that an appropriation be made to defray the expense of this census in a more liberal rule than that of 1850.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
WILLIAM R. GERE,
United States Marshal.

Hon. JACOB THOMPSON, Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. COLLAMER. There is no intimation that those returns, so far as they went, were not all good. There were some counties he had not yet finished, several of which he has since returned.

Mr. FITCH. The writer of that letter himself states that there is very little reliance to be placed on the census, and the reason he alleges for an imperfect census should satisfy any one that no reliance can be placed upon it.

Mr. COLLAMER. He does not say that no reliance can be placed upon it.

Mr. FITCH. But there is enough in his letter to warrant our inference that it is entitled to no reliance. The census was imperfectly taken, as the officer under whose direction it was taken informs us. The estimates on which the convention acted were made by representatives from every portion of the Territory, who must be assumed to be acquainted with almost every voter within their several precincts. They had no motive for over-estimating the population; they could have none; and even if a representative in some particular locality in the Territory had such motive, the motive would be suspected, and his action counteracted by jealousy on the part of the representatives from other localities.

It has been my good fortune to have traversed a considerable portion of the Territory at the time this census was being taken; and, therefore, I can speak from personal observation of the manner in which it was taken, and likewise from personal observation of the number of inhabitants in much of the Territory. I know, in the immense districts assigned to the deputy marshals, it would, even if the pay was liberal, have been quite difficult, if not impossible, for them to make the census within the time it was expected. Along the borders of the rivers and the groves the population of a considerable portion of Minnesota is as dense as that of almost any other northwestern State. It is true that there are large districts not yet densely populated; but it is equally true that into those districts the tide of emigration is rapidly setting, and while this bill is under discussion in the Senate, hundreds are being added to the population of that Territory. We may properly make allowance for this increase, therefore, as well as for the population in being at the time the census purports to have been taken.

I remember to have heard it said in the other House some years since by a then Representative from Ohio, that not within his day, or that of the then Delegates from Minnesota, would the Territory contain twenty thousand inhabitants. Well, sir, the prophecy came, I am happy to say, from a member of the Republican party, and it was consequently, from its political source, entitled then to but little credence; and subsequent events have shown that it was no exception to the usual want of reliability upon statements from the same source. That Territory has before it a future, and, indeed, a present, considering its age, of wealth, power, and prosperity, of which any State in the Confederacy might well be proud. It is a future to arise not so much from its broad, fertile prairies; not so much from its numerous lakes and rivers, and its magnificent waterfalls, capable of improvement to an almost illimitable extent, as from the character of its inhabitants. Gentlemen from the northeastern States exult at the gradual and steady relative increase of the Republican vote in their States. I can see a reason for this increase, for the best of their population is rapidly leaving them and finding new homes in Minnesota, and other northwestern States. The population of that Territory is loyal to their government, local and national. It is a law-abiding population, and therein contrasts remarkably with the population which that party, the party represented by gentlemen on this floor from the northeast, are sending for their own political purposes into Kansas. The emigration to Minnesota is a voluntary one. Emigrants go there to seek a new and prosperous home. They are not sent there by politicians for the promotion of the prospects of some political or sectional party; and their conduct when they reach their new homes is that which we would expect of good citizens. They are willing that their own prosperity and that of the land of their new home shall travel along pari passu. They are intelligent, industrious, enterprising; and you find their industry, intelligence, and enterprise directed to legitimate channels of business. They do not go there as politicians, as do many to Kansas, for the promotion of their own political aggrandisement, or the manufacture of political capital for their associates in the States.

I have said it was my fortune to have traversed a considerable portion of that Territory. Its southern portion is, perhaps, with the exception of a few counties, as densely populated as almost any prairie counties in Iowa. One can traverse one week a valley or skirt a grove almost wholly uninhabited, and the next week he would find towns and villages springing up in the same localities. It was asked by the Senator from Massachusetts, the other day, why we should assume a certain amount of population? Simply, because we have no other data than assumption. The same thing was assumed in the instance of California. We have assumed a certain population in Kansas. There was no complete census in either of those cases, as there has been none in the case of Minnesota.

We are compelled, if we would believe the local representatives of the Territory, to credit Minnesota with some two hundred and forty-seven thousand inhabitants, and that, too, was five or six months ago. The intervening time has given opportunity for hundreds, if not thousands, more of inhabitants to pour in there from the adjoining States of Wisconsin and Iowa, and, indeed from more remote localities; for, notwithstanding the close of navigation, it is notorious in the case of Minnesota, as it was in that of Wisconsin, that a heavy overland emigration continues through the winter. I have seen in midwinter, and in the middle of as severe a winter as that climate knows, hundreds of emigrants, some years since, en route for Wisconsin, availing themselves of the very means which would deter, perhaps, those accustomed to a milder climate from traveling at all, namely, the snow and ice, and the facilities these gave for transporting their household gods to their new homes. Emigration continues, and, upon the opening of navigation, it will pour into the Territory to an extent almost incredible to one who has not witnessed it.

I believe the State to be not only entitled in justice, as compared with California and other new States we have admitted, to three Representatives, but I believe them to be absolutely and unqualifiedly entitled to them by their actual amount of population. If we refuse them that number of Representatives, we punish them for our own sin; for the Government failed to provide the means of taking their census, and thus threw them upon their own estimate in fixing their representation. There is no pretense that the census was fully taken. The marshal promises, it is true, to continue the census, and furnish further returns hereafter. He can never do so under the old law.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia, not now in his seat, [Mr. Toombs,] would do the other States ample justice, if they object to three Representatives from Minnesota as an undue representation in the other House, because it would limit that representation to one Congress. That amendment provides for a subsequent census, a new one; and on that census being taken, if the population of the new State is found not to entitle it to three Representatives, it will be perfectly content with whatever a correct census does entitle it to. But, until then, if we err at all—and I acknowledge no error in giving them three—let us err on the side of magnanimity; let us err in giving them what they have claimed, and deem their due, not in adhering to the defective census resulting from our blunders or omissions. Let us not array our ignorance of their population against their knowledge of it.

I sincerely trust the amendment of the Senator from Virginia will not be adopted. It will be doing gross injustice to a people as patriotic, as noble, and as loyal, as any people in this Government.

Mr. COLLAMER. I undertook the other day to explain why, in my view, the second section about which we are talking was inserted in the bill. I have not succeeded in obtaining the attention of many gentlemen to it; but it seems to me that if my view of it is right, this amendment will alter nothing practically. The enabling act, it will be recollected, provided that a census should be taken, if the convention in Minnesota concluded to have a State constitution, and that they were to be entitled to one Representative in Congress, and as many more as that census should show them to be entitled to under the present rule of apportionment. They went on to form a constitution, and the Secretary of the Interior, on being informed that they had resolved to do so, the contingency having then happened which made it his duty to proceed in taking the census, he did proceed to take it. The census had not been wholly returned at the time the question was before the committee. Before the census was taken, it was provided by the eighth section, I think, of the constitution of Minnesota, that they should be entitled to three Representatives in the House of Representatives of the United States, and they directed an election for them to be made.

Now the question arose, if an act were passed simply admitting the State, declaring that it had complied with the conditions of the enabling act, what would be its legal effect? Would it be to carry out the assurances and the terms of the enabling act, such as I have repeated, or would it be, by accepting that constitution and receiving the State, to entitle it to the three Representatives provided for in its constitution? The prevailing opinion with the members of the Committee on Territories was, that if we simply received the State, it would be receiving it with the three members, and the act of admission being the last act of legislation, would entitle them to three. That is still my opinion. I have heard very few gentlemen controvert that opinion in any way.

In order to carry out the assurance contained in the enabling act, and give what was promised to be given, and no more, the second section was put into this bill, by which it is provided that they shall be entitled to one Representative, which every State is entitled to—even Kansas if she is admitted—and as many more as the census shall show them to be entitled to. That is the very language of the enabling act. Its terms are repeated here.

There are many propositions of amendment before the Senate. What the order of them is I do not know; but the first is the proposition of the Senator from Virginia to strike out all of the second section except the part which gives Minnesota one Representative. In the first place, according to my view, that would not alter the effect of the section at all practically, because the second section only gives them more than one, provided, by the census under the present apportionment law, they are entitled to more than one.

Now, how would it be? According to the first returns of the census, the Territory contained one hundred and thirty-two thousand inhabitants. Some more counties have since been returned, making in the whole something like one hundred and thirty-seven thousand; and then computing for those not returned by their votes, the number is brought up to about one hundred and forty-nine thousand—nearly one hundred and fifty thousand by estimation. That being the number, the second section only gives one Representative. It would not give them more than one if there was a population of one hundred and sixty thousand, or even one hundred and seventy thousand. It would give it to them if the present apportionment would entitle them to it; otherwise, it would not. Now I think any gentleman who will examine the subject, will see that that is a thing which cannot, by possibility, be done. The apportionment law is based on the assumption that two hundred and thirty-three members shall compose the House of Representatives, and the direction was that the Secretary of the Interior, on the census coming in, should take the whole Representative number and divide it by two hundred and thirty-three. In this way you get your common numerator. Then he was to take the population of each State, and divide by that numerator, and see how many Representatives it would give to each State. It would in every State leave a fraction. When you had given to each State what it would be entitled to, according to that numerator, you would have some Representatives undisposed of. You might have ten; you might have five; you might have six; you might have three. Whatever number you thus had left, in order to make up the two hundred and thirty-three, was, of course, to be given to those States that had the largest fractions. There might never one be given to a State that had a fraction of seventy thousand. The whole numerator was ninety-three thousand four hundred and twenty. Take each State's population, and divide it by that, and perhaps you would have three left, perhaps five, and you would give them to the five States having the largest fractions; but you might never get down to seventy, sixty, or fifty thousand.

Mr. PUGH. Does not that show that it is impossible to apply any principle derived from that census to the case of Minnesota?

Mr. COLLAMER. I think the Senator will understand me by the time I am through. What I say is this, that if any gentleman will take the census from Minnesota and hand it to the Secretary of the Interior, and tell him to cipher it out by the problem I have stated, no man on earth would ever give anything for the fraction. I think I have demonstrated that it would not be possible to ascertain what fraction could give them one member. Nothing, then, can entitle them to a member except the whole number of the ratio. They are entitled to one member at any rate. If they have sufficient population to entitle them to two members, according to the last apportionment, they will get two by the second section; if they have enough to entitle them to three, they would get three; but a fraction never can give them any. Unless I am exceedingly muddled about it, I think that if any gentleman has listened to my explanation, he will see that it is utterly impossible, taking this census, to give them more than one member. It cannot be done under the terms of the enabling act and the second section of this bill. I say, therefore, striking out the portion of the section now proposed to be stricken out, will make no practical difference whatever. They will have one, and no more than one, member, if the section be passed as it is, or if the amendment of the Senator from Virginia be agreed to.

Now, sir, my idea is that it would be better to keep the section in its present form, because the census is not yet fully completed, and I am willing to let them have two members, if that census, when completed, shall show them to have sufficient population for two members. There is, however, nothing of that kind really expected. I have another reason for preferring to retain the section in its present form, because there is a sort of implied faith in the enabling act. I vote for retaining these words in the section, not because I think they produce any practical effect, but because, as I view it, the enabling act contained a pledged faith on our part, and this is a renege-ment of that assurance. If the census gives them more than one, let them have more, though I think it cannot give it by possibility. I prefer to keep the section as it is; I would not break faith either in words or in hope. I would keep my very words; and, therefore, this section was inserted in the words of the enabling act. I would preserve it in those words, so that there could be no foundation for the complaint that we had changed our position in relation to it.

But other propositions have been made which are a great deal talked about—one by the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. TOOMBS,] and one by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS.] Those propositions, if I understand them, are, in some way or other, to strike out this section and allow three members according to the constitution of Minnesota, or to insert a provision directly allowing three Representatives. That comes to the very point: ought we to give them three Representatives? I can see no foundation for it at all. I do not find fault with gentlemen who, having private information of their own, govern themselves by that information; but when they call on the Senate to act upon it, it seems to me to be entirely a different affair; we are left entirely to conjecture, mere conjecture, mere guess-work. Gentlemen say that the census returns are imperfect. What evidence is there of that? The letter of the marshal has been read, and it contains nothing but an excuse for the time that has been taken and the delay that has happened. He does not intimate that the returns, as far as they are made, are not right, that the census is not perfect enough, as far as it goes, for those counties where it was taken.

Mr. POLK. Does he not say that no census was taken in a region of country covering thirty-two thousand square miles?

Mr. COLLAMER. As has already been shown, we have returns from all the counties but four. When the first returns were made, there were seven or nine counties not heard from. That was when the returns showed one hundred and thirty-two thousand. Since then, returns have come in from some other counties, so that there are only a few left. My answer to the Senator from Missouri, then, is, that if you take the vote of the counties not returned, I do not care how many thousand or million square miles they may cover, and estimate the people by the votes, you will see that they only contain a few thousand to be added to the number returned, and do not make it come up to one hundred and fifty thousand then. Now, in Kansas, when a great complaint was made about an imperfect census, we were told that it was authentic and fair, and we must abide by it, and we were made to abide by it; but when you come to the case of Minnesota why is a different rule insisted upon? Gentlemen think that instead of taking the census they can find some safer guide of duty, some surer path to truth; and where does it lie? One says, take the number of votes returned and multiply it by six. Nothing could be more certain than this. In the first place, gentlemen who know anything about the election in Minnesota, know perfectly well that each party charged the other with importing and manufacturing great numbers of voters. In regard to one county, (Tod county,) where we have actual census returns, and no proof but that they have been fairly made, it is suggested that the gentleman who was appointed to take the census of that county did not live there, but kept a store near it, and the Senator from Missouri presumes that he took the people who came to his store. That is an entire presumption. To take the vote at the election in Minnesota returned in the manner it was, and with all the complaints that we know have been made about it, as a better guide of duty than the census for all the counties for which it is completed and returned, seems to me to be a very strange and a very extraordinary proceeding.

What ground have you for taking the number of votes, and multiplying it by six? Why you should not multiply it by twenty, instead of six, I do not know. Why not multiply it by three, or four, or five? Certain it is that in any new country the proportion of voters to the population is much larger than in an old one; and I know that in the older States with which I am acquainted we never can get out votes more than one to five. We never can get anything near that in the State to which I belong.

Mr. PUGH. The ordinary estimate, as I have always understood, is one to seven.

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not know but that that will do for Ohio.

Mr. PUGH. It will do for Vermont.

Mr. COLLAMER. Our elections do not show it. In the State of New Hampshire the proportion was one to four and a half in the last election. The idea of there being six people in Minnesota to every voter, strikes me as entirely unfounded. The great difficulty is, that you assume as a basis a vote very much questioned by both parties, even supposing the proportion to be good; but that is based entirely upon conjecture. You take one conjecture and multiply it by another conjecture, and you think this is the way to produce a great degree of certainty. It is almost equal to the way in which a man once weighed hogs in a new country. Being without steelyards, he put a large stone on one end of the slab, to balance the hogs at the other, and then he guessed at the weight of the stone. [Laughter.] That is the way in which he got at certainty. So it is here. We are to throw aside the census, and take a conjecture, and then multiply one conjecture by another, and so get certainty. That hardly contains elements of certainty enough for a proposition in algebra, where we deal with uncertain quantities. This is putting too much uncertainty on a matter of this kind. The census returns have been received for nearly all the counties in the Territory; and there is no proof here that those returns were not fairly taken. Estimating the few counties that remain on the most liberal basis, you cannot bring the population of Minnesota above one hundred and fifty thousand. Coming, as I do, from a State which, containing more than three hundred and twenty thousand people, has only three Representatives in the other House, I cannot consent that you shall allow three Representatives to another people having less than half that number, according to the returns.

But, sir, the immediate question before us is the amendment of the Senator from Virginia; and upon that I have said all that I wish to say—that its practical effect will amount to nothing at all. It will still leave the ultimate result the same as if we retain this section in conformity with the enabling act.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not exactly agree with the Senator from Vermont or the Senator from Virginia. Gentlemen all seem to think that it is fair to give this State precisely the same number of Representatives that the old States having an equal population have had under the existing apportionment. I think that if this section, as it is now in the bill, does not accomplish this object, a slight amendment will enable it to do so. The amendment, I would suggest, would be that Minnesota shall have the same number of members as were apportioned to the old States in the last apportionment bill according to numbers.

Mr. COLLAMER. That is the section.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then I know that if they have one hundred and fifty thousand people they are entitled to two members; for with about that number Rhode Island got two members under the last census. As I understand the apportionment law, the ratio is calculated so as to give two hundred and thirty-three members in all, if there were no fractions; and when you come to apportion the members according to the fractions you begin with the State having the largest fraction, and you go down as long as there is any deficiency and supply the number of members. You might go down so that a fraction of thirty thousand would entitle a State to a member if that was the largest fraction that was left before you absorbed the overplus members. What I want to do, and what I think is fair, is to provide that this State shall be entitled to as many members as any old State with the least fraction for which a member was given. As to the idea of fixing three members arbitrarily, I think you might as well say fourteen. There is no reason, no justice, no propriety, in giving them three members unless they are entitled to three. If they are entitled to three, I would allow them that number; but to assume that a State which according to its census, estimating the counties not heard from, can only show at most one hundred and fifty thousand people, shall have three members and allow them three now, and then to go on next year or the year after and take the census to see if they cannot make out sufficient for that number, is wrong in principle, is unjust to the old States, and I think is a pretty hard infraction of the Constitution itself. I should like to see the clause so amended that this State shall be put on an equality with the most favored States, and have two members, provided its fraction is as large as that of any of the old States that has a member for a fraction. With that modification I am certain she would get all she is entitled to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The disposition seems very general to deal liberally with Minnesota. I participate in that feeling, and am disposed to deal liberally with her; but there is a right and a wrong to this question, and it seems to me that there is no difficulty in determining where the right lies, and where the wrong exists. This State is in an anomalous condition at best. She started out, as we are all aware, by holding two conventions to form a constitution. After getting over that difficulty, she has for the last four months had a State Legislature in session, elected under this constitution. They have been passing laws for the last four months, and those laws have been approved by a territorial Governor—a very singular state of things—part State and part Territory; the Legislature a State Legislature, elected under a State constitution; and the Governor approving the laws a territorial Governor appointed by the President of the United States. This is a very strange state of things.

Mr. POLK. The gentlemen will allow me to ask who is the territorial Governor that is approving laws?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. Chase, I believe is his name, Secretary of the Territory and acting Governor in the absence of the Governor. I may not be correct in regard to the name, but that is my recollection.

Mr. POLK. The actual Governor is not there.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. Medary is not there; but the law provides, in regard to all Territories that, in the absence of the Governor, the Secretary shall perform his duties, and be Governor ex officio for the time being. That is the condition of things there. I do not propose to interfere with that state of things. I do not know that there is any great trouble growing out of it in Minnesota, though I apprehend that there may be future difficulties arising from this anomalous condition of affairs. It certainly is an irregularity, and shows that the legislation of Congress, in regard to the Territories, has not been what it ought to be; and never, until Congress assumes its proper control over the Territories of the United States, and treats them as Territories subject to the laws of Congress, will you have anything but disorder and confusion in the Territories of the United States. The idea that a Territory can be an independent government and possess sovereign power, and that there is any such thing as territorial sovereignty, independent of the action of Congress, is utterly inconsistent with the government of Congress over the Territories, and will breed confusion so long as it is adhered to. I hope all future enabling acts will provide that the Territories shall not assume to act as States until Congress has admitted them. Congress has authority to admit new States, but it has a discretion on the subject; and until a State is admitted it is nothing but a Territory, and has no right to assume to act as a State. All this legislation in Minnesota, under authority partly State and partly territorial, I apprehend would be held to be a nullity before any court in Christendom.

But, sir, I did not rise to speak in regard to that matter. The question now is as to how many Representatives in Congress the State of Minnesota shall be entitled to. There ought to be no difficulty about that. It is proposed here by some that she shall have three. What is the rule by which you determine the representation in Congress from any State in this Union? You determine it according to population. That is the constitutional mode of doing it. You take a census every ten years for the purpose of determining it. Here is a new State coming into the Union between two decennial periods, and in order to determine her representation, a census is directed to be taken of her population. I am in favor of basing her representation upon her census. It is the constitutional mode, to begin with; it is the legal mode; the mode provided by Congress.

But we are told we should depart from that, and give to this State three Representatives. I would ask some of the Senators who have argued in favor of allowing her three Representatives (and I will allude in a moment to the ground on which they assume to say that Minnesota is entitled to three) to recollect that the great State of Iowa, lying right by the side of Minnesota, according to a census taken, I think, in 1855, had some six hundred thousand people, and has probably eight hundred thousand people to-day. She polled more than ninety thousand votes at the presidential election in 1856. How many members has she in the House of Representatives? Two; and you propose here to give to the new State of Minnesota, with one hundred and fifty thousand population at the outside, by the census, and with a vote of forty thousand at most, with less than half the votes that Iowa gave in 1856, at the presidential election, three members, and leave Iowa with but two.

Sir, do the people of Minnesota ask any such thing? I apprehend that the sense of justice will be too strong in Minnesota itself to ask for such a thing. They mistook their population when they set up the claim for three Representatives, as is often the case in a new country. We know how desirous people emigrating to a new country are to build up towns and cities, and create the impression that the country is growing. Generally, many persons go to better their fortunes; they are dealers in real estate, who deal in the buying and selling of town lots. The tendency is to magnify the population in all new countries; but I apprehend that when the honest citizens of Minnesota come to see that they have but one hundred and fifty thousand population, or forty thousand voters if you please, they will not ask to have three Representatives, when the great State of Iowa, with more than double their voting population, and four or five times their actual population, has but two. Is that just to Iowa? Is it just to any of the States of the Union to give three Representatives to such a population as this?

But, sir, this mode of computing the population upon the votes is utterly fallacious; and I was astonished that the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. POLK,] with the knowledge which I presume he has, and all of us have, who have read the newspapers, and who are at all acquainted with the condition of things in Minnesota, should have made a calculation based upon the votes given at the election there, when it is notorious throughout this land that the grossest frauds and manufacturing of votes are charged to have been made in this Territory of Minnesota. Why, sir, subsequently to the election, agents were sent out from St. Paul, who traversed the remote parts of the Territory, where hundreds of votes were returned, and they reported that there was not a tenth part of the population, men, women, and children, in those counties, as there had been votes returned. These facts were published in the papers of St. Paul; I do not vouch for their truth; but I am replying to the assumption that there are forty thousand legal voters there. That is denied; there has been a contest as to who has been elected Governor of the new State. Now, sir, we have but one certain and safe rule, and that is to go by the census. That is the legal, that is the constitutional mode of determining how many Representatives the people of Minnesota are entitled to.

As I am on my feet, I wish to call attention to the constitution of Minnesota. I do not know that it is a question that we can inquire into; probably the Committee on Territories have had their attention turned to it; but I have received this morning a letter from a member of the Senate of the present Legislature of Minnesota now in session, which was in session when this letter was written—for I believe it was then about to adjourn—stating to me (and I have not had time carefully to examine the constitution to see how the fact is) that this constitution provides no limitation for the term of service of members of its House of Representatives; that they are elected without determining how long they shall hold. He says that the term of office of the Senators is fixed at two years, I think, but that the members of the House are elected indefinitely, or for life, as he expresses it, and that some of them pretend to claim that they are Representatives for an indefinite period; as long as they think proper to hold. I do not know that Congress would be authorized to reject the constitution for that reason;

but it certainly would be a very objectionable feature.

Mr. PUGH. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Certainly.

Mr. PUGH. If the Senator had done me the honor to listen to me, I stated that fact to the Senate in the speech which I made on the admission of Kansas. I said that, under the present constitution of Minnesota, the House of Representatives had been chosen for life, and had been chosen before the constitution went into effect; and that the constitution itself was ratified by the people by a vote exactly like the vote taken in Kansas on the 21st of December. I think he has hardly studied the constitution of Minnesota as thoroughly as I did.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am not disposed to discuss over again the Kansas question. I did not listen to the Senator from Ohio, and was not aware that he had stated this fact. It seems that such is the fact. He, I presume, has examined the constitution with regard to it. I said it was so stated to me by a correspondent; but not having had time carefully to examine the constitution, I did not know how it really was.

Mr. PUGH. It is evidently an omission in the constitution. There is no limitation of the terms of the Representatives, and there would be none of the Senators, except for the fact that there is a general provision that whenever a census is taken, either by the United States or by the State, the seats of all the Senators shall be vacated. If it were not for that, the Senators would be chosen for life also.

Mr. SIMMONS. How are you going to remedy it?

Mr. PUGH. Let them amend their constitution.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I apprehend, if the constitution were of such a character that it was not republican, (I am not prepared to say exactly what a republican constitution is,) we could not with propriety admit Minnesota into the Union at all, under this constitution. I will not undertake to say, however, that that omission, as it undoubtedly must have been, in the constitution, to provide for the term of service of the members of the House of Representatives, makes it anti-republican. It doubtless should be remedied in some way. Public sentiment will correct it, I presume, and the Legislature doubtless will pass a law to meet the case. I am not aware that they have done so, though, during their four months' session. I apprehend not, from the letter which I this morning received from that country.

Having said this much, I think it is very clear that, while we should be disposed to do justice to Minnesota, and make a liberal allowance to her, we should not do injustice to other States lying alongside of her, by giving her twice the Federal representation in the councils of the nation which is given to States twice as populous as she is.

Mr. WILSON. I thought, Mr. President, from the remarks which fell this morning from the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. FITCH,] that some of us were to be held as having adopted an illiberal policy toward this new State. Now, sir, I wish to say that I am willing to deal liberally with the State of Minnesota, and to give her the full advantage of all the population she has got. The Senator from Indiana tells us that she is peopled to a great extent by emigrants from my section of the country, and that they compose the best portion of her population. Well, Mr. President, all I have to say to that is simply this: that our population is all good, all law-abiding; and those who have gone to Minnesota from New England, I have no doubt, inherit all the virtues of the population they have left, and that they have carried to Minnesota that feeling which pervades the section of country where they were reared—of obedience to law, and of devotion to liberty protected by law.

But, sir, the Senator could not let this question pass without giving a fling at those from our section of country who have found homes in the new Territory of Kansas. Before those who have left New England, and reside now in Kansas, are denounced as violators of the law, it might be well to prove to the Senate and the country that a single man who ever went to that Territory from New England, has violated the laws of that Territory, or the laws of the country, or ever been prosecuted or punished for anything of that kind. We have heard a great deal about Jim Lane from the other side of the Chamber; but I believe he comes from the Senator's State of Indiana; and the President of the United States calls him a tumultuous sort of character, a rebellious man; but these charges are fixed on no New England man in that Territory individually.

Mr. FITCH. With the Senator's permission, I will remark that Jim Lane, like many gentlemen from New England, left his country for his country's good. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILSON. The Senator from Indiana, I think, is sometimes in error, and he is in great error in this case. There are less inhabitants in Kansas from New England than is generally understood, and they are almost all of them young educated men from New England—a better class of population than has generally gone from New England to any western State; and I think the western Senators will all bear evidence that the general character of the population from our section of the country who have gone into their States has been tolerably respectable.

Mr. PUGH. There are some very good ones in Ohio, and some bad ones.

Mr. WILSON. There is no doubt of it. Now I wish to say, in regard to this matter of Minnesota, that I do not agree with anybody, on either side of the Chamber, that we should adopt any little technical rules to govern our action. We have complained of technicalities from your side of the Chamber. We had better keep clear of them ourselves on this. When we passed the Minnesota enabling act, we provided for taking a census of the new State. We undertook to do it. The evidence is not officially before us, but it is sufficient to show clearly that we have failed to do it. We have evidence that we can rely upon, from the intelligent men of the country, that we, the Government of the United States, which undertook to take the census in the Territory of Minnesota, have failed to complete a perfect census. The responsibility is ours, and it does not attach to the people of that Territory, and they should not have the disadvantage of it.

But I see no evidence on earth that they are entitled to three members. I believe they have population enough to entitle them to two members. I have not a doubt of it in my own judgment, knowing what I do of that Territory. But, sir, in order to reach that matter properly, I think we should adopt what is fair and just towards Minnesota, and towards all the States of the Union, and that is to admit Minnesota into the Union with one member, the constitutional number that all the States are entitled to, and then put a provision in this bill that the Secretary of the Interior shall now forthwith take the census of this Territory, and that the people of Minnesota shall have the full benefit of their whole population just as soon as that census can be taken. It can be taken in a few months, and they can elect one, two, or three additional members and send them into the present Congress, and I am in favor of giving it to them. I do not want to stand on any little technicalities or any little forms in regard to this matter. We have repudiated all of them, as we ought to do, in regard to Kansas; and we should do so in regard to Minnesota, as we should do in regard to any new Territory that comes here and asks admission into the Union. When we can reach the matter, I propose to offer an amendment to carry out this idea, providing that she shall come in with one Representative now; that the census shall be taken as provided for in the act of February 26, 1857; and that she shall have the full and entire benefit of her whole population, as she ought to have in estimating the number of her Representatives.

Mr. POLK. I desire to add a few words to what was said by the Senator from Ohio on this subject, which may be an answer to what has been said by some other Senators this morning. I think, first, it is conceded that the census that has been attempted to be taken is imperfect on its very face; for it shows that there are counties in this Territory in which there has been no attempt to take a census. Now, I say that if you begin to apply the hard, strict law to the case, the very first step you take shows that you are doing injustice to this new State. I ask Senators if it is fair and equal to this new State to confine her in her representation to the population that is shown by a census, when, on the face of the paper itself, it appears that there are counties in which a census has never been taken at all.

I call the attention of the Senate to a further fact. It seems to me that the letter which has been read from the officer who took the census is perfectly satisfactory to every candid mind that in the counties in which a census is pretended to have been taken, it was taken under such circumstances that no man can rely on it as showing the true population of Minnesota. Why, sir, he tells us that in a district of country covering thirty-two thousand four hundred square miles, (and in that space several of the small States might be set down,) no census has been taken at all. Here is a State that comes asking for admission into the Union, and claims a representation according to her population, and you say the number she shall have in the lower House shall be determined by the population shown by the census, when the very officer under whose control that census was taken tells you that upwards of thirty-two thousand square miles of the territory covered by that proposed State has never had a census taker's track upon the soil!

In addition to that, the same officer tells you that in many instances there was no attempt to take a census, because there was no adequate compensation provided for the officers; that in some instances the papers were burnt up. Now, I say, if you look to that census, it seems to me no fair minded man can for a moment entertain the belief that justice can be done to this new State in its representation, if you make that the basis on which you are to estimate the amount of political power she shall have. Does not justice require that you should look further? Is not the population in that Territory entitled to representation? Especially are not the men who are able to vote there, entitled to representation? When I was on the floor before, I referred to the case of one county as an illustration of the manner in which this census was taken. The Senator from Vermont answers it by saying it is but conjecture to suppose that the individual who lived in another county took only such names as were brought to him in his store. I suppose that the very fact that the census taker did not live in the county is the strongest prima facie evidence that that census taker did not do his duty in taking the population of the county. Why take a man who does not live in the county, and especially when we know the fact that the compensation was such as not to justify the man in doing the work, the pay being per capita?

Now, Mr. President, is it not a little hard to say to this new State, seeking admission into the Union, that we will hold you down to a census, which census is imperfect in the particulars to which I have called the attention of the Senate, and for the reason that the officers were not adequately paid! They were not adequately paid because Congress did not make a proper appropriation in that respect. We made a provision which does not enable them to have a fair census; and yet we say they shall be bound to the strictness and severity of that law, in fixing her representation in the lower House.

One Senator says shall we give Minnesota a representation that she does not ask? I answer no; I say that Minnesota asks for this representation in the most solemn manner in which that claim can be presented to the Congress of the United States. In her constitution she asks for three members in the lower House. The very instrument that organized her government proposed to organize that government with that representation. I say, therefore, that the claim of Minnesota is not to be resisted by saying that she does not ask for three Representatives, especially when we have before us her constitution with the demand solemnly preferred for that number.

But it is said that Minnesota is under a mistake. On what is that founded? Have we any evidence that Minnesota is under a mistake? Sir, this representation is claimed for her by a convention which consisted of representatives of the people from every part of the Territory. There were men there from the thirty-two thousand square miles in which no census was taken. Those men knew what was the condition of the population in those counties. Minnesota not only in her constitution asks for three Representatives, but she fixes her own representation in her own local Legislature upon the same basis, as I am told, and as has been said here by a Senator on this floor, who has a personal knowledge of the facts pertaining to the formation of the State government of Minnesota. On the very same basis does she ask for representation to the amount of three members in the lower House of Congress, that she fixes her own representation upon.

Then it is said that there were frauds in the elections of Minnesota. Well, sir, frauds may have been charged; but is there any evidence here that there has been anything fraudulent in the proceedings in Minnesota? At all events, is there anything upon which such a suggestion as that can be based that is sufficient to override the glaring imperfections in taking the census in that proposed new State? I pass that by.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from Missouri would allow me, I should like to inquire of him here whether he thinks it would be fair to give Minnesota a larger representation than Iowa, which has more than double its population, according to any estimate of votes or anything else?

Mr. POLK. I was about to say a word on that subject. I answer that by saying, that because Iowa may not have as much representation in the other House as Minnesota will get if we admit her with three members, that is no reason why Minnesota should not have her three members if she has the population, as I contend she has, that justly entitles her to three members.

I instanced the other day the case of my own State of Missouri. We have but seven Representatives in the other House of Congress. If there were a census taken to-day in Missouri, properly, correctly, taken, I believe Missouri would be entitled to two additional Representatives—certainly to one. I believe that if we admit Minnesota with three Representatives, she may have comparatively more political power than my own State or the State of Iowa; but will she have anything like as much as many of those States from which most of her population has emigrated? There is the point where the inequality arises; this population in Minnesota is not her natural increase since the last census; nor is it entirely a population that is made up by foreign immigration from abroad. It is mainly a population that has gone into that new Territory from the other States, and these other States have already a representation in the other branch of Congress based on that very population. That population has ceased to be on the soil of the old States, and has gone into this new State of Minnesota. Now that they are citizens of Minnesota with new homes, with new interests, with new political rights, with new associations, with new prospects, and new hopes, new in all respects in their locality, shall they be unrepresented in Minnesota, and Massachusetts, Vermont, New Hampshire, and all the other States from which they have gone, have a representation based on them after they have left the territory of those States?

Mr. WILSON. I think the Senator is somewhat mistaken in his calculations. In the first place, the emigration that goes to the western country from our section of the Union is our surplus of population. We have a large immigration into our part of the country. My own State, from 1850 to 1855, held her full ratio of increase, and a ratio of increase above the average of the United States. She added one hundred and fifty thousand to her population in those five years.

Mr. POLK. It may be that I was wrong in putting Massachusetts in that category. I have not looked at the census, nor am I familiar with the facts there; but I know that it is true in regard to many of the States. I made this reference to individual States merely for the purpose of illustrating a principle, which principle, I undertake to say, we must all be convinced, is beyond all question. One thing is certain, that there are very many persons in Minnesota, and I undertake to assert three fourths of the population of that State, who have emigrated from other States, when they had theretofore already been enumerated as constituting the basis of representation in the States from which they went. There is the point of the inequality and injustice. Minnesota may get the representation that in justice she is entitled to, but other States have a political power in one branch of this Government for a population that is actually in Minnesota. Minnesota does not get it, but other States do get it. Now, I say, give it to the people who reside there, and let them have the political power that a State with from two hundred and fifty to three hundred thousand population is entitled to have.

I ask Senators only to look at the fact that here is a census, a pretended census, in the taking of which not a single individual, not a man, woman, or child, was enumerated in a space of country upwards of thirty-two thousand square miles in extent, and you say that the State shall be bound down to such a census as that. I undertake to say that Minnesota, if she is to come here with one Representative, comes in with injustice done her in the very act of admission; and that, too, when we know that her population, as the Senator from Ohio well said, and as the Senator from Indiana also repeated, is increasing constantly in a ratio, perhaps, that is unparalleled in any new State in the Union.

I will merely add, Mr. President, in regard to Iowa and my own State—and there are other States probably in the same category that we are, in the misfortune of not being able to do justice to Iowa and Missouri, because we have to wait for the expiration of the decade before a new census can be taken—it is unfortunate that Iowa has less of political power than she ought to have; it is unfortunate that Missouri has less of political power than she ought to have in comparison to other States; but I say that is no reason why Minnesota should be put in the same category with those two States, and be compelled to lie under the same injustice of insufficient representation, until a new census can be taken.

Now, Mr. President, I am not in favor of the suggestion, as the best suggestion, offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, though that is better than the section as it will stand if it should be amended in the way now proposed. I am in favor of the suggestion made by the Senator from Georgia, and I shall move the amendment which he suggested after the vote on this amendment shall be taken, if it shall be voted down; that is, to give Minnesota her three Representatives now, making provision, at the same time, for taking the new census, and giving to the officers sufficient pay to justify them in doing the work; and then, if it shall turn out that her population does not entitle her to three, give her two, or any less number that her population may show to be her due. But, sir, I have no kind of doubt in my own mind that, if the amendment to which I call attention shall pass, Minnesota will never be represented in the other branch of this Government by less than three Representatives; on the contrary, I believe she will retain her three, and by the time the general census is taken at the commencement of the next decade, she will be entitled to four, and perhaps more than that. I do not wish to detain the Senate, and I am willing that the vote should be taken, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. JONES. As Iowa has been referred to in this debate, and allusion has been made to her representation in Congress, I desire to say that my colleague, at an early day of the session, introduced a resolution which has been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, instructing that committee to report a bill to give to the new States which have increased in population since the last census the representation to which they would be entitled in Congress according to that increase. The reason of my colleague for offering the resolution was, that he was apprised of the fact that great injustice was done to our State and other new States which have not got the representation to which they are entitled. The Judiciary Committee, I believe, has never made any report on the subject. We, in Iowa, know that we have not justice under the existing law, and we cannot have it until the law be changed. We have a population of between six hundred thousand and seven hundred thousand, and yet we have only two Representatives in the other House. Though we know that justice is withheld from us, we are not willing, at least I, as one of the Senators from Iowa, am not willing, to see Minnesota deprived of what she is entitled to.

Mr. POLK. I should like to know of the Senator from Iowa what was the population of his State when it was admitted into the Union?

Mr. JONES. I do not recollect.

Mr. HARLAN. It was one hundred and ninety-two thousand.

Mr. POLK. Did she get two Representatives on that basis?

Mr. HARLAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. POLK. It strikes me that that is the strongest argument which can be made in favor of Minnesota. Iowa was admitted with two Representatives, when she had a population of one hundred and nine-two thousand, and now her population would entitle her to four or five Representatives.

Mr. JONES. Sir.

Mr. PUGH. The population of Iowa, at the time of her admission, was one hundred and ninety-two thousand two hundred and fourteen.

Mr. BROWN. What was the ratio of representation then?

Mr. PUGH. She had enough for two members, and a small fraction.

Mr. POLK. Iowa only got two members then, and she would be entitled now, according to a fair census, to five or six.

Mr. JONES. Western members of Congress know the great difficulties which we encounter in those newly-settled countries, in obtaining a full census of the people. It is out of the question to get it. I know that, at the last census taken in Iowa, some counties were entirely left out, and that is considered an old State in comparison with Minnesota. I am certain that a great deal of the population of Minnesota could not have been taken, even if the marshals had done their utmost. The difficulty of taking the population in that country is much greater than it is even in my own State. The country is much more difficult to get through. They have no railroads, and very few stage routes; and it is a difficult country to travel in. I believe it is better to do a little too much for a new country like Minnesota, than to do too little for her. The interests of new States, such as Minnesota will be, and Iowa is, cannot be properly attended to in Congress by their limited number of Representatives. It is utterly impossible for the Representatives of those States to do all the business which is confided to them. The people of those States have an immense quantity of business to be attended to in the various Departments of the Government, as well as in Congress. Sir, it is an old maxim that it is better ninety-nine guilty men should go unpunished than one innocent man suffer. I think it is better to do a great deal too much for a new State just coming into the Union, that has a great many difficulties to encounter, than to do too little. I do not believe my constituents will blame me for doing so; but if they do, they will have to help themselves; they cannot get over it. I hope the greatest amount of representation proposed will be given to Minnesota.

Mr. HARLAN. I am willing to vote for as large a representation for the proposed State of Minnesota as she is entitled to by any fair estimate of her present population, and no more. I am willing to vote her a Representative even for a fraction of the ratio, if, by some general understanding among Senators here, the other new States may have their representation increased in a like proportion. I find, by a hasty estimate picked up here in the Senate Chamber from members of the Senate from various States west of the Mississippi river and northwest of the Ohio river, certain facts which I will present to the Senate. In the State of Missouri, according to an estimate made by the Governor of that State in his recent message, there are nearly a million of people with a representation in the other House of seven members, giving each Representative a constituency of one hundred and forty-two thousand eight hundred and fifty-seven. In the State of Iowa, we doubtless now have a population of seven hundred thousand, with two Representatives, giving to each member from that State a constituency of three hundred and fifty thousand. In the State of Wisconsin, I have been told by one of her Senators, the population is estimated at seven hundred thousand. She has a representation of three members, giving to each Representative a constituency of two hundred and thirty-three thousand three hundred and thirty-three. In the State of Arkansas, I have been informed by a Senator from that State, they believe themselves to have a population of five hundred thousand, and they have two Representatives, giving to each a constituency of two hundred and fifty thousand. In the State of Michigan, the Senators estimate a population of eight hundred thousand; and they have four members of Congress, giving two hundred thousand people to each Representative. The State of Texas is supposed to have a population of seven hundred thousand, and she has two Representatives; being three hundred and fifty thousand to each member from that State. California has probably a population of seven hundred thousand, with two members; being three hundred and fifty thousand to each. Even in the State of Ohio, I notice that the Governor states the population to be two million four hundred thousand; and she having twenty-one members in Congress, they have a constituency of one hundred and fourteen thousand to each member. In the State of Indiana, the senior Senator informs me they had, in 1855, a population of one million three hundred thousand, and he thinks it may be very safely stated now at one million four hundred thousand; and, having eleven Representatives, this basis gives to each a constituency of one hundred and twenty-seven thousand two hundred and seventy-two. In the State of Illinois the population is one million five hundred thousand, with nine members; being a population of one hundred and sixty-six thousand six hundred and sixty six to each member.

This gives an average constituency to each Representative from that part of the Union of one hundred and sixty-five thousand and seventy-nine for each of the sixty-three Representatives in Congress from those States. I suppose from this estimate, that Minnesota would not be entitled to more than one member, nor do I believe that her people will increase in a more rapid ratio than Missouri or Iowa or Illinois or Wisconsin. If there can be some general understanding that the representation in Congress shall be increased from all these new States, according to the ratio of 1850, then I am willing to commence the correction now, by giving Minnesota something more than she would otherwise be entitled to according to this estimate. There are now west of the Mississippi river and northwest of the Ohio river, according to these rough estimates, ten million four hundred thousand people, with but sixty-three Representatives in Congress. According to the ratio of 1850, they would be entitled to one hundred and eleven members, which would give them an additional representation from the new States of forty-eight. If we can all share in this increase according to our present population, I am willing to commence making the correction with Minnesota; otherwise I am not. I indorse every word that my colleague has said in relation to the feeling of the people of Iowa on this subject. We feel that our interests are greatly prejudiced by the smallness of our representation. It is impossible to district the State of Iowa in such a way as to give the people of that State a fair representation in Congress. I think it can be done much more readily in Minnesota than in Iowa, for her people are all of them, or nearly all of them, on what may be styled the Mississippi slope of that Territory; in Iowa they are extended over a much larger area of country, with diversified interests.

I close by stating, as I said in the outset, that if there can be some general understanding by which there shall be an increase of representation to the new States, according to their present population, upon the ratio of representation fixed by Congress in 1850, I am willing to be liberal in awarding a representation to Minnesota. But it is clear, I think, that one Representative would be her full proportion, according to the present basis of representation in Congress from the western and northwestern States. Hence, if restricted to the strict letter of the apportionment law, she will secure more than would be awarded by strict justice.

Mr. POLK. It has already been said that when Iowa was admitted, she had a population of one hundred and ninety-two thousand. I am told that her vote at that time was eighteen thousand, which would be something like one voter to every eleven of the population. If you apply that proportion to Minnesota, where the voters are forty thousand, it would give you a population of four hundred and forty thousand. I wish merely to add, that when Iowa was admitted, she was admitted on a representation that was fully proportioned to the amount of population that she then had. Iowa now has not a full representation, because she has been growing; but when Minnesota comes to ask admission into the Union, shall she not have the same justice meted to her that was meted to Iowa, and to Missouri, and to Arkansas, and to Texas, when they came into the Union? That is the way, it seems to me, in which the Senate ought to look at it, not in the way the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HARLAN] seems disposed to look at it. When Iowa was admitted, she had one standard of justice applied to her. When Minnesota comes to be admitted, let us in justice and fairness apply the same standard to her. The misfortune is, that Missouri, and Iowa, and Texas, and other States, stand in a position in which you cannot do justice to them; but because you cannot do justice to them now, I think that ought to be no reason why injustice should be done to Minnesota. On the contrary, it seems to me that we ought to deal by Minnesota just exactly as all these States were dealt by at the time when they were admitted into the Union.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The honorable Senator from Mississippi, whom I do not now see in his seat, [Mr. BROWN,] on Thursday last raised an objection to the constitution of Minnesota because it provided that persons of foreign birth, who had not yet become naturalized citizens of the United States, should be entitled to vote in that new State. I deny, in the first place, Mr. President, the right of this body to look into the constitution of a State to examine its provisions on that subject. I answer this objection for another reason, that the constitution of the State which I, in part, represent, contains a similar provision, and I therefore could not suffer the objection to pass unnoticed. It is a matter not within the province of Congress. It belongs to each State to determine who shall be its voters.

The bill before the Senate copies in the second section the very language of the enabling act. I think it is safe to follow it, and for one, I am disposed to sustain the bill as reported by the committee. I have no objection, however, to the amendment which has been suggested by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts. I think, indeed, it is just but that that amendment should be adopted. It seems to be conceded upon all hands that the census, which was taken in Minnesota, was altogether imperfect. The enabling act provided that she should have as many Representatives as her population should entitle her to on the present ratio of representation. If we should leave the matter to stand upon that act as it is, the question will be settled by the House of Representatives; the three persons who, it is said, have been elected to that House from Minnesota, will apply for admission, and the House will pass upon the fact whether the population of Minnesota entitles her to three Representatives in the present Congress. If, however, as is contended, this census be incorrect, the amendment which has been offered by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts provides for its correction by requiring the Secretary of the Interior immediately to cause the census of Minnesota to be taken; and then when it shall appear what the true census of that State is, they shall be entitled to their representation upon the present ratio; that is to say, one member for every ninety-three thousand four hundred and twenty inhabitants. I shall, therefore, favor the addition of this amendment at the end of the second section. I am opposed to the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia, to strike out the latter portion of the section.

The question being taken by yeas and nays on Mr. Mason's amendment, resulted—yeas 8, nays 41; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Biggs, Broderick, Clay, Fitzpatrick, Henderson, Houston, Hunter, and Yulee—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Bell, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Evans, Fessenden, Fitch, Foster, Green, Gwin, Hale, Hamlin, Hammond, Harlan, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, King, Mallory, Pearce, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Simmons, Slidell, Stuart, Trumbull, Wade, Wilson, and Wright—41.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILSON. As I believe it is now in order, I offer the amendment which I send to the Chair.

Mr. POLK. I ask the Chair whether the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia on last Thursday has not priority?

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Briggs in the chair.) It was not in order at that time to offer it. The question now recurs on the motion of the Senator from Illinois to strike out the whole section. It is in order, before that motion is put, to perfect the section.

Mr. WILSON. I gave notice of my intention to move an amendment, and the Senator from Georgia also gave notice of an amendment. I believe mine comes first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is in order to perfect the section before the vote is taken on striking it out entirely. The motion of the Senator from Massachusetts is in order. The Clerk will read the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The Clerk read the amendment, which is, at the end of section two, to insert:

And the Secretary of the Interior shall cause the census of said State to be taken forthwith, according to the provisions of the act of February 26, 1857, and report the same as soon as practicable.

Mr. PUGH. It will still be in order to strike out the entire section, or to strike out and insert.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Certainly.

Mr. PUGH. This is only to perfect the section. I shall vote for this amendment, reserving the right to vote to strike out the whole section and insert the provision suggested by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. POLK. I give notice that I shall offer, as soon as it can be done, the amendment presented by the Senator from Georgia on Thursday last.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That was a proposition to strike out the whole section, and insert another provision. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WILSON. I will not detain the Senate, but I wish simply to say that I think if this amendment be adopted and sustained by the Senate, it will accomplish all that is fair and just. It gives Minnesota one Representative according to the Constitution of the United States, and it instructs the Secretary of the Interior immediately to take the census of the Territory, and then it gives Minnesota the full and entire benefit of her whole population. She can then elect such number of additional Representatives as she will be entitled to according to her population. We have undertaken to take the census by the enabling act. We have confessedly failed. I think we owe it to Minnesota to take the census now, and let her have the full and entire benefit of it. I hope the amendment will be sustained.

Mr. IVERSON. I desire that the amendment which my colleague offered the other day may be read for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will read the amendment, of which notice was given by the Senator from Georgia that he would propose when in order.

The Clerk read the amendment suggested by Mr. TOOMBS, which is to strike out the second section after the enacting clause, and insert:

That the said State shall be entitled to three Representatives until the census authorized to be taken by the act of the 26th of February, 1857, shall be again correctly taken and returned, and then she shall be entitled to as many Representatives as the present ratio of representation will entitle her to on her population thus ascertained; and that the Secretary of the Interior shall take all proper measures to renuke a perfect census of said State, and return the same as soon as it can conveniently be done.

Mr. IVERSON. I prefer the amendment which my colleague has offered to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts. I presume the effect, so far as the number of Representatives is concerned, will be about the same; but the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts will refer the election back to the people. I have no doubt they have population enough, or will have, by the time the census is taken, to entitle them to three Representatives under the present ratio. The effect, however, will be that there will be a new election in Minnesota for three members, and I apprehend our friends on the other side of the Chamber think they will stand a better chance to get three of their own stripe in. I presume that is the whole policy of this amendment. If we are to have three members from Minnesota, as I have no doubt they will be entitled to three when the census is taken, I prefer to have the three already electd. Let us take them, and then direct a census of the people of Minnesota to be taken, and when the true number is ascertained, fix permanently by their representation in the other House. I would rather take the three now than run the risk of taking three others hereafter.

Mr. WILSON. I think the Senator's imaginings are not correct. He says he has no doubt that they will have population enough for three Representatives. He has no evidence of that character. Now, sir, this amendment gives them one Representative. They have elected three. I take it that one of them will immediately come in on the admission of the State. If this amendment be adopted the population will be taken, and they will elect the additional members, whether they be one, two, or three. This is doing equal and exact justice, justice to Minnesota, justice to all. What the political complexion of the men to be elected will be, I take it is not for us here to settle or to decide. But, sir, this proposition to admit three Representatives on a population returned of one hundred and forty-six thousand, and then to take the census, seems to me to be unjust, unfair in every aspect—a proposition that no fair-minded man can sustain.

Mr. IVERSON. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am reluctant to detain the Senate by offering any remarks on this subject, but I deem it proper to say a very few words in explanation of my own course on this occasion. I discover that there is a general feeling in the Senate to extend all possible favors to the new States which make application for admission into the Union. I am very anxious to extend to them every favor and every consideration that can be beneficial to them upon just constitutional principles; but beyond that I am not prepared to go. If there is any law or provision of the Constitution by which Minnesota can come into the Union with three Representatives, or with two Representatives, I am prepared to vote for allowing her that number; but I have not heard any adduced, nor have I understood any argument to show that justice or injustice would be done here by admitting her with a greater or a less number.

Now it seems to me that it will be an act of justice to allow Minnesota one member, because she has no legal or constitutional claims to a greater number than one. It seems to me very strange that you are conferring a benefit on Minnesota by giving her three Representatives—a thing that has never been done to any new State, as far as I know. It is said she has a large fraction beyond the number requisite for one member, and that this fraction entitles her to a Representative. Why, sir, there is Iowa, and there is Texas, with four times the population of Minnesota, and they were admitted with only two members each. Why not extend this benefit to them? It would not even then be in the same ratio that you are conferring benefits on Minnesota by giving her three Representatives and two Senators. To carry out the same proposition you ought to give Iowa and Texas seven members each. I presume their population, according to the present ratio, would entitle them to seven members.

Sir, I am opposed to substituting expediency in place of principle. The Senator from Ohio objected to our applying a Procrustean principle in this case. He applied this remark to the apportionment of representation. Sir, the Constitution is my Procrustean standard by which things must be measured; and I am not for stretching the Constitution, nor am I disposed to go beyond its limits in the admission of new States. I am willing to extend them to every necessary constitutional favor, and to fill the measure to the brim; but I am not disposed to disregard the Constitution and the laws of the country. I do not see how we can allow Minnesota a representation upon suppositions in which gentlemen here indulge, that she has a large population who have not been enumerated. We are told that there are some thirty thousand square miles of her territory where there was no census taken. You might, on the same principle, count the trees standing on thirty thousand square miles in other States, and ask that they might be represented.

We are not told that there is a solitary inhabitant living upon those thirty thousand square miles; and yet that is brought forward as a suggestion to enforce on this body and on the country a fatal precedent. If you can give three members to a new State applying for admission because her constitution asks for it, might you not as well give thirty-three? If you can transcend the ratio of representation according to population, in the admission of new States, you can extend it ad libitum; there is no limit whatever.

That is not all. Has Minnesota any peculiar claims to our sympathy for want of fair representation for her fraction? Not at all. Heretofore she has been represented by a single Delegate in the other House, who had no vote. Now she comes into the Union with two Senators and a Representative, who is allowed a vote. Heretofore she has been powerless in both branches of Congress; and now she comes forward with equal power to any other State in the Senate, and a fair representation for all that she has a right to claim in the other House. There is no peculiar claim, then, to our sympathy. She is fairly represented, and she is infinitely benefited by allowing her one member, because, instead of one Delegate to represent her vast interests and her growing population, she will have two full-blown Senators, and one Representative.

It seems to me that an attempt is being made to misapply our sympathies on this subject. We must come down to some practical standard; and, in my estimation, we must measure our action by the law and by the Constitution. Each State is entitled at least to one Representative and to two Senators. The Constitution does not confine a State to two Senators. It says that a State must have that number; but it does not say that it cannot have three, or four, or five Senators. It says that each State shall be represented by two Senators, and that each Senator shall have one vote; but it does not say that a State shall not have a dozen Senators. If you go on construing the Constitution, and suiting it to every emergency, without regulating emergencies by the Constitution, you will have no limits or bounds to your legislation. I cannot think for a moment that Minnesota has any claim to more than one Representative; I cannot regard her constitution as the programme that is to regulate the action of both Houses of Congress. The idea of one amendment which has been suggested, to allow her three members, and then to take a census, and to reduce the number to what that census may show her to be entitled to, strikes me as an absurdity. If you admit the three members, and then take a census, I warrant you the returns will come in for a sufficient number to entitle them to that representation, if they do not go far beyond it. We have heard frauds of a flagrant character charged in regard to the elections of Minnesota, as well as of Kansas. While these charges stare us in the face, are we to go on, from sympathy or kindness to Minnesota, to extend to her favors that the Constitution of the United States does not warrant, and that we have no precedent for? I think not. I grant that, if you allow her less than three members, you will have to send the election back to the people—the very thing that ought to be done after a census is taken, and it is ascertained correctly to what number Minnesota is entitled. Then the people will have a fair opportunity of expressing their opinions; but until that is done, you cannot arrive at it with that degree of certainty which will enable you to conform to the Constitution and the laws of the land. I admit that you cannot select from the three members already elected any one; but you must send them all back, or else admit the three, which I should consider to be a monstrous violation of the law and of the Constitution. They will hardly draw straws, or toss up heads and tails to know which shall have precedence here; but they will all be admitted, or all go back. The only course that I can conceive to be proper, is to disregard the provisions in the Minnesota constitution, and send the Representatives back. It will require but a short time to take the census, and it will be worth much; for there will be a solvency of principle in that which will sustain us hereafter, and we shall not be setting a precedent for transcending the law and the Constitution; but, if you admit them as they are now presented, it will be a disregard of all former precedents of law, and of Constitution; and if, in this instance, they are disregarded, may they not be in all future instances? May not a State hereafter come forward when applying for admission, and declare in her constitution that she shall have five or six Representatives, and then elect them by general ticket in positive violation of the laws of the land. In this case, the three members were elected by general ticket, though the district system is established by law. If you receive the three persons elected as members in this case, you are giving every encouragement to disregard of law and positive violation of its provisions. So, sir, there is no alternative but one; and that is, upon the acceptance of the constitution to receive the Senators, let the census be taken, and let the people elect such Representatives as the present apportionment may entitle them to. Gentlemen indulge in conjectures of what their population may be, and various refinements and speculations are brought forward to sanction this transgression, as I consider it, and to give currency to a precedent that will some day be regretted, when the laxity that is now exercised in legislation regardless of the Constitution increases; when expediency usurps principle and convenience overrides the Constitution.

Mr. President, I am of opinion that we can look into the constitutions of States applying for admission. The Constitution of the United States requires that they shall be republican; and we must be satisfied of that. If they are not in conformity with the Constitution of the United States, are they republican in character? If they are not, they are anti-republican. Does this constitution of Minnesota contain no feature in violation of the Constitution of the United States? I think it does. It contains a provision allowing aliens to vote in Minnesota. I contend that a State constitution is not republican in character, unless it is in conformity with the Constitution of the United States, and I say such a provision is not warranted by the Constitution of the United States. By the Constitution of the United States it is declared that Congress shall have power to pass uniform laws on the subject of naturalization, and of course that power being conceded by the States, they have divested themselves of all power of naturalization, and conferred it upon Congress alone. A man cannot be a citizen of a State unless he is a citizen of the United States. I contend that no State has power, in derogation of Federal rights and prerogatives, (the Federal Government being the only authority to pass general naturalization laws,) to constitute any man a voter who is not a citizen of the United States. I say, then, this constitution is not republican in its character in this respect. It is so clear, that though no high judicial decision has yet taken place on the subject, I am sure, whenever it is made a question, the Supreme Court will be bound to arrive at the conclusion which I have indicated, unless they disregard the Constitution of the United States, and throw disrespect in the face of the States who constituted the Federal Government, and adopted its Constitution in the first instance. If the Supreme Court, in discussing the subject of citizenship in the recent case decided from Missouri, that has produced so much excitement, had only embraced this principle when it was fairly brought within the scope of their jurisdiction, they would have conferred an essential benefit on the country. They would have guarded us against evils that may possibly hereafter result. May not such a case as this arise? May not persons in Canada cross the border into our States, reside for the time required preceding the election for President of the United States, and determine the destinies of this country at some future day? It might be a matter of interest to foreign Powers to thrust them in upon us in that way. Those persons who can vote in a State for the most numerous branch of its Legislature, have a right to vote for presidential electors; and thus a State may impose upon the Federal Government aliens as voters, in the face of the constitutional authority of Congress to pass Federal naturalization laws. I do not consider this feature of the Minnesota constitution republican in character, and it is within the province of Congress so to decide.

But, sir, I have not heard the first argument yet, unless it was founded on speculation, and the probable population of Minnesota, brought forward in support of the extraordinary measure now proposed. I presume, however, it will be adopted, and if it be adopted, the consequences may not be realized to-day, or in a few years, but in half a century the effects of this loose legislation, in disregard of constitutional principles, this catering to conveniences, or to influences which ought not to govern in this body, or at the other end of the Capitol, will be felt. I mean to vote for such amendments as will do ample justice to Minnesota, and at the same time discourage every encroachment upon Federal power and Federal right. I am not going to bolster it up by any adventitious means, nor am I going to cater to States, because it is a complainant thing, and because they possibly may have a great many more people than are enumerated. We must go upon certainty in laws and constitutions. If we undertake to act upon speculations or conclusions made under various influences, not dishonorable, of course, to the gentlemen who make them, we are on the eve of setting an example that will not redound to the peace, the harmony, or the perpetuity of this country or its institutions.

Mr. BROWN. I intend, Mr. President, to vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts. It commends itself to my judgment as right. The second section of the bill proposes to admit the new State of Minnesota with one Representative. To that she is clearly and distinctly entitled. It then goes further, and says that she shall have such additional Representatives as the census already taken shall show her to be entitled to. That return shows technically that she is entitled to no additional Representative; but it shows that she has more than a majority of the quota. If we are to follow the precedents set us in the case of California and the case of South Carolina, she is entitled to one additional Representative. I will mete out to this young sister that justice which has been meted out to other sisters of the Confederacy. I am prepared to vote for a Representative for her fraction, because it was given to South Carolina and given to California, and it is fair to presume she is as well entitled to it as either or both of them.

Then it may be inquired why I vote for this amendment, seeing that the census has been taken, and that according to the returns there is only population enough to give her one Representative, and one for a fraction over a majority of the quota? I do it because leading citizens from this State, leading friends of the State in both Houses of Congress, assert that the census was improperly and imperfectly taken; and say that if there had been a proper and perfect enumeration of the inhabitants, she would have shown herself entitled to three Representatives. I know not whether that be so or not; and in the important matter of apportioning representation, I will not guess at the amount of population. I cannot do it, and will not do it; but when we have so much evidence that the State has population enough to entitle her certainly to two, and in all probability to three, Representatives; and a proposition is brought forward to take a new census to show whether she is not entitled, by a fair enumeration of her people, to another Representative, it is harsh treatment to say that you will refuse simply this small outlay in money, which it will require you to re-enumerate her inhabitants. What is there in the proposition? It will perhaps cost you fifteen or twenty thousand dollars in hard cash to take a re-enumeration of the inhabitants of this State, and that is all it will cost. Will you weigh that amount of money against injustice charged, and charged, doubtless, conscientiously in the judgment of many, as having been committed against this State?

There are Senators here, my friend from Missouri, [Mr. POLK.] and others, who think she is fairly entitled to three Representatives. I think not, because the return does not show it. I am not willing to depart from the record. What the record shows I must stand upon, because I feel that when I go beyond that I get at sea and know of no stopping point. But when we have these assurances that there is a population there which if fairly enumerated would entitle her to two or three Representatives, and it only costs fifteen or twenty thousand dollars to take a new enumeration, I am ready to order it, and if she has population then give her the representation. That I understand to be the whole scope of the amendment.

Now, sir, I want a minute more to vindicate myself from any portion of the responsibility which may seem to be heaped upon me growing out of the repeated declaration that Texas was admitted here with two Representatives without an enumeration of her population, and California without it too. It is true you did introduce Texas with two Representatives, but how? She came here as an independent Republic, saying: "if you will receive us as we propose, we will come into the Union; but if you will not thus receive us, we will stay outside of the Union." It was no admission of a new State. It was a proposition on the part of an independent Republic upon terms proposed by herself to come into the Union. If you choose to accept them, well; if you do not choose, as well. In the case of California, I know you did introduce a State without an enumeration of the people, and did it wrongfully. I, and others who stood by me at that day in opposing it, predicted that that would afterwards be claimed as a precedent and that other States would ask admission on the same principle.

I was against the admission of California with two Representatives. I am against the admission of Minnesota with two Representatives. I am for admitting the State, but I repeat to Senators now, what I said three weeks ago, that with my consent, Messrs. Shields and Rice shall not take a seat on this floor, under the late election, friends or no friends. I would not care if they would vote a thousand times over for the admission of a thousand such States as Kansas. I will not vote to introduce them into the Senate, under their late election. States have the right to elect Senators; Territories have no such right. Was Minnesota a State in the Union when she elected these gentlemen to the Senate? No. The whole record, this day's debate, shows that she is not now and was not then a State. Then under what clause of the Constitution did she undertake to elect Senators and accredit them to this body? Under what clause of the Constitution did she elect Representatives? She is entitled to her Delegate as a Territory; and she is entitled to nothing more. I shall not vote to introduce her members here, and if I were a member of the House of Representatives it would not matter a fig whether she claimed one or two or three or twenty Representatives, I would vote to admit none of them.

I understand that a State must be clothed with all the immunities, privileges, rights, and dignities of a State before she can elect a Senator. Sir, this thing has been peddled down low enough; it is disreputable; it is treating the older States of the Confederacy with less dignity than they are entitled to; to allow Territories in advance of their coming in as States, to elect Senators and send them here. Then what have we got before us now? A proposition comes from the same source, from the venerable and distinguished Senator from Kentucky, in advance of the admission of the State, and it is gravely argued before us, to receive her Senators, and then right upon the back of that, to admit the State, and then not admit her. To admit her in one sentence and then allow her to turn herself out in the next sentence, to declare that she is in the Union, and then leave it to her own people to say whether she is in or not. Why, upon my soul, sir, I cannot see where we are going to. You admit Kansas one day—if what I have said, is not precisely applicable to this State, it is to both together—you admit her and declare her in the Union one day, and allow her to resolve herself out the next day. It seems to me that this involves us in unmistakable difficulty. When a State is fairly in the Union, a member of the Confederacy, let her elect her Senators and her Representatives, and do not permit her to do it before. When she is once in, she can get out but by one mode, and that, let me tell Senators, is, when you come to understand the theory of the Government properly, by the peaceable process of secession.

But, sir, I rose simply to say that inasmuch as this amendment proposed nothing but to reënumerate the inhabitants of Minnesota when there is a grave and serious charge that errors had been made—that the census had been so imperfectly taken as to deprive the State of its proper representation—I shall vote for it. I think it ought to be done. I thank the Senator from Massachusetts for bringing it forward. I think it is just to Minnesota, and ought to be adopted.

Mr. PUGH. I do not intend to discuss that question; because, when the case of Messrs. Shields and Rice comes up, I shall decide upon their qualification and election. I do not think we have anything to do with the election of Representatives. That belongs to the other House. But I wish to call the attention of my friend, the Senator from Texas, to the question to which he has alluded. He seemed to be under the supposition that, if the point should ever come before the Supreme Court of the United States, that court would decide that no State had a right to authorize an alien to vote. Why, sir, the court have decided that the States had a right to do it; decided it in the Dred Scott case in so many words expressly. I sent for the report to verify it; and I have it here. If any Senator wishes to hear it, he can hear it read. There is no manner of doubt about the question that any State in the Union has a right to define the qualification of her own electors. Instead of the court being ever prone to decide against it, I say in the Dred Scott case they decided it in express terms. The book is here, if the Senator wishes to see it.

Mr. HOUSTON. The Senator's word would be amply sufficient to satisfy me of the fact, and my mind now has to labor under the melancholy conviction that that court is not so infallible as I thought it was. [Laughter.] I have had great veneration for it. I have heard it very much abused and spoken badly of. I am very sorry that any circumstance of this kind should have occurred to depreciate it in my estimation, for I think it a very unsound decision. I will acquiesce in it like a good citizen, but I think it is very unsound. It is the first time, I presume, that ever that court has decided against Federal right and Federal power. I would rather it had passed over this subject without any expression of opinion on it. I should hope there was some remedy for the evil, but now I despair of it.

Mr. IVERSON. I do not think there is any very great practical difference between the effect of the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts and that which my colleague suggested the other day, and which the Senator from Missouri has given notice he will offer on the present occasion, if the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts shall be rejected by the Senate. The difference in the practical effect of the two amendments, I think, is simply this: The effect of the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts will finally give to the State of Minnesota three Representatives in Congress. I am satisfied of that. The Senator asked on what data I brought my mind to that conclusion. It is upon the evidence of gentlemen around me, who have stated their knowledge of the condition of the population in that State. It is predicated upon the fact that as late as last October there were forty thousand votes cast for State officers. That, on the ordinary ratio of population, the voters would give one hundred and sixty thousand or one hundred and seventy thousand people; and by the time the new census is taken, by the time the Secretary of the Interior can appoint his officers, and have all the paraphernalia of that expensive and ramified process brought to bear on the subject, the population, according to all the reports we hear from all sides, going into the State from all quarters, will doubtless very soon reach the number for three Representatives.

I have no doubt at all that when the population comes to be examined and the census returned, Minnesota will be entitled to three Representatives according to the present ratio. I believe that will be the effect of the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, and according to that Minnesota will be entitled to one of those Representatives who have now been elected and she will be entitled to have two others elected. A new election will be ordered. The result of that may or may not be in favor of the other side of the Chamber. The Senator supposed that my imagination on this subject was somewhat exuberant. It may be so, but I fear there is a cat under the meal tub, and I am not willing to risk it.

The effect of my colleague's amendment is simply to give to the State of Minnesota now, what in my opinion she will be entitled to when the census comes to be properly taken—three Representatives. They have already been elected; the three Representatives are here. They have undergone the expense and trouble of an election. They have incurred the expense of a visit to Washington, and the expense of remaining here three or four months of this session. Why not admit them? Will any harm come of it? I do not think they are going to revolutionize the Government by coming into the House of Representatives. I do not see that any practical harm is going to grow out of it to any person, or to any party. Let them come in. They will do no harm in the other House. I am willing to risk them. The State of Minnesota has elected them. She has thought proper to send them here. They have undergone the expense, trouble, and annoyance of an election; and now when they come here let them be entitled to their seats under the practical operation of the amendment of my colleague, for he instructs the Secretary of the Interior to take a new census, and then when that census is taken, and the number of Representatives to which the State of Minnesota will be entitled strictly ascertained, the number can be cut down. If the three members to be admitted by the operation of this amendment, shall be more than that State will be entitled to, one or two of them may have to walk out, that is all. The question is simply now, whether the three who have been already elected shall be taken, or whether the matter shall be deferred, and three admitted who shall be elected hereafter. I would rather take the three already elected, and I go for that amendment.

Mr. WILSON. I want to say to the Senator from Georgia that I admire his frankness, while I do not at all concur in his principle of action here. He puts this entirely on a political point of view. Now, sir, I am not governed by that consideration in this matter. The Senator expresses his views to-day as frankly as he expressed them the other day on the Kansas question. He had supported that measure all through with a good deal of zeal and earnestness; but when Mr. Calhoun gave the Legislature, as he said, to the free-State party, he lost his zeal for her admission. It did not affect me at all. I would oppose it as soon if he had given us the whole Government. That is not the ground to act upon here. We undertook, Mr. President, to take the census of Minnesota as a basis of representation. We have failed in the attempt to take a perfect census; but there is no man of intelligence here who believes that we failed by one or two hundred thousand to ascertain the population. There may be from one hundred and seventy-five to two hundred thousand inhabitants in that Territory to-day. I have no idea that they exceed two hundred thousand. No man of intelligence believes there are three hundred thousand there, entitling them to three Representatives. We had better stand upon the Constitution and the laws, upon justice, upon equity, than to undertake to force in here three Representatives, when we have no evidence that they are entitled even to two. It matters not what may be the political views of the gentlemen who have been sent here. I care not what they may be. I say here to-day that if they were politically with me, I could not, I would not vote for the admission of three Representatives from Minnesota, because I have no evidence to show that she is entitled now even to two, though I believe from the information I have from a variety of sources that she has population enough for that number if that population were all ascertained. Now, the Senator says this is a choice between three who are elected, and three new ones. Not so, sir. My amendment is simply a proposition to give Minnesota one Representative; and as soon as it is ascertained that she is entitled to more, to allow her to elect more. That is all. It is fair, it is just, it is setting a good example for the future, one that I think we should not depart from. We can adopt my amendment, and then the question can be tested between that and the proposition to be made to strike it out and insert a provision for three members. I certainly do not wish to say an unkind word towards the Senator; I admire his frankness on this, as on all other questions; but I think the ground upon which he has put this case is not the ground upon which the Senate should be governed in its action.

The question being taken by yeas and nays upon Mr. Wilson's amendment, resulted—yeas 22, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Biggs, Broderick, Brown, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doollittle, Douglas, Durkee, Fessenden, Foster, Hale, Harlan, Houston, King, Pugh, Simmons, Wade, and Wilson—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bigler, Bright, Clay, Evans, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Green, Hammond, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Pearce, Polk, Sebastian, Slidell, Stuart, Trumbull, Wright, and Yulee—21.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. POLK. I now offer the amendment which was suggested by the Senator from Georgia the other day.

Mr. YULEE. Before the Senate proceeds further with the consideration of this bill, I would suggest, it being now four o'clock, and it being altogether unlikely—for I know that there are several amendments to be proposed—that this bill can be disposed of to-day, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. I make that motion.

Mr. STUART. I hope the Senate will not agree to that. I think it is much better to adjourn than to do that; but I hope we shall get a vote to-day.

Mr. YULEE. You cannot get a vote to-day.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate adjourn. The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 29, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM PINCKNEY, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday was read and approved.

TAKING OF THE CENSUS OF 1860.

The SPEAKER stated the question first in order to be on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] to suspend the rules for the introduction of the following resolution:

Resolved, That a special committee of five be appointed by the Chair, and to continue during this Congress, whose duty it shall be to inquire into the best mode of taking the census of 1860, with leave to report by bill or otherwise at any time during the session of Congress commencing on the first Monday of December next.

Mr. HOUSTON. Does the resolution propose to continue the committee during the recess? I do not understand what scope the gentleman proposes to give it.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. It proposes to continue the committee during the Congress, but to limit its report to the next session.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. Let the resolution be again read.

The resolution was read.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. It is not the intention that the committee shall sit during the recess, or incur any expense to the House.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. If I understand the resolution, that is its effect, whatever may be the intention; and such being the fact, I am constrained to object.

The SPEAKER. The rule is, that where a select committee is raised, it is dissolved at the expiration of the session. As the Chair understands the pending resolution, it proposes to continue this committee over to the next session.

Mr. MAYNARD. I should like to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether, by the introduction of this resolution, (and as he will be placed upon this committee if it be raised,) it is proposed to bring the matter before the House for legislation?

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. The committee will, of course, report at the next session a bill for the taking of the census.

Mr. HOUSTON. Let me ask another question. I understand that this resolution proposes to change one of the standing rules of the House in reference to the appointment of committees. If so, will it not take two thirds to suspend the rules for its introduction, and then a two-thirds vote to adopt it?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. HOUSTON. It proposes to change the rules of the House. The motion now is to suspend the rules to get the resolution before the House.

The SPEAKER. To what rule does the gentleman refer?

Mr. HOUSTON. I cannot recall the number of it. I refer to the rule or rules authorizing the appointment of committees.

The SPEAKER. There are some half a dozen of the standing committees of the House which, when appointed at the commencement of the first session run through the entire Congress; but there are other standing committees, the appointment of which terminates at each session of Congress. There is no rule of the House in reference to select committees. It has been, however, the practice of the House and the ruling of the predecessors of the present occupant of the chair that select committees are dissolved at each session of Congress, unless there is express authority continuing them over.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Is it not a change of the rules to allow the committee to report at any time? There is no rule authorizing a committee to report at any time.

The SPEAKER. It is a change of rules in that respect. The pending motion of the gentleman from Ohio is, that the rules be suspended to introduce the resolution. When the resolution is before the House it will require a two-thirds vote to suspend the rule for the adoption of the resolution in reference to the privilege allowed to the committee to report by bill or otherwise, at any time.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I will strike out the provision authorizing the committee to report at any time, so as to make it acceptable to all sides of the House.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I wish to inquire whether the committee is to be clothed with power to report during the next session? and whether, if appointed now, it will not imply its continuance in session during the recess?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the committee would not be dissolved at the expiration of the session, but there is no authority for it to sit during the recess.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. It is not intended that the committee should sit during the recess.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. This is a proposition to arrange in regard to the manner in which the next census shall be taken, and as directing the attention of the House to the subject I do not see any objection to it.

Mr. MILLSON. I would like to know whether this is not anticipating the taking of the census two years? The act authorizing the taking of the last census was not passed until the Thirty-First Congress. I think the next Congress will be soon enough to provide for taking the census of 1860.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. It makes no difference; we can have the bill before us for consideration. The taking of the census does require a good deal of thought to have it taken accurately and properly. I see no objection to this resolution.

Mr. MILLSON. While we are anticipating the time, we are also anticipating the executive suggestions which the President may deem it his duty to make when the proper time has arrived. I would ask also whether this matter has not been usually referred to the Committee on the Judiciary?

The SPEAKER. The bill, during the Thirty-First Congress, was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary; but the gentleman will remember that it was with great difficulty the House passed a bill to get into operation the necessary machinery before the constitutional term required the census to be taken.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Yes, sir; and not only that, but I understand that, by the delay in passing that bill, the Government lost nearly half a million of dollars. It is to save expense that I now propose to introduce this proposition.

The question was put on the motion to suspend the rules; and there were, on a division—ayes 94, noes 36.

Mr. HUGHES demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio, as this is a very important matter, to make the committee consist of seven instead of five.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. The more important a committee, the fewer the number upon it should be, if you want it to be a working committee.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I will give the gentleman from Tennessee an opportunity to offer his proposition as an amendment, if the rules are suspended.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will move to amend, then, so as to increase the number to seven, unless the gentleman from Ohio accepts it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and there were—yeas 110, nays 58; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Andrews, Arnold, Bennett, Billingham, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Boyce, Brayton, Bunting, Burlingame, Burns, Burroughs, Campbell, Chase, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clingman, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Conins, Covode, Cox, Cragin, James Craig, Curtis, Darnell, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Elliott, English, Fenton, Foley, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Groesbeck, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Hickman, Hill, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Lawrence, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Matteson, Maynard, Morrill, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Nichols, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Quitman, Reagan, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Royce, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Sickles, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Troupe, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Israel Washburn, Wilson, Woodson, Augustus R. Wright, and Zollieffer—110.

NAYS—Messrs. Atkins, Bocock, Bowie, Branch, Burnett, John B. Clark, Clay, Cobb, John Cochrane, Corning, Burton Craige, Curry, Davis of Indiana, Dimmick, Dowdell, Faulkner, Florence, Garnett, Gartrell, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Hawkins, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Jacob M. Kunkel, Leidy, Letcher, Samuel S. Marshall, Miles, Miller, Milson, Montgomery, Niblack, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Powell, Reilly, Rufin, Savage, Seales, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, James A. Stewart, Talbot, Warren, Watkins, Whiteley, Wortendyke, and John V. Wright—58.

So the rules were not suspended, two thirds not voting in favor thereof.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. LETCHER stated that his colleague, Mr. EDMUNDSON, was confined to his room by indisposition, and had been for several days.

Mr. FLORENCE stated that Mr. LANDY was detained at home by illness in his family.

Mr. WORTENDYKE stated that Mr. HURLER was unable to be in his seat to-day.

FORTIFICATIONS ON CONNECTICUT RIVER.

Mr. ARNOLD, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the necessity and expediency of erecting fortifications at or near the mouth of the Connecticut river, and report by bill or otherwise.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. PIKE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as truly enrolled an act to create additional land districts in the State of California, and for other purposes; when the Speaker signed the same.

PRINTING AND REFERENCE OF PAPERS.

Mr. LETCHER. I hold in my hand some papers from the Post Office Department, having reference to an item in the deficiency bill. I move that they be printed and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LETCHER. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Bocock in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the deficiency bill, on which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HILL] was entitled to the floor.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

The following gentlemen then addressed the committee on the subject of the admission of Kansas into the Union: Messrs. HILL, WADE, READY, GOOCH, TAYLOR of Louisiana, OLIN, BENNETT, and WILSON.

[These speeches will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. SANDIDGE obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. MILES, who moved that the committee rise. The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Bocock reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 306) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1858, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. BINGHAM, the House (at eight o'clock, p. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 30, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM PINCKNEY. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate calling for information respecting the massacre of California emigrants at the Mountain Meadows in the Territory of Utah; which was, on motion of Mr. HUNTER, ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of State, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, information in relation to prize vessels; which was, on motion of Mr. HUNTER, ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, the report of Lieutenant Beale of his exploration for a wagon road from Fort Defiance, in New Mexico, to the western borders of California; which was, on motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, referred to the Committee on Printing.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate resolutions of the Legislature of the Territory of Washington, relative to the construction of a national railroad across the continent from the Atlantic States to the Pacific ocean; which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also presented a memorial of the representatives of the Religious Society of Friends, in the State of New York and parts adjacent, remonstrating against any action whereby the evils of slavery may be extended; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BRODERICK presented resolutions of the Legislature of California in relation to school lands in the mountainous parts of the State; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a petition of the citizens of New York, praying that the public lands may be granted in farms or lots, free of cost, to actual settlers only; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

ADMISSION OF MINNESOTA.

Mr. DOOLITTLE presented the following resolution of the Legislature of Wisconsin; which was read, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed:

Joint resolution concerning the admission of Minnesota into the Union:

Whereas, the people of the Territory of Minnesota were authorized by an act of Congress to form a constitution and State government preparatory to admission into the Union as one of the United States of America; and whereas, in conformity with the provision of said act, a constitution has been formed and ratified by the people of said Territory, and Senators and Representatives have been elected to represent said State in the Congress of the United States, who have been hitherto unreasonably denied admission to, and participation in, the deliberations of Congress: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of Wisconsin, That duty demands, and justice requires, that Minnesota should immediately be admitted into the Union as one of the United States of America. That the question of such admission ought not to be connected with or made to depend upon the admission or rejection of any other State, or the organization of any new Territory.

Resolved, That a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolution be transmitted to each of the Senators and Representatives from Wisconsin in Congress.

F. S. LOVELL,

Speaker of the Assembly.

E. D. CAMPBELL,

Tenant Governor and President of the Senate.

APPROVED, March 24, 1858.

ALEXANDER W. RANDALL,

State of Wisconsin, Secretary's Office, ss:

The Secretary of State of the State of Wisconsin does hereby certify that the foregoing joint resolution has been compared with the original enrolled copy in this office, and that the same is a true and correct copy thereof, and of the whole of such original.

In witness thereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State, at the capitol, in Madison, this 25th of March, A. D. 1858.

J. D. RUGGLES,

Assistant Secretary of State.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, it was Ordered, That the heirs of Colonel William Bond and Colonel William Douglass have leave to withdraw their petitions and papers.

On motion of Mr. CRITTENDEN, it was Ordered, That the memorial of the heirs of Colonel Isaac Shelby be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

On motion of Mr. HOUSTON, it was Ordered, That the memorial of James Myer be referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. KENNEDY, it was Ordered, That Thomas Quantrill have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

CALIFORNIA LAND CLAIMS.

Mr. GWIN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be requested to inquire into the expediency of conferring on the district courts of California, in the investigation of facts relating to cases pending on appeal from the United States land commission, the powers given to the courts of the United States by the judiciary act of 1789, in regard to the taking of depositions.

NATIONAL FOUNDRY.

Mr. HUNTER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a central national foundry at the city of Alexandria, in Virginia, and report by bill or otherwise.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a motion to print the report of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating Major Emory's report on the Mexican boundary survey, reported a motion to print it; and the motion was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a motion to print the resolutions of the Legislature of New Mexico, reported in favor of it; and the motion was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a motion to print the report of the Secretary of War, communicating information in relation to officers of the Army absent from duty, and the cause of such absence, reported in favor of the motion; and it was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a motion to print the report of the Secretary of War, communicating lists of personsemployed in the War Department other than Army officers, reported in favor of the motion; and it was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a motion to print the report of the Secretary of the Navy, in relation to Government vessels in the Pacific ocean, and private vessels employed as Government transports, and the annual expense thereof, reported in favor of the motion, and it was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a motion to print the report of the Secretary of War, in relation to surveys of the Potomac river in the vicinity of Washington, reported in favor of the motion, and it was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the motion to print the memorial of Lawrence Kearney, reported in favor of the motion, and it was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a motion to print additional copies of the report of John Claiborne on the consumption of cotton in Europe, reported a resolution for printing five thousand copies, and it was agreed to.

Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of seamen on board the United States steamer Missouri, which was destroyed by fire at Gibraltar in 1843, praying remuneration for the loss of their clothing, by the burning of that vessel, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. POLK, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the memorial of George M. Weston, commissioner of the State of Maine, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 216) authorizing the payment to the State of Maine of certain expenses agreed to be refunded to her by the fifth article of the treaty between the United States of America and her Britannic Majesty, dated the 9th day of August, anno Domini 1842. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the petitions of John S. Devlin and William R. Brownlee, submitted adverse reports; which were ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was recommitted the bill (S. No. 23) for the relief of Robert Dickson, of the Kentucky volunteers, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 56) explanatory of an act entitled "An act in addition to certain acts granting bounty land to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States," approved March 3, 1855, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SIMMONS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Randall Pegg, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office; which was agreed to.

Mr. BENJAMIN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Cassandra S. Witherell, reported adversely thereon.

Mr. IVERSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Isaac Swain, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the case of Isaac Swain, and the papers accompanying the same, be referred to the Court of Claims, to inquire and decide whether the Government of the United States is legally liable for the amount, or any part thereof, recovered against the ship Ellen Brooks, or the owner thereof, in the United States district court for the northern district of California, in the suit of Raphael Orego and others, libellants, in the year 1851, and to report to Congress what amount, if any, of said recovery, and of the costs, charges, and expenses of defending said suit, the United States are legally liable for and ought to pay said Isaac Swain, owner of said ship.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The Committee on Printing have instructed me to report a bill (S. No. 218) amendatory of the act entitled "An act to provide for executing the public printing and establishing the prices thereof, and for other purposes," approved August 26, 1852. I wish to call the attention of Senators to it, as at the very earliest possible day I shall ask that it be acted on. The printing laws are very defective. All that the knowledge of the Superintendent and his office has been able to give us, and all the experience we have had ourselves by several years' service, and all the information we can get from the accounting officers, have been availed of in drawing this bill to perfect these laws.

The bill was read a first time, and ordered to a second reading.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. FITZPATRICK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 217) to constitute Montgomery, in the State of Alabama, a port of delivery; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

LANDS FOR THE WASHINGTON AQUEDUCT.

Mr. BROWN. I ask the indulgence of the Senate to call up the bill (S. No. 176) to acquire certain lands needed for the Washington aqueduct in the District of Columbia. It is one in which the Government is very much interested. It is necessary, in order to condemn certain lands for the purpose of giving the right of way in this District for the aqueduct. The superintendent informs me that the work is virtually suspended for the want of this condemnation. There is no other way of getting the land, except by passing an act of Congress; and I suppose the bill will give rise to no debate. I move to take it up.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill.

The bill, originally introduced by Mr. Brown on the 2d of March, was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. It was reported back by that committee on the 8th of March, with several amendments, the first of which was, in lines nine and ten of the first section, to strike out the words "justice of the peace of the said District, in which such land shall be, the said justice of the peace," and insert "judge of the circuit court of said District, the said judge," so as to read, "on application to a judge of the circuit court of said District, the said judge shall issue his warrant," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the thirteenth line, to strike out "eighteen," and insert "twelve," so as to read, "the said judge shall issue his warrant, under his hand, to the marshal of the said District, to summon a jury of twelve inhabitants," &c.

Mr. BROWN. I am instructed by the committee, on reconsideration, to ask leave to withdraw that amendment.

Leave was granted; and the amendment was withdrawn.

The next amendment was, in line seventeen, to insert after the word "thereafter," the words "notice of the time and place of said meeting being given to the owners of such land, or to their legal representatives."

Mr. BROWN. I am instructed to move to amend that amendment by adding to it, "in person, if that be practicable; and if not, by publication in some Washington city newspaper daily for two weeks."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and the amendment as amended was adopted.

The next amendment of the committee was, in lines twenty-two and twenty-three, to strike out after "juryman" the words "who shall appear, being not less than twelve in number."

Mr. BROWN. I am instructed to ask leave to withdraw that amendment.

Leave was granted.

The next amendment, which was, in line twenty-five, after the word "temporary," to insert the words "or permanent," was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to strike out in lines thirty and thirty-one, the words "some twelve or more of the jury," and insert "each of the said jury," so as to make the clause read, "th inquiry thereupon taken shall be signed by the marshal and each of the said jury."

Mr. BROWN. I move to amend that amendment, by striking out the word "each" and inserting "four fifths."

The amendment to the amendment was adopted; and the amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The next amendment, which was, in line thirty-five, to strike out "session" and insert "term," was agreed to; so as to make the clause read, "affirmed by the court at its first term after said return."

The next amendment was, in line thirty-seven, to strike out the words "a reasonable time," and insert "one month," so as to make the clause read, "if, from any cause, no inquiry shall be returned to such court within one month, the said court at its discretion, as often as may be necessary, may direct another inquiry to be taken."

Mr. BROWN. I move to amend the amendment by adding, after "month," the words "after the commencement of the next ensuing term."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and the amendment, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. BROWN. I move to add, at the end of the first section, the following proviso:

Provided, That the work shall not be delayed pending any such proceeding in court, but the same shall be continued without obstruction thereby after the inquiry shall be returned to the court.

The amendment was agreed to.

The preamble and first section, as amended, are as follows:

Whereas, it is represented that the works of the Washington aqueduct, in the District of Columbia, are delayed in consequence of the proprietors' refusal, in some cases, to sell lands required for its construction at reasonable prices; and because, in other cases, the title to the said lands is imperfect, or is vested in minors, or persons non compos mentis, or in a feme covert, or out of the District of Columbia; and whereas, it is necessary for the making of the said aqueduct, reservoirs, dams, ponds, feeders, and other works, that a provision should be made for condemning a quantity of land for the purpose: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall and may be lawful for the United States, or its approved agent, to agree with the owners of any land in the District of Columbia, through which said aqueduct is intended to pass, for the purchase or use and occupation thereof; and in case of disagreement, or in case the owner thereof shall be a feme covert, under age, non compos, or out of the District of Columbia, on application to a judge of the circuit court of said District, the said judge shall issue his warrant, under his hand, to the marshal of the said District to summon a jury of eighteen inhabitants of said District not related to the parties, nor in any manner interested, to meet on the land to be valued, at a day to be expressed in the warrant, not less than ten nor more than twenty days thereafter, notice of the time and place of said meeting being first given to the owners of such land or to their legal representatives in person, if that be practicable, and if not, by publication in some Washington city newspaper, daily, for two weeks; and the marshal, upon receiving the said warrant, shall forthwith summon the said jury, and, when met, shall administer an oath or affirmation to every jurymen who shall appear, being not less than twelve in number, that he will faithfully, justly, and impartially value the land, and so damages the owner thereof shall sustain by cutting the aqueduct through such land, or the partial, or temporary, or permanent appropriation, use, or occupation, of such land, according to the best of his skill and judgment; and that in such valuation he will not spare any person for favor or affection, nor any person grieve for malice, hatred, or ill will, and the inquisition thereupon taken shall be signed by the marshal and four-fifths of the said jury, and returned by the marshal to the circuit court for the District of Columbia, and unless good cause be shown against the said inquisition, it shall be affirmed by the court at its first term after said return, and recorded; but if, from any cause, no inquisition shall be returned to such court within one month after the commencement of the next ensuing term, the said court, at its discretion, as often as may be necessary, may direct another inquisition to be taken, in the manner above prescribed; and upon every such valuation the jury is hereby directed to describe and ascertain the bounds of the land by their valuation, and the quality and duration of the interest and estate in the same required by the said United States for the use of the aqueduct, and their valuation shall be conclusive on all persons, and shall be paid for by the said United States or its authorized agent to the owner of the land, or his, or her, or their legal representative; and, on payment thereof, the said United States shall be seized of such land as of an absolute estate in perpetuity, or with such less quantity and duration of interest or estate in the same, or subject to such partial or temporary appropriation, use, or occupation, as shall be required and desired, as aforesaid, as if conveyed by the owner to the said United States; and whenever, in the construction of the said aqueduct, or any of the works thereof, reservoirs, dams, ponds, feeders, tunnels, aqueducts, culverts, bridges, or works of any other description whatsoever appurtenant thereto, it shall be necessary to use earth, timber, stone, or gravel, or any other material to be found on any of the lands adjacent or near thereto, and the said United States or their agent cannot procure the same for the works aforesaid by private contract of the proprietor or owner, or in case the owner should be a feme covert or non compos, or underage, or out of the District, the same proceedings in all respects shall be had as in the case before mentioned of the assessment and condemnation of the lands required for the said aqueduct or the works appurtenant thereto: Provided, That the work shall not be delayed pending any such proceeding in court, but the same shall be continued without obstruction thereby, after the inquisition shall be returned to the court.

Mr. BROWN. I move to amend the second section, in line fifteen, by inserting, after the word "temporary," the words "or permanent."

The amendment was agreed to; and the second section, as amended, reads as follows:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for the United States or its agent, in case of any dispute or difficulty arising as to the ownership of the land condemned, as above, for the use of said aqueduct, or in case the owner should be a feme covert, under age, non compos, or out of the said District of Columbia, and no person duly authorized to receive the same, that the said United States, or its agent, be authorized, by petition to the circuit court for the District of Columbia, and upon said court's order, to deposit the money for which the said land was condemned in the place directed by said court; and the certificate of the proper officer of said deposit shall be considered as a full payment for said land, and thereby vest in the United States an absolute estate in perpetuity, or with such less quantity and duration of interest in the same, as subject to such partial, or temporary, or permanent use or occupation as shall be required and described as aforesaid, if conveyed by the owner or owners of said land.

Mr. BROWN. I move, in the ninth line of the third section, being the last line in the bill, to fill the blank by inserting "sixty" before "days."

The amendment was agreed to; and the section amended is:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of said circuit court to hear and determine to whom the said money does belong, and, upon being satisfied as to whom the land did belong, to pass their decree directing the clerk of said court to pay over to the owner the same money deposited as above, after deducting expenses. The court is further authorized to direct the mode for trying the case, and the litigants have the right of appeal, provided the appeal is taken within sixty days from the decree of said court.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in; the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

SAN FRANCISCO MARINE HOSPITAL.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 175) for the relief of S. W. Holladay and others, together with the papers in the case, have directed me to report them back, with a resolution directing the Attorney General to inquire into the circumstances of the transactions detailed in the papers. I will state the case in a few words. It appears that the city of San Francisco, in 1852, made a quit-claim deed to the United States for a square of ground for the purpose of building an hospital; an hospital was built on this property; and now we are told that some of the very lots which were conveyed to the United States in 1852 had been sold on execution against the city of San Francisco in 1851. The lots in question were sold at the sheriff's sale in 1851 for about eight hundred dollars, and we are asked now to buy them out for $20,000, after we have put the hospital on the grounds that the city conveyed to us. Under these circumstances the committee think there is grave ground of suspicion as to the bona fides of the whole matter, and have directed me to report a resolution, and ask for its immediate adoption by the Senate.

The report of the committee was read as follows:

The Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. No. 175) entitled "A bill for the relief of S. W. Holladay and others," respectfully report:

That from the papers accompanying said bill, it appears that the city of San Francisco, on the 11th of December, 1852, executed a quit-claim deed in favor of the United States, for a square of ground on which an hospital has been built by the Government. It further appears, that in October, 1851, two fifty-vara lots in said square were sold on execution issued against the city for $860, and that in an action of ejectment decided in one of the State courts in California, the title of the purchasers at the sheriff's sale has been held valid.

The bill proposes to authorize a purchase of these two lots at a price not exceeding $20,000.

These facts on the face of the papers submitted to the committee, justify the suspicion that there may be other defects in the title not only to the two lots in question, but to the remainder of the square on which the hospital has been erected. They create painful suspicion of a want of good faith, which requires a scrupulous investigation of all the circumstances attendant on the transactions. The committee, therefore, propose to the Senate the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Attorney General be directed to make careful examination of the nature and validity of the title conveyed to the United States by the city of San Francisco, on the 11th of December, 1852, and to report to the Senate—

1. Whether any and what defects exist in said title.
2. Whether the parties to whom lots five and six, in Hospital square, at San Francisco, were conveyed by sheriff's deed in 1851, have valid title to said lots under said conveyances, and are competent now to transfer valid title to the United States.
3. What is the present value of said lots five and six, and whether the said lots are indispensable for the use of the hospital.
4. Whether there are any outstanding claims of title to any other part of said Hospital square.

Mr. COLLAMER. I should like to add another inquiry, to which I presume the Senator will have no objection; and that is, that the Attorney General inquire whether the persons who claim to have made this purchase under the execution were residents of San Francisco, and knew of the building of this hospital, and did not object to it.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I have no objection to that amendment. I supposed the Attorney General would inquire into those facts anyhow; but it is better to provide for it.

Mr. COLLAMER. I desire that it be put in. I move to amend the resolution by directing the Attorney General also to inquire "where the claimants of said lots reside, and whether they had notice of the purchase by the Government, and knew of the erection of the hospital, or made any objection thereto."

The amendment was agreed to; and the resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. YULEE. I ask the Senate to take up the bill (S. No. 143) which provides for the creation of the office of Fourth Assistant Postmaster General. The business of the Post Office Department is very much delayed for the want of such an officer as is provided for in this bill. It is desirable that the early action of the Senate should be had upon it, in order that it may reach the House of Representatives in season for action there during the present session.

Mr. STUART. It is certainly within a very few seconds of the time of taking up the unfinished business of yesterday, and this proposition of the Senator from Florida will involve some discussion, I can see by the character of it.

Mr. YULEE. I think not.

Mr. STUART. I am certain it will. I think we had better proceed with the unfinished business of yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. BIGGS in the chair.) The hour has arrived for the consideration of the special order, being the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the bill (S. No. 86) for the admission of Minnesota into the Union.

Mr. YULEE. I give notice that I shall ask the Senate to-morrow, during the morning hour, to take up the bill to which I have called attention.

Mr. HALE. I know that I am not situated in such a way as to have the responsibility of what the Senate is about to do; but I think it is a reproach to us that the wheels of Government, in this city, are stopped for want of executive officers to do the business of the courts—an attorney and marshal; and I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business

The motion was agreed to. After some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 30, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. SMITH PYNE, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the War Department in answer to a resolution calling for information relating to the sale of the Fort Ripley reservation; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury in reply to a resolution of the 5th of March calling for information as to the robbery of John Hastings, collector, at Pittsburg; which was referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Postmaster General, transmitting an abstract of offers for carrying the mails under the act of July 2, 1856; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, their Chief Clerk, informing the House that the Senate had passed a joint resolution and bill of the following titles; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

Joint resolution (S. No. 17) explanatory of the "joint resolution giving an increased compensation to all laborers in the employment of the executive and legislative departments of the Government in the city of Washington," approved 18th August, 1856;

A bill (S. No. 145) for the relief of Brevet Major James L. Donaldson, assistant quartermaster United States Army; and

A bill (S. No. 202) for the relief of Major Jeremiah Y. Dashiell, paymaster in the United States Army.

OLIVIA W. CANNON.

Mr. WHITELEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill continuing the pension to Mrs. Olivia W. Cannon, widow of Joseph S. Cannon, deceased, late a midshipman in the United States Navy; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. LETCHER. I now insist on my motion.

Mr. GARTRELL. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield to me that I may introduce a bill for reference?

Mr. LETCHER. The gentleman must excuse me. There are many others who want the same accommodation; and I cannot yield to all.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make an explanation in reply to language used by my colleague [Mr. CLARK] in his speech the other day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia refuses to yield further.

The motion of Mr. LETCHER was then agreed to.

So the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BOCK in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the deficiency bill, on which the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDIDGE] was entitled to the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would beg leave to say before proceeding to business, that something like twenty-eight gentlemen, who have not yet spoken, have intimated a desire to address the committee during the progress of this debate. Only two days remain before the time when, by agreement, a motion is to be made to take up the Kansas bill. The Chair states those facts to gentlemen in order that they may consider what course is proper for them to take in order to get their speeches in.

Mr. NICHOLS. I understand that debate is extended on this bill until Friday, and that discussion after Thursday will be confined to the bill itself.

The CHAIRMAN. That is so.

Speeches were then made on the Kansas question by Messrs. SANDIDGE, WALBRIDGE, LEIDY, DAVIS of Maryland, CLAY, HARLAN, UNDERWOOD, and HOARD.

[These speeches will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. STEVENSON obtained the floor, but yielded to Mr. GILMER, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WINSLOW reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 306) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1858, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

HEIRS OF ALEXANDER STEPHENSON.

On motion of Mr. PURVIANCE, it was Ordered, That leave be granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the petition and papers of the heirs of Alexander Stephenson, in order that they may be referred in the Senate.

And then, on motion of Mr. PEYTON, the House (at fifteen minutes past seven o'clock, p. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 31, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. SEPTIMUS TUSTIN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey, presented a petition of citizens of New York, praying that the public lands may be granted, free of cost, in limited quantities, to actual settlers only; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BROWN presented a petition of the lay members of the Roman Catholic churches in the District of Columbia, praying for the enactment of a law in relation to the manner of holding and transmitting the title to property of the Roman Catholic Church in the District; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. KING presented a petition of inhabitants of Jefferson county, New York, praying for the construction of a breakwater at the port of Cape Vincent, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MASON presented the memorial of H. L. Gallaher, praying that his claim for work done on the Washington aqueduct may be settled upon principles of justice and equity; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. POLK presented the memorial of H. Rives Pollard, praying that an adequate salary may be attached to the office of the United States consul at Bangkok, in Siam, to which office he has been recently appointed; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I present the memorial of the Mayor and Common Council of the city of Rock Island, in the State of Illinois, praying that a portion of the island of Rock Island, which, for many years, has been a military reservation, but which has ceased to be needed or used for military or Government purposes, may be granted to that city. They ask a grant only of that portion of the island which lies within the corporate limits of the city, excluding that portion not within the corporate limits. The amount of land they ask is, I think, about one hundred and eighty acres. They desire it for school purposes and parks. It seems to me very reasonable, under the circumstances, and perhaps the wisest appropriation that could be made of that portion of the island, as it is very admirably situated for that purpose, and no longer needed for Government purposes. I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

DACOTAH.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am requested to present some memorials from two or three hundred petitioners resident in that part of the Territory of Minnesota which is excluded from the limits of the State of Minnesota, and in a country which now has assumed the name of Dacotah. They pray Congress for the organization of a Territory to be called the Territory of Dacotah, to be composed of that part of the Territory of Minnesota which is excluded from the State limits, being a tract of country about the same size as the proposed State. I present these memorials, and move their reference to the Committee on Territories.

The motion was agreed to.

ADMISSION OF OREGON.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have received from General LANE, the Delegate from Oregon in the House of Representatives, the following letter:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, March 29, 1858.
SIR: Inclosed you will find a printed copy of the constitution of the State of Oregon. Please present it, and take such steps as may be necessary to bring us in on an equal footing with the other States of the Union, and you will very much oblige me and the people I represent.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
JOSEPH LANE.

Hon. STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS.
In pursuance of that request I present the constitution which he has furnished. I avail myself of this opportunity to say that it has been suggested that, in the remarks which I made the other day in reply to the Senator from California, [Mr. GWIN,] explaining why I had not moved in this matter before, I conveyed the impression that General Lane had neglected his duty in the other House. I desire to say it was far from my intention to cast any censure upon him or accuse him of neglect. I did state then that I had not moved in this matter, for the reason that the constitution had not been furnished to us. Being surprised that it had not been furnished, I asked the Delegate what was the occasion of the delay. He said he had received a copy, but had not moved in it, for the reason that he thought it was better not to get it embarrassed by the Kansas question. It is due to him to say that I concurred with him in the propriety of withholding it, and preventing it being made part of an omnibus with the Kansas question. This explanation is due to him, because I do not think it just that any reflection should be supposed to be cast on him, who, as a Delegate in the other House, does his duty very creditably. I move the reference of the constitution to the Committee on Territories.

The motion was agreed to.

TELEGRAPHIC MONOPOLIES.

Mr. BIGLER. I have been requested to present the memorial of Amos Kendall, Samuel C. Bishop, Zenas Barnum, Francis O. J. Smith, H. M. Schieffelin, a committee on behalf of the Magnetic Telegraph Company and the New England Union Telegraph Company, asking Congress to adopt measures for the protection of the companies which they represent against what they regard as a combination of the London, Newfoundland, and New York Telegraph Company, the American Telegraph Company, and the Atlantic Telegraph Company, which they say are a powerful organization, composed mainly of the same men, actuated by a common purpose and sympathy. Whilst their purpose is to some extent concealed, they regard it as powerful and conclusive and oppressive. As this subject is one of peculiar interest, I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate while I read a few paragraphs from the memorial, which will better explain the object of the memorialists and the specific legislation which they desire. They first set forth the history of the companies which they represent, the extent of telegraphic lines which they own, the facilities which they have afforded the country, and their future purposes. Then they allege a combination, and go on as follows:

"Your memorialists desire to be understood as not opposed to the great enterprise of connecting Europe and America by a telegraphic cable, nor to any assistance in ships or money which their Government may think proper to give it; but they maintain that it is the duty of their Government, whether they assist the enterprise or not, to see that it shall not be used to oppress one interest in the United States for the purpose of building up another, and that this duty becomes more imperative when the Government furnishes it with material aid.

"Your memorialists further represent that the combination of which they complain is composed of the New York, Newfoundland, and London Telegraph Company, incorporated by the Legislature of the British Province of Newfoundland; the American Telegraph Company, incorporated under the laws of the State of New York; and the Atlantic Telegraph Company, a British corporation, embracing an Atlantic telegraphic cable from Newfoundland to the coast of Ireland. Whether there is a fourth party covering a telegraphic line from the Irish terminus of the proposed Atlantic cable to the city of London, your memorialists are not advised, nor is it material.

"Your memorialists represent, that the three telegraphic companies aforesaid originated with certain capitalists in the city of New York, who are stockholders in all of them, and control two of them directly and absolutely, and the third indirectly, but effectually. The New York, Newfoundland, and London Telegraph Company, and the American Telegraph Company, are composed mainly of the same men, and are under the same control; and the same men who control them are influential stockholders in the Atlantic Telegraph Company, which could not have existed in its present shape without their consent. In fact, the Atlantic Telegraph Company and the American Telegraph Company were but parts of one scheme, which was originally embraced in the act incorporating the New York, Newfoundland, and London Telegraph Company, and in interest and control they are still parts of one scheme, inasmuch that the success of one contributes, if it be not absolutely essential to, the success of all; and any aid afforded by the Government giving strength to one gives strength and power to all.

"That these three companies are one in origin and design, is conclusively shown by the act of the Legislature of Newfoundland incorporating the New York, Newfoundland, and London Telegraph Company, passed April 15, 1854."

Here follows the act of the Newfoundland Legislature, which is lengthy, and I shall not read it. I now proceed to read that portion of the memorial which sets forth the specific legislation which the memorialists desire:

"Your memorialists neither ask nor desire the interposition of Congress to protect them against competition in the United States. They neither ask nor desire the withdrawal of the aid of the Government from the Atlantic Telegraph Company, or its refusal to any other company which may be organized to span the ocean with a line of telegraph. All they ask is to be protected against combinations for the purpose of oppressing or destroying them between parties operating in the United States and out of the United States, and to be put on an equal footing with all others in their connection with foreign lines entering the United States by sea or land.

"This protection your memorialists are advised it is the province of Congress to afford them, by virtue of their constitutional power to regulate trade and intercourse with foreign nations. And they appeal the more confidently for this protection on account of the aid granted by Congress to the combination against them, increasing their power to oppress.

"Your memorialists, therefore, pray for the passage of a general law which shall prevent combinations between citizens or companies in the United States and monopolists or companies out of the United States, for the purpose of oppressing telegraphic companies and monopolizing the business of telegraphing in the United States, and shall enable all telegraphic lines in the United States to form connections with all telegraphic lines approaching their borders, on terms of perfect equality.

"Your memorialists are the more emboldened to present this prayer, from the consideration that the monopoly of telegraphic intercourse between, if not throughout, the Old and New Worlds, now sought to be established, may be applied, with fearful effect, to the commercial and political, as well as telegraphic, interests of the United States, unless regulated by law."

I ask the reference of this memorial to the Committee on the Judiciary. As it is very interesting, so far as its historical matter is concerned, I ask that it be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to print goes to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. HALE. I wish to make a single suggestion in regard to the reference of this memorial. It seems to me that it should more appropriately go to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. BIGLER. I think not. The Senate will perceive that it does not present a question of facilitating intercourse, or establishing telegraphic lines. It presents a question sheerly of law, for the protection of the companies which these parties represent. They complain of a combination which is to be oppressive upon their interests, and which is to be prejudicial to the interests of commerce, and possibly to the political interests of this country; and they ask for a law to protect them. I therefore thought the Committee on the Judiciary was the proper committee.

Mr. HALE. I am not strenuous about it. All memorials in relation to telegraphs have been heretofore referred to the Post Office Committee; and I think that would be the more appropriate reference.

Mr. BIGLER. It would be eminently so, if the memorial presented any question as to the establishment or regulation of telegraph lines; but it does not.

Mr. HALE. I have no motion to make in regard to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. BROWN, it was Ordered, That the petition of William Hunter, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

On motion of Mr. TRUMBULL, it was Ordered, That the petition of Daniel Hay, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CHANDLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 222) for the relief of Jeremiah Moors; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JONES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 220) for the relief of the citizens and owners of property in the city of Omaha, Nebraska Territory, and Sioux City, State of Iowa; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. YULEE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 219) for the relief of the railroad companies of the State of Florida; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. BROWN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 227) authorizing the organization of a fire department in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. POLK, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the memorial of the legal representatives of Seth Belknap, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BROWN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of Montgomery county, Maryland, praying that the plank road in that county leading to the District may be made toll free, reported adversely thereon.

Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of J. H. Carter, for himself and J. W. Bennett and R. B. Lowry, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of J. K. Kane and others, in behalf of the widow of Foxhall A. Parker, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Ann E. Smoot, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of William Reynolds, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of W. W. Bassett, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of Richard W. Meade, reported a bill (S. No. 221) for his relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. FOOT, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the petition of Frances Ann McCauley, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 223) for her relief. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia, to whom were referred the papers relating to the claim of Edward Ingersoll, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 224) for his relief. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. IVERSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia, to whom was referred the memorial of Harriet O. Read, reported a bill (S. No. 226) for the relief of Mrs. Harriet O. Read, executrix of the late Brevet Colonel A. C. W. Fanning, of the United States Army; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a motion to print the report of the Secretary of War in relation to the expenses of armories and manufacture of arms thereat, for the year 1856-7, reported in favor of the motion; and it was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a motion to print five thousand copies of the map of Florida, illustrative of the recent surveys for a canal in that State, reported in favor of the motion; and it was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a motion to print the report of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating the report of J. Ross Browne, on the late Indian wars in Oregon and Washington Territories, reported in favor of the motion; and it was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a motion to print the report of the Secretary of War communicating the report of Lieutenant Colonel J. D. Graham for the year 1857, have directed me to report in favor of the printing, but also to state that the committee do not design to recommend the printing of the maps. The cost of printing the report will not be a great deal—$365, exclusive of the maps. With the maps, it would amount to some $6,500 additional. The committee will not recommend the printing of the maps, as they believe it to be likely to be of no avail whatever, during the present session, at any rate, if not during the present Congress. I report merely in favor of printing the report of Lieutenant Colonel J. D. Graham in regard to lakes and harbors.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the resolution directing an inquiry into the expediency of suspending the territorial laws in Utah during the present difficulties in that Territory, have instructed me to ask to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Territories, believing that the question is one which relates to the exercise of the political powers of the Government as to its Territories, and does not appropriately belong to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

ANDREW GLASSELL.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the memorial of Andrew Glassell, praying compensation for services rendered to the United States in California, have directed me to report a bill for his relief, and ask for its immediate passage. I will state, in a few words, the ground of the claim of the memorialist. The memorialist was appointed under the act of Congress of 1855 to assist the United States district attorney in California, for the term of one year, in the defense of the United States against the claims of persons demanding confirmation of grants of land there. At the end of the year the cases were not all closed, and at the solicitation of the officers of the Government, he continued his services some four months longer in order to close up the cases, his services being indispensable. The bill is to pay him the additional salary for the four months' services.

There being no objection, the bill for the relief of Andrew Glassell (S. No. 225) was read twice, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It appropriates $1,400 as compensation to him for services rendered as assistant counsel for the United States before the United States district court for the northern district of California, from the 10th of January to the 1st of May, 1856.

Mr. HUNTER. Is there any report in that case? From what committee does it come?

Mr. BENJAMIN. I have just stated that it came from the Judiciary Committee. It is to pay for an assistant attorney of the United States appointed under an act of Congress for twelve months, and the duties extended to sixteen months. The appropriation was only made for twelve months. This is to pay for the additional four months.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRIVATE BILLS.

On motion of Mr. IVERSON, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by him some weeks since:

Resolved, That for the residue of the present session, after this present week, the private bills on the Calendar shall be special orders of the day on Friday of each week, at one o'clock, in the order in which they stand on the Calendar.

Mr. IVERSON. It has been usual before this time of the session to pass a resolution of this nature. Looking back at the history of the Senate during the preceding sessions, I find that the resolution has usually been passed in March. During the last Congress, it was passed on the 24th of March. There are a large number of private bills on the Calendar, and it is necessary that the Senate should proceed to the consideration of them at some time. It has been the usual custom to set apart Fridays. I have moved the resolution, but I do not propose to take Friday of the present week, as the bill for the admission of Minnesota, and the Army bill, will probably occupy the rest of the week.

Mr. STUART. I am entirely in favor of the Senator's proposition, but I wish to suggest whether it would not be better to change it so as to provide simply for setting apart Fridays for private bills on the Calendar, without making them special orders. A special order may be postponed by a vote.

Mr. IVERSON. I modify it accordingly.

Mr. STUART. Let it read "that Friday be set apart for the consideration of private business on the Calendar, in the order in which it stands."

The resolution as modified was adopted, as follows:

Resolved, That, for the residue of the present session, after this present week, Friday of each week shall be set apart for the consideration of private bills, in the order in which they stand upon the Calendar.

BILL BECOME A LAW.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. J. B. HENRY, his Secretary, announcing that he had approved and signed the bill (S. No. 210) creating additional land districts in the State of California, and for other purposes.

FOURTH ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL.

Mr. YULEE. I ask the Senate now to indulge me by taking up the bill (S. No. 143) the purpose of which is to create the office of Fourth Assistant Postmaster General.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 143) to create the office of Fourth Assistant Postmaster General was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the appointment, by the President, with the consent of the Senate, of a Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, who is to receive the same compensation which is paid to each of the other Assistant Postmasters General, and who is authorized to send and receive letters, packages, and other matters of official business through the mails free of postage, subject to the same restrictions as the other Assistant Postmasters General.

Mr. HUNTER. I should like to have some explanation of this bill.

Mr. YULEE. This bill does not strictly increase the officers. I suppose, however, it may be considered as an increase of one, but one only. It will add a single office, but without the necessity of increasing any further the clerical force of the Department. A very large business of inspection has grown up in the Post Office Department to which have been appropriated by existing laws the labors of seventeen clerks. This business thus far has been superintended by the chief clerk of the Postmaster General, and the duties of the desk have become so laborious and engrossing that the Postmaster General is practically left without a chief clerk at all. The purpose of this bill is to create, as has been proposed by several of the predecessors of the present Postmaster General, the office of Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, to whose bureau will be appropriated the duties of the inspection office, with a clerical force of seventeen as now existing, and without any increase of force whatever. The object is simply to improve the organization of the Department. There has been no change in the organization of the Department for the last twenty years, while the business has been increasing very largely.

Mr. HUNTER. I should be very glad to aid the Senator from Florida and the Post Office Committee, if they would come forward with some proposition of reform to reduce the immense expenditures of this Department, which is now a charge upon the general Treasury of the country to a very large amount. I am unwilling to multiply offices, unless it can be shown to be absolutely necessary. We have got along with the old organization, and I think we ought to be able to do so hereafter. I am unwilling, in the present condition of things, to vote for additional offices. Here we are to create, in fact, another bureau, and, to follow from it, I presume, we shall have another list of clerks.

Mr. YULEE. No, sir.

Mr. HUNTER. Well, if not now, we shall be asked for additional clerks at the next session.

Mr. YULEE. No, sir; I will explain to the Senator presently.

Mr. COLLAMER. I am not advised, at the present juncture, of the state of affairs in the Post Office Department; but the business of that Department, as arranged some years since, divided itself, very naturally, into four distinct bureaus. One was the appointment office, relating to the creation of new post offices and the appointments and removals of postmasters, which requires a head of a bureau with a set of clerks under him. The second was the contract office, embracing within it all the contracts for the conveyance of mails, and all other post office contracts by the Government, which is a bureau by itself. The third was the financial office, conducting the pecuniary affairs of the Department. The fourth was what is called there, technically, the inspection office; that is to say, that branch of the Department which receives the reports and arranges the business in relation to the fulfillment of the contracts, into which office all the failures of mails, and all default in the performance of any contract come. The force in that branch increased, from six or seven clerks originally, to twelve when I left the Department, and there are now about fifteen constantly employed in that business. They receive every day large numbers of reports, which have to be carefully examined. The only way in which we have found it possible to get along, so as to secure the fulfillment of contracts, has been by giving to every postmaster upon each route the schedule of duties required by the contract of that route, and to require a report to be made by each post office on the route of the true hours of the arrival and departure of the mail. So long as we left it to the postmasters, as was the practice at one time, to report the failures, the difficulty was that we never got any report at all; but there is a broad difference between a man's telling a lie and saying nothing. When we required of each postmaster that he should report the true time of arrival and departure, we got the true state of things. These are reported at the end of each quarter; all the arrivals and departures in the United States are to be examined in the inspection office, compared with the schedules, and the failures noted. That increases, of course, with the increase of business.

I say these four were the natural divisions of the Post Office Department. They are those which have existed for many years; but there are in the Department only three Assistant Postmasters General, and for twelve years of this time we have been obliged to put and keep at the head of the inspection office the chief clerk of the Department. He has done the duties of an Assistant Postmaster General, in fact, and the head of the Department has been deprived of the use of the chief clerk by being compelled to put him at the head of one of the bureaus. I know that was the true condition of things while I was there. The gentleman who is now at the head of the contract office, Mr. Dundas, was then chief clerk. He was sequestered from the proper duties of chief clerk all the time I was in the office, and had been for a number of years before, and has been since. He has been passed into the contract office, and other chief clerks appointed; but the present chief clerk is at the head of the inspection office this day. This division of the business of the Department has been shown by experience to be proper. It has existed since Mr. Kendall arranged it, almost twenty years ago. During that time we have been necessarily compelled to sustain and keep up these four divisions. I cannot but think that the time has come for the creation of an officer of a proper grade to take charge of the inspection office. It ought to have been done long ago, and perhaps would have been done, if we had had the courage to ask Congress to let us have a fourth assistant. In fact we have had him, under the name of a clerk, for a great many years. I did not know that such an application was made, but I felt it my duty, knowing the condition of that Department, to say that the head of it does right in asking that a fourth assistant should be made, and called what he really is.

Mr. YULEE. I think it probable that the reading of the letter, which is not a long one, from the Postmaster General, in which he explains the occasion and the necessity for the creation of this office, will be satisfactory to the Senate, and will be corroborative of the Senator from Vermont, who was one of the predecessors of the present incumbent in the management of that Department. The Clerk read the following letter:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, February 1, 1858.

SIR: In reply to your communication of the 28th ultimo, inclosing the Senate's resolution directing the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads "to consider if any changes are advisable in the organization of the Post Office Department," and requesting me to furnish such views on the subject as the experience of the Department may suggest, I have the honor to submit to the Senate the accompanying bill creating the office of Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, and earnestly recommend its passage.

The necessity of this office was recognized by my predecessor, and the enactment of a law similar in its provisions to the bill herewith submitted was strongly recommended by him to Congress.

The responsible and important duties of the inspection office, which were formerly discharged by one of the Assistant Postmasters General, have been more recently assigned to the chief clerk of the Post Office Department, who is therefore required to perform the functions of the head of a bureau together with those of the chief clerk, while he is only receiving the salary which belongs to the inferior position. The rapid and enormous increase of the business of this Department renders these double duties too onerous and oppressive, and no single individual can discharge them with justice to himself and with fidelity to the Government. The consequence is, that the Postmaster General must be entirely deprived of the services of a chief clerk, which are now indispensable, or the important business of the inspection office must be neglected.

In addition to these considerations, the supervision of the inspection office, requiring the discharge of high judicial functions in the interpretation of contracts, and involving the gravest responsibility in the imposition of fines and penalties, should certainly be committed to an officer of the same grade and dignity as the heads of the other bureaus.

The business of this Department naturally and necessarily divides itself into four bureaus, each of which should be placed under the superintendence of an Assistant Postmaster General.

One of my predecessors, Mr. Kendall, in the division of labor among his officers, gave the inspection office to one of his assistants. Even then it was considered of sufficient magnitude and importance to require an officer of that grade for its proper management. Since Mr. Kendall's term of service expired, the business of the inspection office has increased to more than three times its amount at the former period, while the investigation of mail depredations and the supply of bags, pouches, locks, and keys, for the transmission and security of the mails, have added greatly to the labor heretofore performed by the head of this bureau.

The annexed schedule exhibits the organization of the different Executive Departments of the Government. By an examination of this schedule, it will be perceived that the business of the head of a bureau is not required to be performed by the chief clerk in any other Department besides the Post Office. It will also be seen that the duties assigned to the chief of the inspection office are quite as responsible, important, and onerous, as those discharged by the Assistant Postmaster General.

In view of all these facts, I would most respectfully recommend to Congress the enactment of a law creating a Fourth Assistant Postmaster General to take charge of the inspection office, now under the supervision of the chief clerk. The change suggested is necessary alike for the faithful performance of the public service, for the symmetry of the system by which this Department is regulated, and for a just distribution of labor among the officers who share with me the responsibility of its management.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
AARON V. BROWN,

Postmaster General.

Hon. D. L. YULEE, chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, Senate of the United States.

Mr. YULEE. I agree with the Senator from Virginia that the expenditures of the Post Office Department are large, and require pruning. The same may be said, though, of every other Department of the Government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour has arrived for the consideration of the special order; and it requires the consent of the Senate to proceed with this bill.

Mr. YULEE. Being on the floor, I presume I may be allowed to proceed. I hope the Senate will permit this bill to be disposed of, as it is now up, and can be got through with in a very few minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I object. Let the regular order of business be proceeded with.

Mr. YULEE. I submit the question whether, being on the floor, the special order can be properly called for?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir; at one o'clock it must be called.

ADMISSION OF MINNESOTA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 85) for the admission of the State of Minnesota into the Union.

Mr. POLK. I move to strike out the second section of the bill, and insert:

That the said State shall be entitled to three Representatives in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. CLAY. Let the section be read as it has been already amended.

The Clerk read it, as follows:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That said State shall be entitled to one Representative, and such additional Representatives in Congress as the population of said State, according to the census authorized by the act approved February 28, 1857, shall show it to be entitled to according to the present ratio of representation, and no more; and the Secretary of the Interior shall cause the census of said State to be taken forthwith according to the provisions of the act of February 26, 1857, and report the same as soon as practicable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BIGGS in the chair.) It is moved to strike out that section, and to insert:

That the said State shall be entitled to three Representatives in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. IVERSON. As fair play is said to be a jewel, I desire to notify the Senate of an amendment which I will propose to the bill, by way of a substitute for the second section, in case the amendment of the Senator from Missouri shall not prevail. I am in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, and shall vote for it; but in the event of that failing to be adopted by the Senate, I shall propose the amendment which I send to the Chair, and ask to have read for information. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. FITCH] also has a similar amendment, somewhat varying its form. It is well that the Senate should understand all these amendments, so that they may take their choice between them.

The Clerk read the proposed amendment, as follows:

That said State shall be entitled to one Representative in Congress, and no more, until a new census shall be taken; that of the three members already elected by the people of said State at the election held on the second Tuesday of October last, the one having the greatest number of legal votes at said election shall be the Representative aforesaid; that when said census shall be taken, if it appears that said State is entitled to two Representatives, agreeably to the present ratio, then one of the said three persons having the next greatest number of votes shall be entitled to his seat; and if said State shall be entitled under said census to three Representatives, then all of said persons so elected as aforesaid shall be entitled to seats in the House of Representatives: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall interfere with or affect the constitutional power of the House of Representatives to judge of the qualifications of either of said members so elected.

And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to cause a census of said State to be taken as soon as practicable, agreeably to the act approved February 26, 1857; and that the sum of ——— dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray the expenses of taking said census.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BIGGS.) The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri to strike out the second section, as it has been amended by the Senate, and to insert what he has proposed.

Mr. MASON. The amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri is to give to Minnesota three Representatives. I ask for the yeas and nays on that.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I desire to state to the Senate that my colleague, Governor SEWARD, is prevented from attending in his place here by sickness. He has been detained at his house, in this city, since Saturday last, by an attack of quinsy.

The question being taken on Mr. POLK's amendment by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 14, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bigler, Bright, Evans, Fitch, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Iverson, Jones, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Sidel, and Stuart—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Broderick, Brown, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Clay, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Foster, Hamlin, Harlan, Henderson, Houston, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Kennedy, King, Mason, Pearce, Trumbull, Wade, Wilson, Wright, and Yulee—34.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FITCH. I believe the Senator from Georgia has given notice of an amendment, for the first section of which I wish to offer a substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no pending amendment.

Mr. FITCH. Well, sir, I offer this amendment as a substitute for the second section of the bill:

That said State be entitled to two Representatives in Congress until a new census be taken; that of the three members already elected by the people of said State at the election held on the second Tuesday of October last, the two having received the greatest number of legal votes at said election shall be the Representatives aforesaid; and that when said census shall be taken again, as herein provided, if it appears that said State is entitled to three Representatives, agreeably to the present ratio of representation, then the other of the said three Representatives elected at the election aforesaid, in October last, shall be entitled to a seat in the House of Representatives.

And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to cause a census of said State to be taken as soon as practicable, agreeably to the act approved February 26, 1857; and that the sum of ——— dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray the expenses of taking the said census.

Mr. PUGH. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Indiana to the fact that his amendment, as I think, contains an inadmissible proposition. I do not think the Senate has a right to decide upon the election of the Representatives from the State of Minnesota. I think that is a question exclusively for the House of Representatives.

Mr. FITCH. That objection struck me; but I think it is untenable. As, however, the Senate have just voted down a proposition to give the people of Minnesota what I think they are fairly entitled to—three Representatives—I have proposed this amendment, in the hope of securing a majority of the Senate to give them something like an approximation to justice. I should really prefer the amendment I now hold in my hand as a substitute for the second section, to what I have already offered. I will offer this amendment, or have it read, at all events, for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment of the Senator from Indiana will be read, the former one being withdrawn.

The Clerk read the following substitute for the second section:

That said State shall be entitled to three Representatives in Congress during this session, and thereafter to such number of Representatives as the census herein provided for shall entitle it to, according to the present ratio of representation.

Mr. PUGH. If the Senator will strike out "session," and say "Congress," I have no objection to it. They are elected for this Congress, if elected at all.

Mr. FITCH. I have no objection to that.

Mr. PUGH. Then I am perfectly satisfied with the amendment.

Mr. COLLAMER. In case the second section of the bill is stricken out, the census to which the amendment refers as "herein provided" to be taken, will not be provided.

Mr. FITCH. The Senator from Vermont misunderstands this amendment. It is to adopt this provision with the second section of the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, providing for a census.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will read the proposed amendment of the Senator from Indiana, as modified.

The Clerk read the amendment, which is to strike out the second section of the bill after the enacting clause, and insert:

That said State shall be entitled to three Representatives in Congress during the present Congress, and thereafter to such number of Representatives as the census herein provided for shall entitle it to, according to the present ratio of representation.

And he further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to cause a census of said State to be taken as soon as practicable, agreeably to the act approved February 26, 1857, and that the sum of — dollars be, and the same is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated, to defray the expenses of taking the said census.

Mr. STUART. I wish to suggest an amendment, which, I presume, the Senator from Indiana will agree to, to strike out the words "And be it enacted," before the clause providing for a census, so as to leave the whole amendment one section, and then strike out that portion which contemplates an appropriation. We can make an appropriation in a general appropriation bill if this duty should be devolved on the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. FITCH. The portion which the Senator from Michigan proposes to strike out was in the amendment of the Senator from Georgia. If he has no objection to the modification, I have not.

Mr. IVERSON. I have no objection to that.

Mr. FITCH. That makes it one section.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move to amend the amendment, by striking out "three" and inserting "two."

Mr. FITCH. I believe the amendment, as it now stands modified, is nearly the same in substance as that offered by the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. Toombs.] It was not in order at the time it was offered; but it was subsequently offered by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. Polk,] and withdrawn, and a naked proposition submitted to give Minnesota three Representatives. Having failed in that, for which I voted, I prefer this.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will read the amendment as now proposed by the Senator from Indiana.

The Clerk read the amendment; which is to strike out all after the enacting clause of the second section of the bill, and insert:

That said State shall be entitled to three Representatives in Congress during this Congress, and thereafter to only such number of Representatives as the census herein provided for, shall entitle it to, according to the present ratio of representation; and that it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to cause a census of said State to be taken as soon as practicable, agreeably to the act approved February 26, 1857.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This is the amendment as proposed by the Senator from Indiana, to strike out the second section of the bill and insert what has just been read. The Senator from Wisconsin moves to amend by striking out "three" and inserting "two."

Mr. IVERSON. Is that in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Certainly it is in order to perfect this as a substitute for the section in the original bill. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin to strike out "three" and insert "two."

Mr. MASON. I think the history of this bill will be an important one before the country at a future day, and I desire, therefore, that we should preserve a complete record of the action of the Senate. I ask for the yeas and nays on this motion.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I desire to ask the Chair whether an amendment in the third degree is in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This is not an amendment in the third degree. The second section is now in the bill. The Senator from Indiana proposes to strike out the second section and insert what he has proposed. The Senator from Wisconsin proposes to amend that amendment by striking out "three" and inserting "two." The question is on that motion of the Senator from Wisconsin. Upon this question the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am disposed to concede to Minnesota everything that she ought to expect or to desire. Surely it cannot be the desire of any new State, about to enter the Union, to be admitted in an unconstitutional manner. It is conceded on all hands that the members returned from Minnesota were not elected in a legal and proper mode. They were elected by general ticket, and not by single districts, as the law requires. That was done in total disregard of law. Can they claim to be entitled to seats in the other House, when they come forward asking for them in violation of law? Has the Senate power to create Representatives for the several States or Territories? Surely not. That is a right which belongs to the people, according to certain legal forms and regulations; and unless they are elected in that way, their election is void. I say, then, that not one of those persons who claim to be Representatives from the State or the Territory of Minnesota has any right to a seat in the House of Representatives according to law. Then, has the Senate the right to create Representatives? If it has not, it has no power to say who shall be admitted, or to determine which of these gentlemen shall be entitled to a seat in the other House. It belongs to the people of Minnesota, not to the Senate of the United States, not to the House of Representatives, to say who shall be elected. All these gentlemen may be admitted; but can it be done legally? I think not. If they are not legally entitled to seats, can you admit them as a matter of grace and favor? Have the Congress of the United States any right to extend to States or Territories privileges of this kind as favors? I insist that they have not, and that these men, if we are to have any regard to the Constitution and the laws of the country, must be returned to their constituency. If, on their being returned, the people of Minnesota elect them in obedience to the Constitution, well and good. I say they have no right to elect more than one member, because the Constitution and the law give them no right to more than one. If you are, through a spirit of accommodation, to disregard the Constitution and the laws of the land, I know not what limit you are to set to favoritism and to kindness. I should be very glad to extend a favor to these gentlemen, if I could; but I cannot disregard the Constitution and the law.

What is the urgent necessity demanding of you this extraordinary stretch of power? If we do not allow Minnesota three members, will she not be represented in the Senate, and will not her Delegate continue in the other House? If he, in years past, could render to the Territory all the assistance necessary—and we have never heard of any complaint being made—certainly, with the aid of two Senators, that Delegate can attend to the interests of Minnesota until her members be admitted in the other House.

I never will give a vote here to extend, by construction, the powers of this body. No man ought to do it who regards the laws and the Constitution of his country. If you are to do it on the score of expediency or favor, because you suppose one State has a population much greater than is reported, do you not open a door by which you make yourselves judges of construction, and legislate upon false or supposititious premises, that would destroy the foundations of any government on earth? The proper way is to admit the State, and let those gentlemen who have been sent here as her Representatives return, and let one member be elected by the people; or, if the census will justify it, let two be elected in separate districts. Is it any objection that this will require a little time? Shall such a consideration induce us to infringe the Constitution? In two years, sir, in 1860, the general census will be taken; and surely there is no great emergency by which injustice will be done to Minnesota, by allowing her only one Representative in the mean time. Certainly I can see nothing which should warrant a departure from those sound rules which have heretofore governed us. I do not see any ground on which even a single one of the persons who have been sent here from Minnesota can claim to be a member of the House of Representatives. How are you to determine who shall be accepted as a member of that House? Where is your constitutional authority to say that that one of the three who received the highest number of votes shall be admitted? I cannot find any such authority; and, not finding it, I shall not vote for such a provision. Whatever I can do, under the sanction of the Constitution and the laws, towards a new State, I will do for it with a great deal of pleasure; but when I am called upon to violate the Constitution and the laws, I cannot and I will not do it.

Mr. KING. I feel reluctant to vote between these two propositions, for I am opposed to voting for either two or three. I entirely concur with the Senator from Texas that the number of Representatives from this new State of Minnesota ought not to be determined as a matter of favor by the Senate. It is a question which is to be determined by the number of their population, and is settled by the Constitution, which, by our oaths, we are bound to regard as the rule of apportionment to them.

The bill, as reported from the committee, proposes to give them one Representative, which the Constitution requires that they should have as the least number, and as many more as their population will entitle them to. Well, they have had a census taken there. It is said that it is imperfect, but it is the best information that we can have. If there be other evidence that can be had by the House of Representatives, let them determine upon that testimony and according to the population. The Constitution furnishes a rule which we have no right whatever to vary. It is no matter of favor or disfavor to Minnesota, or, at least, ought not to be. I shall not vote with any such feeling; but simply with a view to admit the State of Minnesota, as I intend to vote to admit the State, with the number of Representatives to which she is entitled. She has a right to justice, but she has a right to nothing more; and I have no idea that her people would desire anything more as good citizens of the country. I think it better, instead of attempting to determine the number here, that we leave the question to the House of Representatives, passing it, as we have done in the bill, and leaving it indefinite. I shall so vote. I have only made these remarks because I feel embarrassed in undertaking to determine between three and two. I am unwilling to determine any number beyond one. I am prepared to give her one, because she is clearly entitled to that, and perhaps to two; but there is no evidence yet before us to show that she is.

Mr. HALE. I feel very little interest in this matter, but I am placed somewhat in the position of the Senator from New York, in voting upon this amendment. I prefer the bill as it stood originally, allowing Minnesota to have what every other State has—what she is constitutionally entitled to. If you go beyond that, and confer favors on her, I know of no rule to measure them. If we are going by favor, I do not know but we might as well give her three as two. I am opposed to giving her anything; I do not conceive that I have a right to do so. There is a contract. She has a right to one. The Constitution gives her that; and, by the enabling act, she has a right to as many more as the census—not the guess of members—shows her entitled to; and if we are going to give her anything, I think we had better give three. If we are going to make a present, let us go the whole figure. At the same time, I do not feel at liberty to vote for three; and I am opposed to giving anything. We have nothing here to give. We are not here almoners of anybody's bounty, but guardians of constitutional rights. The constitution gives one member; let her have it. If she is entitled to two by her census, let her have them; or if to three, be it so, I shall not find fault; but I will not give any. For that reason, I am opposed to the amendment, and to the amendment to the amendment.

The question being taken by yeas and nays on Mr. DOOLITTLE's amendment to the amendment of Mr. FITCH, resulted—yeas 11, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Biggs, Chandler, Clark, Dixon, Doolittle, Evans, Hammond, Kennedy, Mason, and Thompson of Kentucky—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benjamin, Bright, Broderick, Cameron, Clay, Collamer, Crittenden, Fessenden, Fitch, Foot, Foster, Green, Gwin, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Pearce, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Simmons, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Trumbull, Wade, Wilson, Wright, and Yulee—33.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana as a substitute for the second section.

Mr. WILSON. I move to strike out so much of the amendment as proposes to take the census, so that the proposition will provide for three Representatives simply.

Several SENATORS. Vote it all down together.

Mr. WILSON. Well, I withdraw the motion.

Mr. CHANDLER called for the yeas and nays on the amendment; and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 14, nays 36; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bigler, Bright, Fitch, Green, Gwin, Iverson, Jones, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Stuart, Wright, and Yulee—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Broderick, Brown, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Clay, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Evans, Fessenden, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Hammond, Harlan, Henderson, Houston, Johnson of Tennessee, Kennedy, King, Mason, Pearce, Simmons, Thompson of Kentucky, Thomson of New Jersey, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—36.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FITCH. I take the two last votes to be an indication of a determination on the part of the Senate not to grant the new State its three Representatives; and I now move my other amendment, providing for two with certain conditions. The amendment is to strike out all of the second section after the enacting clause and insert—

That said State shall be entitled to two Representatives in Congress until a new census be taken; that of the three members already elected by the people of said State, at the election held on the second Tuesday of October last, the two having received the greatest number of legal votes at said election shall be the Representatives aforesaid; and that when said census shall be taken again, as herein provided, if it appears that said State is entitled to three Representatives, agreeably to the present ratio of representation, then the other of the said three Representatives elected at the election aforesaid in October last shall be entitled to his seat in the House of Representatives; and that it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to cause a census of said State to be taken as soon as practicable, agreeably to the act approved February 26, 1857.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HALE. I am not going to make a speech, but in one word to express my objection to the amendment. I think it is an infringement of the constitutional prerogative of the House of Representatives, who are made the exclusive judges of the election of their own members. There are three men claiming to be elected; and the Senate undertakes to step in by this amendment and say which two of the three are entitled to seats. For that reason, if for no other, I must go against the amendment.

Mr. FITCH. I think the objection urged by the Senator from New Hampshire has been urged here before, and it was met by the response that it was a matter pertaining to both branches, as these were Representatives in Congress; but I am willing to add to the amendment the proviso which was attached by the Senator from Georgia, "provided that nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the House from deciding on the election and qualification of its members;" if that will satisfy him.

Mr. HALE. No, sir.

Mr. BRIGHT. The Senator from New Hampshire says he regards this as a clear infringement of the constitutional rights of the House of Representatives. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. Mason] calls for the yeas and nays on the amendment, he says, for the purpose of making a record that may be referred to hereafter as a precedent. Now let us, at least, be consistent with ourselves. Congress admitted California with two Representatives without any previous law. There was no census showing whether she had one or ten thousand people; yet we admitted that State with two members, and no Senator, that I recollect, objected to her admission on that ground. Why, I ask, then, this stringent, illiberal view of the claims of Minnesota?

Mr. HALE. Allow me a moment. The Senator misunderstands the force of my objection. It is not that it gives them two Representatives, but that of the three who present the records of their election, we undertake to step in and say which two of the three are entitled to seats. That is my objection.

Mr. BRIGHT. I do not so understand it. The House of Representatives will determine who are the legally elected members from the State seeking admission. Further, if the House should determine that Minnesota is entitled to less than three members, I will not say that it is not in the power of the three gentlemen claiming seats to determine, among themselves, which of the three will present themselves for admission. I believe they can, and will.

Mr. FITCH. With the leave of my colleague, I wish to tell the Senator from New Hampshire, that he is very decidedly mistaken in this matter. We simply declare those elected who are elected by the returns, and have the highest vote. We do not assume to set aside the returns in any one case. We propose to recognize those who come here with the highest legal vote.

Mr. BRIGHT. Mr. President, I am claiming no more for the State of Minnesota than I think she is entitled to, I will not say by the record, but by the record and the facts, which are before us in a form that we cannot shut our eyes to. The returns of the marshals show about one hundred and forty-three thousand population. It is admitted that six of the counties are without any returns; that in one of the counties, where about three hundred votes were polled at the late election, only about fifty persons are returned; thus furnishing very unsatisfactory data to guide us in the settlement of such important rights as are involved in this case.

Notwithstanding the anxiety I feel to see Minnesota admitted as a State, I would not depart from what I regard safe and legitimate rules and precedents, much less permit an infraction of any constitutional provision; and if I believed we were doing either I should not have voted as I have done. I believe, from the late vote taken in that Territory, allowing five inhabitants for every voter, (which I believe is the acknowledged mode of computation,) that Minnesota has at least two hundred thousand population, and it would not surprise me, if an immediate census, as proposed to be taken by one of the amendments offered, should demonstrate that she has two hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants. Senators say, however, that this is all conjectural, and that we cannot take notice of facts outside of the law and the returns made under the law. I answer, Congress has done so heretofore; and the case of California, which I have referred to, proves it. Again, it is not altogether the fault of the proper authorities in Minnesota that the law directing a full return of her population has not been made. The means necessary to pay for this service were not furnished by the General Government; and the time allotted was too short in which to perform the labor required. All these considerations weigh upon my mind, and incline me to favor, as far as I can, what has been done by that people, even though it has not been done in as formal and satisfactory a manner as could have been desired.

I shall vote willingly to allow this enterprising population three Representatives; and in so doing feel that I am not violating principle, departing from any constitutional landmarks, or setting a precedent that can hereafter be construed, in any way, to the prejudice of the States or Territories.

Mr. MASON. I do not see any mode by which the constitutional objection to this amendment can be evaded. This proviso, that it shall not be construed as it must necessarily be construed, amounts to very little. It is, in my judgment, not only unconstitutional, but it is intrusive; because it is trenching on the authority of the other House, given to it by the Constitution, to determine upon the elections, qualifications, and returns of its own members. But what can we expect? How can it be possible to do an unconstitutional thing in any other than an unconstitutional manner? The unconstitutional thing sought to be done is to give to this State a representation based upon anything but her population ascertained by law. That is the constitutional mode of doing it; and if you seek to do it in any other mode, you necessarily infringe the Constitution; and all evasions—I do not mean to characterize them harshly—but all attempts to show that we have not done unconstitutionally that which we have done must be futile.

On a former day, I gave my impressions to the Senate in a very feeble manner, to show, as I thought, that strict law would give them but one Representative; but yet I am free to admit, that without a violation of the Constitution certainly, upon the census which has been taken, we might with some show of propriety at least give them two members, because upon the census as returned, they have a very large fraction over the representative number, and although fractions are not by law a subject of representation directly, yet they have been made indirectly and necessarily so by giving a portion of representation to fractions in the manner prescribed by the apportionment law. I should be willing, therefore, to go so far as to give them two members; but we must leave to the other House to judge who those two shall be. The House of Representatives may decide, and in my judgment they would decide correctly, that the election which has been made of Representatives in Minnesota is altogether void. They had no power to elect Representatives according to my impression unless the enabling statute gave it to them. No Territory can elect Representatives to Congress, and the House may decide that the whole election is void. But for us to undertake to prescribe to the other House how they shall discriminate between those who claim to be elected, is to prescribe to the House how they shall decide upon the elections, qualifications, and returns of their members. I do not see how we can escape the constitutional objection.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. Fessenden] has called my attention to the California law, which provides simply that there should be two members, without saying who those two members should be. I say again, I do not see how I can be answered when I suggest that it is competent to the House of Representatives to say that there has been no election; and therefore this is a proposition to trench on the prerogatives of the House. The Constitution gives to the House the power to decide on that question; and we cannot control them, and ought not to attempt to control them; far less ought we to attempt to say, amongst the three, whom the House shall attempt to select. But these are difficulties into which we must be plunged when the attempt is made to do that which the Constitution does not allow.

The honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. Bright] says he has no doubt in his own mind that they are entitled to three Representatives by their population. I do not know what information the honorable Senator possesses; but if I were permitted to confide to the uttermost in his sagacity, his means of information, and his power, to judge of that information, the Constitution and the law forbid me to do it. I can know their representation only by the law—in no other way; that law which has ordered a census. I can see no earthly use in having another census, because we have had one; and from the character of that population, judging from what they have done, their entire ignorance of the Constitution and the laws of the country, or their utter disregard of them, I should take for granted that if we give them one, two, or three additional censuses, we shall have exactly the same doubts and the same charges of a denial of justice that we have now.

The honorable Senator from Indiana did me injustice in the reason he ascribed to me in asking for the yeas and nays to make a record of this case. It is not for a future precedent in the Senate. God knows we have precedents enough, beginning with the California case. The honorable Senator is wrong in supposing there were not those who protested against allowing two Representatives to California. If he will look back to the record, he will find that the yeas and nays were recorded on that; and I, in a minority, was voting against allowing more than one Representative to California. It is not for the guidance of Congress. Sir, I want these votes to be upon the record, that the country may see what the Government is about, how we construe the law of the Constitution, and how we administer it—the enlightened minds of the country, in every State of this Union, who can appreciate the character of our institutions, and will compel their Representatives in some way to adhere to them and to preserve them. I want the enlightened men of the country to see what I am afraid I see here, that although this Government is yet little more than seventy years old, it is in an absolute state of decrepitude and decay. Questions of constitutional law are determined purely by political expediency, leaving it in the power of a future Congress, if these proceedings are recognized and tolerated, if there is any political end to be attained, to give to a new State twenty, or thirty, or fifty Representatives, in order to carry a measure. Sir, it is for these reasons that I want this to go upon the record; that the American mind, the community north and south, east and west, may see the actual decrepitude and decay into which the Government has fallen here, within seventy years of its birth.

I shall vote in such a manner as to endeavor to make the bill conform to my opinions, although they may be peculiar, of what are our constitutional duties, and with a single eye to that. I certainly can give no vote on any consideration that would trench on the constitutional duties or the constitutional rights of the correlative branch of Congress.

Mr. GREEN. I do not see any ground for raising a constitutional question with regard to the manner in which the Representatives have been elected by the State at large rather than by single districts. Although the appointment law in 1841 required Representatives to be elected by single districts, that law, by the practice of the Government, and by the solemn decision of the House of Representatives, was decided to be unconstitutional so far as it required the States to district. It was called, in the popular language of the day, the mandamus act. No one in the popular branch of Congress made such an able argument proving that fact as the distinguished Representative from Virginia, Mr. Dromgoole. It was then decided that the constitutional power of Congress to fix the time, place, and manner of choosing Representatives did not include, under the word "manner," the right to command a State to district; and Congress itself never did district. It was therefore called a mandamus act.

But whether that be so or not Congress has never required the State of Minnesota to district, and therefore her act in electing by general ticket contravenes no law. The enabling act said to her, "you may elect one, and as many more as your population may show you to be entitled to." Therefore Congress said to the State of Minnesota, "you may elect more than one if you have population to justify it," and did not prescribe the manner in which they should do it, and hence they could elect by general ticket if they thought proper to do so. I think, then, the idea of a constitutional or legal objection springing up in regard to the manner of election is altogether out of the question.

It is, then, competent for Congress to admit the State. It is the duty of Congress, as I think, and not of one House, to prescribe the number of Representatives to which the State shall be entitled. The particular individual who shall fill the office of Representative is to be determined by the House of Representatives alone; but the number of offices to be filled Congress must determine by the act of admission. It then comes back to this one point, what population has the State of Minnesota, so as to determine the number of Representatives to which she shall be entitled? There is a census return which proves a population of one hundred and forty-two thousand, with five counties not heard from, and two counties only partially heard from; and we have certain evidence before us that the census was imperfectly taken.

If we confine ourselves to the actual returns of the census, we should allow one member for ninety-three thousand four hundred and twenty inhabitants; and Minnesota has, in addition to this number, a fraction larger than some other States who now have Representatives in the other House for fractions. I will give a list of the States represented by fractions: Massachusetts has one member for a fraction of sixty thousand; Rhode Island has a fraction of fifty-four thousand and has a member representing the State for it. Connecticut has a large fraction, ninety thousand. Pennsylvania has a fraction of sixty-nine thousand, and a member representing that fraction. Maryland has a member for a fraction of seventy-nine thousand. North Carolina has a fraction of forty-seven thousand, and a member representing that fraction. Alabama has a fraction of seventy-three thousand, and a member for that fraction. Tennessee has a fraction of sixty-six thousand represented by a member. Kentucky has a fraction of fifty-seven thousand, and a member representing that fraction. Missouri has a member for a fraction of eighty-six thousand. Indiana has a fraction of fifty-four thousand, and a member representing it.

Here are fractions represented, one as low as fifty-four thousand, and another as low as forty-seven thousand, both under the law of the land. Minnesota, with a fraction larger than either of these, you say shall not be permitted to have more than one Representative, though you told her in the enabling act under which she undertook to form her State organization—whether she has complied with it or not, I do not now stop to inquire—that she should have more than one Representative if her population entitled her to it. What would be the equitable construction of the promise held out to Minnesota? Would it not clearly be that the same rule of justice which had been extended to other States should be accorded to her? She has a larger fraction than other States having Representatives for fractions, and it would be gross injustice to Minnesota to deny her a Representative for her fraction. So much legally for the law and equity of the case, from which there can be no possible escape, in my judgment. When, however, we take other information, independent of the legal returns before us, there is enough to justify us in believing that she has a representative population of far more than two hundred thousand. My friend from Indiana [Mr. BRIGGS] was mistaken in supposing the vote to be forty-six thousand. Forty thousand was the highest vote for State officers. The vote on the State constitution was between thirty-six and thirty-seven thousand, some six thousand of which were rejected on account of informalities. Forty thousand votes were cast for State officers, and according to the ordinary rule of proportion between voters and population, Minnesota would have at least two hundred thousand population; but I care nothing about that; I have shown you that if you confine yourself to the strictest letter of the law, she is entitled to two Representatives.

Mr. FITCH. I was correct, I find, on referring to the debate a few days since upon this question, in my recent statement that a proposition had been before made to limit the number of Representatives to two; and objections were made to it on the ground that it was for the House of Representatives to designate the number. The Senator from Missouri has correctly stated that we, as a coordinate branch of the Government, have a voice in fixing the number of Representatives. The objection to the manner in which I propose to admit these two members is, that by it the Senate undertakes to designate the individuals who shall be admitted. There is no such proposition in my amendment. It names no man. It proposes simply to admit, at present, the two members for whom the highest number of legal votes were cast at the October election in Minnesota; and probably that is the very means which the House of Representatives itself would indicate as the manner of selecting between the three.

It was said by the Senator from New Hampshire, who appears here as the peculiar guardian of the perquisites and honor and domain of the other House, that we are seeking to dictate to them how they shall select from these three. If this amendment be adopted, I fancy that when the bill goes to the House of Representatives with it, they will be found fully capable of guarding their own interests and their own perquisites; and if they take exception to our manner of providing for the election of these members, it will be for them to make those exceptions known, and send the bill back to us. The manner designated by us is a mere expression of our idea of the proper manner of selecting among these persons. If they object to that manner, they can indicate their own; but it is difficult to see, when the three Representatives present themselves there, all upon the same footing, with the same credentials, signed by the same officers, how the House is to select unless in the very manner I have indicated. Still I am not by any means wedded to that manner. I am perfectly willing that the amendment shall provide for the admission of those two whom the House may select. I intimated that I was not unwilling to insert at the end of the amendment a proviso that nothing in the act, as it may pass here, is intended, upon our part, to affect the right of the House of Representatives.

Mr. STUART. Allow me to interrupt the Senator. I think it would be better for him to modify his amendment by striking out that provision, and leave the House to settle the matter as it may choose, and perhaps it will take the very course he indicates. I suggest to him, that he strike out all that portion of his amendment which regulates the manner of selection.

Mr. FITCH. I was speaking of a proviso which I had indicated a willingness to add to the amendment, not because there would be any particular efficacy in the proviso, but simply to save any appearance of wounding the sensitiveness of members of the other House, which gentlemen appear to think the amendment, in its present shape, will do—a mere declaration on our part that we had no such intention. It would have no effect. Neither can the present phraseology of the amendment have the effect to limit the privileges of the House of Representatives. They can designate the manner for aught we can say, and if they take exceptions to our manner they can insert their own; but I have no objection whatever that the amendment should go down there, providing for the present admission of two members, without indicating any manner how the House shall select among the three—two during the present Congress, or for such time as the House shall fix, and providing for the admission of a third whenever the census shall show Minnesota to be entitled to the third. I propose, in my disposition to accommodate every gentleman here, if the amendment can be so shaped to do it, to amend it in such manner as to meet the objections of several.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays having been ordered, the Senator from Indiana can only modify his amendment by unanimous consent.

Mr. STUART. It is amendable. The Chair refers to the power to withdraw it.

Mr. FITCH. The modification which I believe would meet the views of the chairman of the Committee on Territories—and certainly his opinion here is entitled to some considerable weight as I understand he initiated the admission of Minnesota into the Union—would make the amendment read:

That said State be entitled to two Representatives in Congress until a new census be taken; that of the three members already elected by the people of the State at the election held on the second Tuesday of October last, two shall be the Representatives aforesaid: and that when said census shall be taken again as herein provided, if it appear that such State is entitled to three Representatives agreeably to the present ratio of apportionment, then the other of the said three shall be entitled to a seat.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The latter clause I cannot sanction. In the first place, we have no official evidence before us that anybody has been elected. In the next place the Senate has no power to look into the question and say whether anybody has been elected. By the Constitution of the United States, that is solely left to the House of Representatives. I therefore am not willing to say that two have been elected, or that three have been elected, or that one has been elected. I am willing to assert merely that Minnesota shall be entitled to two Representatives, and leave all else to the House of Representatives.

Mr. FITCH. I apprehend that the effect of the amendment of the Senator from Illinois would be to limit them arbitrarily to two members.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am willing, then, to agree to a subsequent clause that a new census shall be taken, and, after a new census, she shall be entitled to whatever number that census shows. I am willing that that provision be added. I would provide that, until a new census is taken, she shall be entitled to two, and, after a new census, she shall be entitled to the number that census shall show.

Mr. FITCH. I will modify the amendment, so as to read:

That said State be entitled to two Representatives in Congress until a new census be taken; and if, when the new census shall be taken, as herein provided, it shall appear that said State is entitled to three Representatives, according to the present ratio of representation, then another Representative shall be entitled to admission.

Mr. COLLAMER. If I understand the proposition now presented, it is, that the State shall be entitled to two Representatives until a census is taken, and then such number as that census shall show her to be entitled to. The second section of the bill, as originally reported, allows one Representative, and such other number as the census should entitle her to, according to the original act. That was amended by inserting a provision directing the census to be retaken. When that section was under consideration the other day, the honorable Senator from North Carolina, now in the chair, [Mr. BIGGS,] moved to strike out "one," and insert "two." That is exactly the proposition now presented, and that was rejected by a vote of the Senate upon the yeas and nays. If there is any difference between the two propositions, I should like to know wherein it consists.

Mr. STUART. I may not remember distinctly, but my recollection is that it differs in this: if the amendment moved by the Senator from North Carolina had prevailed, the section, as it then stood, would have left it to be determined by the census that has already been taken, when the returns shall have been made complete; but the proposition now pending is to give two members, and provide for another census, which is certainly a different proposition within the meaning of parliamentary rules, and is in order.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If I understand the position of this bill, an amendment has already been adopted, on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON,] providing for retaking the census in Minnesota; and I suppose the decision of the point of order will depend on the fact whether the motion of the Senator from North Carolina was made after the adoption of that amendment, or before it. But, sir, I prefer the bill as it was reported by the committee. The bill, as reported, gives to Minnesota one Representative, and as many more as the census shows her to be entitled to. Is not that fair? Is not that all that the people of Minnesota ought to ask, or have a right to ask?

It is said that the census is not fair, is not full. This has been assumed so many times in the debate, without any sort of evidence, that I am apprehensive that the country will get to believe that the census was not fair. I apprehend, sir, that the census which has been taken is as fair as any new census which could be taken, and especially if a new census is to be taken for the very purpose of increasing their representation in Congress. If you send out a commission to take a new census to ascertain how many members they shall hereafter be entitled to, I am inclined to think you will have practiced over again the frauds of Kansas, and another controversy here as to the regularity of the census.

Upon what ground is it that the census now taken is assailed? Surely not upon the authority of the letter which was read the other day from the marshal of Minnesota. He says it was difficult to get persons to take the census, and he gives an excuse for not taking it as promptly as would have been desirable. That is all. It is assumed by some here that Congress undertook to take a census in Minnesota, and has not done it, and therefore the fault is ours. It is true that we undertook to take a census in case the people of Minnesota should determine to form a State constitution, and ask admission into the Union; but did Congress undertake to take a census before the State of Minnesota was admitted? Did Congress say to the Territory of Minnesota that it might go on and elect three Representatives or one Representative? Congress declared that a census should be taken after Minnesota had determined upon a State constitution, to ascertain how many members she should be entitled to in the House of Representatives; but Congress did not agree to do this while she was a Territory; and she has not been authorized to elect members at all. I think there is no doubt of the position assumed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BROWN] the other day, and repeated by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MASON] to-day, that the election, both of Senators and Representatives, by the Territory of Minnesota, is a void election, if you look to the Constitution. The Constitution authorizes the Legislatures of States, not of Territories, to elect Senators; it authorizes Representatives to be elected by the people of the States, not by the people of Territories; and if this were a new question, if the practice had not been different, I apprehend there would be no diversity of opinion in regard to it. It may be, however, that by a sort of fiction Congress may be justified in admitting to seats those who have been elected on the ground that the admission, when it takes place, has relation back to the time when the people framed their constitution; and in that way, by a sort of legal fiction, give validity to these elections. But there is no fault on the part of Congress in not having taken the census at an earlier day. The difficulty is, that these persons were elected as members of Congress before the people of Minnesota were entitled to elect. There is no evidence in the letter which has been read that the census was improperly taken. The only evidence that letter contains is such as the officer gives as an excuse for not having more speedily performed his duty.

Now, sir, we have a census from nearly the whole of this Territory, with the exception of some three or four counties only, and those counties without any considerable population. When the bill was reported by the Committee on Territories, there were seven counties deficient, but the returns of some of the counties have since been received. This census, I apprehend, is a fair one. I see nothing to impeach it; for the suggestion that a large vote has been given, so far from impeaching the correctness of the census, impeaches the validity of the vote. That is the truth about it. Hundreds and thousands of votes were returned in Minnesota where there was no population to give them. This is the charge made in Minnesota, upon sworn testimony, published in the public prints of that Territory—that fictitious returns have been made there; and this accounts for the large vote where there is a small population. I apprehend that if we pass the bill as it came from the Committee on Territories, we shall do justice to the people of Minnesota, and injustice to no one. Then if, as the Senator from Missouri says, the fraction entitles them to a second Representative, let them have it; it is right that they should have it, but if it does not so entitle them, let them have the one Representative. It seems to me that we cannot better the bill by any amendment which has been proposed to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is the amendment of the Senator from Indiana. The Senator from Vermont raises the question whether it is in order to move this amendment at the present time.

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not wish to trouble the Chair with the question of order, as I learn that the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts was added to the section after the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina was rejected.

The Clerk read the amendment of Mr. FITCH, as modified, as follows:

Strike out the second section, after the enacting clause, and insert:

That said State be entitled to two Representatives in Congress until a new census be taken, which census shall be taken again, as herein provided; and if it appears by said census that said State is entitled to three Representatives, agreeably to the present ratio of representation, then another Representative shall be entitled to his seat. And that it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to cause a census of said State to be taken as soon as practicable, agreeably to the act approved February 26, 1857.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to say that I have paid off on this question with the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. HAMMOND.]

The question being taken by yeas and nays upon Mr. FITCH's amendment, resulted—yeas 20, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Broderick, Brown, Douglas, Evans, Fitch, Green, Gwin, Iverson, Jones, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Sidel, Stuart, and Wright—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benjamin, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Durkee, Fessenden, Fitzpatrick, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Henderson, Houston, Johnson of Tennessee, Kennedy, King, Pearce, Simmons, Thomson of New Jersey, Trumbull, Wade, Wilson, and Yulee—27.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PUGH. I believe the pending question now is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] to strike out the second section of the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the pending amendment—to strike out the second section entirely.

Mr. PUGH. It seems to me that we might as well admit the State of Minnesota, and leave the question of her representation to a subsequent bill; which will be the effect, I think, of striking out this section, for I am satisfied that, in the present disposition of the Senate, there is scarcely a majority for any proposition. I do not know how it is, but we have voted down one Representative, two Representatives, and three Representatives, simply delaying the admission of the State. I hope we shall either pass the bill, striking out this section, or that a joint resolution will be proposed admitting the State; and then, on the completion of this census, or the ordering of another census, we can fix the representation. Her Senators, at all events, are entitled to be in this Chamber. For I do not concur with gentlemen who entertain the idea that Minnesota has violated any constitutional doctrine in electing her Senators and Representatives. I believe the proper method intended by the Constitution of the United States, for electing Representatives, was by a general ticket. I have no doubt that the States have a right to subdivide themselves; but I do not believe Congress has any authority whatever to require a State to be subdivided into congressional districts; and I think Minnesota, if a State in the Union, would have a perfect right to disregard it as other States have done. As to the election of her Senators, she is a State from the day her constitution is adopted; and the moment she is received into the Union her Senators are entitled to be sworn in. No matter whether elected before or after her admission, they are her Senators.

Mr. MASON. If the Senator will allow me, I will say this: as I understand it, the objection is not that she has made one district of the entire State; but the objection is that she has elected at all; that she has made any election. Minnesota is a Territory. That is the objection. I do not know of any objection to her districting.

Mr. PUGH. That is where I think the Senator is mistaken. The Congress of the United States have authorized her to form a State government. Is she a Territory now? Then you cannot admit her. You cannot admit a Territory. You must admit a State. If she is not a State you cannot admit her. You have authorized her to form a State government, and she has formed it.

Mr. HAMLIN. Suppose we do not admit her, what will she be?

Mr. PUGH. Then you reject her. She is a State yet. You have made a State out of her. She has ceased to be a Territory. By your enabling act you have made her a State. I put the question again, can you admit Territories into the Union? She must be a State or you cannot admit her. She has a right to choose her Senators as she pleases, in the absence of an act of Congress, at whatever time she pleases.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PUGH. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask him whether it is in the power of Congress to authorize a State to form a constitution and be an independent sovereignty out of the Union?

Mr. PUGH. Certainly; can we not alienate our territory? We have done it.

Mr. IVERSON. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. PUGH. Certainly.

Mr. IVERSON. I desire to ask Senators on the other side if they did not vote to admit Mr. Shields and Mr. Rice as Senators from Minnesota, under a proposition of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN?]

Mr. HALE. I did not; I am one on this side.

Mr. HAMLIN. Nor I.

Mr. PUGH. The question was debated in the Committee on the Judiciary; I do not know that we arrived at a definite conclusion on that point. I know some of us were of opinion—that was my opinion, and it was the opinion of at least one other member of the committee—that Minnesota was a State, but not a State in the Union; that, not having complied with every condition of the enabling act, she was not in the Union. But if she had complied with it, if she had held a convention of the proper number of delegates, and formed her constitution, it was my opinion then, and it is now, that she would be entitled to have her Senators sworn in without any further act of admission. I ask Senators why it is that we make fish of one, and flesh of another? That was the case of my State. There was nothing else ever done for her but to pass an enabling act; and that was the first enabling act that was ever passed. It is the example from which all the rest come. It was in the time of Mr. Jefferson. It was considered by the ablest statesmen of this country; and their excuse for the enabling act, their idea of the enabling act, was, that it was an act of admission beforehand, to become complete, and the admission to become perfect, on the performance of a condition subsequent. When Ohio performed the condition, held her convention, made her constitution, and sent it here, it was referred to a select committee, to examine into the question; and the committee reported that she was a State in the Union, and that there was nothing more necessary than to establish a district court. I have said that five or six times this session; but it is a vital fact in all this controversy. Her Senators presented their credentials, and took their seats.

If you say that Minnesota is now a Territory, Ohio is a Territory too, for she never had any act of admission. The State of Minnesota has been created by your authority; you defined her limits. She has not perfectly complied with the conditions on which you agreed to receive her into the Union, but she has complied with the conditions on which you agreed she should be a State; she has formed her State government; and now the question is, shall we, the Senators from other States, fix the time of her election for Senators? We have no power to do that. We can, by general law, provide for the time of election in all the States, but we never have done it. It belongs to the Legislature of the State of Minnesota to fix the time, place, and manner of electing her Senators and her Representatives, and to nobody else. We here, in a judicial capacity, hereafter may sit on the question of the regularity of this election. We have no power to sit on it in any legislative capacity. The other House may sit in judgment on the question of the election of a Representative, in a judicial capacity.

Now, shall we go on protracting this anomalous condition of things? Here is a State formed by our direction and consent, a State out of the Union, a State with her Legislature in session, passing laws; and on the question of whether the census was rightfully taken or wrongly taken, we are to protract the discussion indefinitely. I hope we shall simply ignore the question of the number of her Representatives; give her some representation in this branch if we cannot in the other; or leave that as a question of privilege to the other House; strike out the entire section; let the enabling act stand. That is the last legislation of Congress.

That provided that she should have one Representative, and as many more as the census should entitle her to. If it is a fair census, that fixes it. If it is an unfair census, let the House of Representatives decide that question. I hope the motion of the Senator from Illinois, to strike out the whole section, will now be carried.

Mr. IVERSON. Is the bill now open to amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Since the motion of the Senator from Illinois was made to strike out the second section, there has been an amendment to that section, but the Chair understands the effect of the motion to be to strike out the entire section as amended.

Mr. IVERSON. I wish to offer a substitute for the section:

That said State shall be entitled to two Representatives in Congress, until the next apportionment of Representatives amongst the several States.

I offer this naked proposition for two Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Georgia is in order, being a proposition to perfect the section.

Mr. IVERSON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 23, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Broderick, Brown, Douglas, Evans, Fitch, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Slidell, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, and Wright—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Benjamin, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Clay, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Henderson, Houston, King, Pearce, Simmons, Trumbull, Wade, Wilson, and Yulice—26.

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Illinois to strike out the entire second section.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I withdraw my motion, as the whole question has been voted upon.

Mr. PUGH. I renew the motion to strike out the second section.

Mr. COLLAMER. I desire to renew the objection which I before made to striking out this section, because I still retain the same opinion in relation to it which I then expressed. I do not think the motion which is now made necessarily involves the question whether the Territory has become a State, or is in a transition condition. The honorable Senator from Ohio was led into the discussion of that from some interrogatories put to him. But, sir, the Senate has never passed upon that question. It was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and the committee were unanimous in the conclusion that Minnesota was not a State in the Union. I look upon it that when any action takes place by a Territory under an enabling act for the formation of a State—and I take the case of an enabling act because that is the strongest form in which it can be put—all its measures are subjunctive, dependent on the results of its being admitted. Everything is taken merely as an arrangement of a State dependent on that result; and if it is not admitted it goes for nothing. It is always subjunctive, dependent on the action of Congress. If Congress admit the State under the constitution it forms, all is effective; if not, it amounts to nothing. Therefore the proceedings taken in Minnesota under the enabling act, unless she be admitted by Congress, go for nothing; she is no State: she is no State out of the Union; she is no State at all.

But, sir, I come to the question, what will be the legal effect of striking out this section? The Senator from Ohio seems to take it for granted that the legal effect will be that the State will be admitted without any regulation for her representation, and that that will be a matter for future action. That is not my view of it; it is not the view entertained by the committee who reported this bill. The last legislation of Congress is the operative legislation on every subject. An enabling act was passed, authorizing the formation of a constitution in Minnesota. A constitution has been formed there by the people of that Territory, and it contains a provision that they shall be entitled to three Representatives in Congress. If we strike out the second section of this bill, and admit the State under that constitution, I take it that we allow her three Representatives; because the last legislation is the acceptance of the constitution claiming and providing for three Representatives. That will be the effect of passing this bill without this section; and I think that cannot be avoided. Gentlemen may differ with me in opinion on this point; but, in my estimation, not only will this be the legal effect, but it will certainly be the practical effect. If Senators are prepared for that, and mean to allow the three members, as I suppose some do, then strike out the section, and Minnesota will have the three. But if you leave the section as it is, she will have one certainly, and as many more as her census shows her to be entitled to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. As we are in the immediate neighborhood of Minnesota, the Representatives of Wisconsin feel of necessity an interest and a sympathy with this young State. I desire that justice shall be done to Minnesota; and I believe that the bill, as it was reported by the committee, with the amendment which has been already adopted, will do justice to her. I believe that she is entitled to more than one Representative; and the census would show it, if her population had been fairly enumerated. I believe that Minnesota has a population of over two hundred thousand. The census that has been taken, imperfect as it was, shows a population of one hundred and forty-two thousand. That is sufficient for one member, and leaves a very large fraction. There is other evidence going to show that her population is still greater than was returned by the census. I am satisfied from this fact, and from my own knowledge, that she would be entitled, upon a fair enumeration, to two Representatives; but the enabling act provided that she should be entitled to one Representative, and as many more as she should appear to be entitled to by a census then directed to be taken.

Such was the law. She has acted under that law; and the bill has been reported now to the Senate in the very words of the enabling act; and, inasmuch as there has been a difficulty in the taking of the census, the amendment which was moved by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Wilson] has provided for that difficulty by providing that there shall be a new enumeration and census of the Territory; and, if it shall appear that she has a much larger population than is shown by the present census, she shall be entitled to additional representation in proportion to the amount of that population. This does justice to Minnesota. In relation to the present persons who have been elected, or who claim to have been elected as Representatives from Minnesota, I understand that the House of Representatives, on their application, will decide the question.

The bill as it stands declares that she shall have one member, and as many more as she is entitled to by the census which is to be taken. If the House of Representatives, therefore, become satisfied that she is not only entitled to one, but the census shows that she has so large a population that she is entitled to two Representatives, the House of Representatives will admit two to their seats. I believe that the bill as it stands is better than in any other shape which has been yet proposed. This is the ground on which I shall give my vote against the proposition of the Senator from Ohio, and for the bill as amended on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts. I hope this matter will come to a vote, and come to a vote to-day.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I voted in the negative on the amendment to allow Minnesota two Representatives. I am satisfied that it is a compromise which we may be justifiable in making. It is about as near right as we can get, and I am willing to change my vote; and for that purpose move a reconsideration, to close debate on this subject.

Mr. PUGH. I withdraw my motion, in order to allow the Senator from Louisiana to make his motion.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move to reconsider the vote on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. IVERSON,] giving the State two Representatives.

Mr. STUART called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered; and, being taken, resulted—yeas 27, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Broderick, Brown, Clay, Douglas, Evans, Fitch, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Slidell, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Wright, and Yulice—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, King, Pearce, Simmons, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—22.

So the vote was reconsidered; and the question recurred on the amendment of Mr. IVERSON.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to hear the amendment read.

The Clerk read the amendment; which is, to strike out all of the second section, after the enacting clause, and insert:

"That said State shall be entitled to two Representatives in Congress, until the next apportionment of Representatives amongst the several States."

Mr. HALE. I desire simply to say, that I prefer the bill as it originally stood; and an objection has been mentioned by some who have voted for these amendments. It is suggested that, if the amendment that has been adopted on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, providing for a new census, should be stricken out, and the bill should be left as it was reported by the committee, they would vote for the original bill, and prefer it to any of these amendments. I prefer the bill as originally reported; and I give notice that, as soon as it is in order, having voted with the majority on that proposition, I shall move to reconsider it, so that the bill may stand, if the amendments be all rejected, just as it came from the Committee on Territories. I hope, then, that this amendment will be voted down, and leave the bill just as the committee reported it.

Mr. WILSON. I wish simply to say that I disagree with the Senator from New Hampshire in that respect. I would rather vote to give them two Representatives than take the bill as it was originally reported, because I think that more just than it would be to have the bill stand as it originally came from the committee. What I desire with regard to this State is to do exact justice, and I made the motion to take a new census for that purpose. I am told that this motion is to strike out what I had inserted into the original section. I prefer it to stand as amended, and give them one Representative, which the Constitution gives them, and then take a census, and give them all that belongs to them—one, two, or three—in addition. By that I shall stand. But, as between the original bill, which gives them but one, and the proposition to give them two, I shall vote for the two, because I think that nearer right.

The question being taken upon Mr. IVERSON's amendment by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 29, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Broderick, Brown, Clay, Crittenden, Douglas, Evans, Fitch, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Sidel, Stuart, Thompson of New Jersey, Wright, and Yulee—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Colamer, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, King, Pearce, Simmons, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—21.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PUGH. I offered an additional section, a few days ago, to this bill; and it is suggested to me by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. STUART,] on the authority of the Senators and Representatives from Minnesota, that there are several cases of appeal from the supreme court of the Territory pending in the Supreme Court of the United States, in reference to which it is necessary to make some provision. I move to add this to the section I have already offered on that subject:

And in all cases of appeal or writ of error heretofore prosecuted, and now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States, on any record from the supreme court of Minnesota Territory, the mandate of execution, or order for further proceeding, shall be directed by the Supreme Court of the United States to the district court of the United States for the district of Minnesota, or to the supreme court of the State of Minnesota, as the nature of such appeal or writ of error may require; and each of these courts shall be the successor of the supreme court of Minnesota Territory as to all such cases, with full power to hear and determine the same, and to award mesne or final process therein.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. YULEE. I have an amendment to offer; but if it be agreeable to the Senate, and there is no haste in passing this bill, I should like to pass it over until to-morrow morning. ["Oh, no!"] The amendment I propose is not entirely perfected. I should like to make some further examination. There is business to be transacted in executive session; and I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. This subject, for its character, has occupied a very undue portion of the time of the Senate. I hope it will be disposed of now, and not delayed.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After some time consumed therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 31, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, their Chief Clerk, informing the House that the Senate had passed an act to acquire certain lands needed for the Washington aqueduct in the District of Columbia; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. LETCHER. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. This is the last day of the debate in committee on the Kansas question.

Mr. FOSTER. I appeal to the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. LETCHER. I cannot. This is the last day for the Kansas debate.

The motion of Mr. LETCHER was then agreed to.

So the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BOCK in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the deficiency bill, on which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STEVENSON] was entitled to the floor.

Messrs. STEVENSON, GILMER, MILES, BURLINGAME, ZOLICOFFER, PARROTT, NIBLACK, THOMPSON, WARD, GROESBECK, TRIPPE, MORSE of Maine, HATCH, MARSHALL of Illinois, HUGHES, TAPPAN, LETCHER, and WALTON, addressed the committee on Kansas affairs.

[These speeches will be published in the Appendix.]

On motion of Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, the committee then rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BOCK reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 306) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1858, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. BOCK, (at twenty-five minutes to one o'clock, a. m.,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, April 1, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. B. H. NADAL.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

COURT OF CLAIMS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate reports of the Court of Claims, made in pursuance of law, adverse to the claim of Joseph Ratcliff; the claim of Oliver Dubois; the claim of Arthur Edwards, John Owen, and Ira Davis; the claim of Dennis Cronan; the claim of A. O. P. Nicholson; the claim of the heirs of Lewis Ansart; and the claim of Joshua J. Guppy, trustee for the settlers and occupants of Portage City; also, the opinion of the court on the claim of Joseph Clymer; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SEWARD presented a petition of citizens of New York, praying for the enactment of a general relief law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DIXON presented the petition of Henry Kellogg, praying for indemnity for losses sustained in consequence of the failure of Congress to make appropriations for the continuation of the Washington aqueduct; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. IVERSON presented a petition of citizens of Washington, District of Columbia, praying for an examination and settlement of the claims of J. W. Nye, for furnishing horses and carry-alls for the House of Representatives, for macadamizing Pennsylvania avenue, and for improving a public square in the city of Washington; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution of the Senate (S. No. 24) authorizing Lieutenant William N. Jeffers to accept a sword of honor from her Majesty the Queen of Spain.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. IVERSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of the heirs of Jabez B. Rooker, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Ann Mathieson, submitted an adverse report on so much of the petition as relates to indemnity for property destroyed; which was ordered to be printed; and asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the residue of the petition, praying for a grant of land, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands; which was agreed to.

Mr. STUART, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the petition of citizens of the city and county of St. Louis, Missouri, relative to the organization of a territorial government for Arizona, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Territories; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 204) to provide for issuing patents in certain cases where grants of the public lands have been made to Congress, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of the Legislature of Iowa, presented March 19, respecting certain land titles in that State, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, the committee having already reported a bill on the subject; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Robert K. Smith, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims; which was agreed to.

POLICE FOR WASHINGTON CITY.

Mr. BROWN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, who were instructed to inquire into the propriety of making provision for an efficient police force in Washington city, reported a bill (S. No. 232) to establish an auxiliary guard for the protection of public and private property in the city of Washington, and repealing all acts heretofore passed in relation to that subject; which was read, and passed to a second reading. He also submitted a report on the subject; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BROWN. I desire to say, in a single word—not to detain the Senate—that there is a very pressing necessity for the consideration of this bill; and as it may give rise to some debate, I give notice now that I shall endeavor to get it up, and have it considered at an early day next week. I need not say more than this, because every Senator is as well aware, as I am, of the condition of the city of Washington now, in reference to its police organization.

UNITED STATES COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. SEWARD submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary inquire whether any amendments of the laws relating to the taking of affidavits, and holding to bail, so as to enlarge the powers of commissioners, are necessary.

FEES OF MARSHALS.

Mr. SEWARD submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary inquire whether any necessity exists for a revision of the acts declaring the fees of United States marshals.

LICENSES OF VESSELS.

Mr. HAMLIN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be directed to inquire into the expediency of amending section thirty-seven of the act entitled "An act for enrolling and licensing ships and vessels in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same," passed February 18, 1793.

FAYETTEVILLE ARSENAL.

Mr. BIGGS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to communicate to the Senate the present condition of the United States arsenal at Fayetteville, North Carolina, and whether the buildings, shops, and machinery, are sufficiently completed for the construction of material and munitions of war, and what appropriation, if any, is necessary to put the same in operation as an arsenal of construction upon the original plan adopted by Congress.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. FESSENDEN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 228) making appropriations for certain public works in the State of Maine; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CRITTENDEN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 229) for the relief of Jane Turnbull; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. TRUMBULL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 230) for the relief of the legal representatives of Daniel Hay, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GREEN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 231) granting public lands to the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska, to aid in the construction of railroads in said Territories; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. HALE. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day, it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. MASON. I think it would be as well not to adjourn over.

Mr. JONES. To-morrow is Good Friday, recollect.

Mr. MASON. I think it would be as well to defer this motion. A very important measure is pending in the other House, and it is known will be acted upon to-day. It may be that the Senate should be in session, to receive their action, whatever it may be.

Mr. JONES. Do you know that to-morrow is Good Friday?

Mr. MASON. There is no Good Friday in legislation. It is unknown to legislation.

The motion was agreed to.

GEORGE FISHER'S REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Sometime ago, sir, an act was passed, and afterwards a supplemental act, for the purpose of the adjustment and settlement of the claim of a Mr. Gordon, referring it for settlement to the Second Auditor of the Treasury. For some cause or other, he never acted on it, and has been prevented from acting by the chief of the Treasury Department. A joint resolution has been reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs for his relief, which I ask may be taken up and considered. It will not occupy many minutes I think of the time of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution, (S. No. 21,) devolving upon the Secretary of War the execution of the act of Congress entitled, "an act supplemental to an act therein mentioned," approved December 22, 1854, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that the duties imposed, or required to be performed, by the act of Congress entitled "an act supplemental to an act therein mentioned," approved December 22, 1854, including the act to which it is supplemental, shall be transferred to the Secretary of War, who is to proceed de novo to execute the same in their plain and obvious meaning; with a proviso that from any amount which may be found just and equitably due to the legal representatives of George Fisher, deceased, there shall be deducted all sums which may have been heretofore allowed and paid by the United States.

Mr. BIGGS. I ask for the reading of the report in that case.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. The gentleman will observe that this resolution simply transfers the execution of a law of Congress from the Second Auditor, who has been restrained and prevented from executing it, to the Secretary of War.

Mr. BIGGS. I cannot see any reason for it. I want to know the reason. I wish to hear the report read.

The Clerk read the report; but, before he had concluded,

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I can perhaps state, for the information of the Senate, without being at the necessity of reading the report at length, the precise point which is contained in it, and the reason why the Committee on Indian Affairs reported this resolution simply transferring the execution of the law from the Second Auditor of the Treasury to the Secretary of War.

Mr. BIGGS. I desire to hear the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, the original report, which I understand is among the papers, denying the right of these persons to the relief asked for by them.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Guthrie, the late Secretary of the Treasury, makes a report, in which he states that the act of Congress which was last passed upon the subject ought not to be executed, and that the account ought not to be stated and allowed by the Second Auditor, for the reason, as Mr. Guthrie alleges in his statement, that the testimony rejected for want of authentication had already been received and acted upon by the Department; but in that respect we are satisfied that Mr. Guthrie is mistaken, because the certificate of the Governor of Alabama, authenticating this evidence, is dated long after the case was acted upon by the Second Auditor. There is the affidavit of Mr. Bibb also, swearing expressly that the testimony was rejected, and was not acted upon. Secretary Guthrie, therefore, fell into a mistake as to the fact. The present Secretary of the Treasury is unwilling to open the case and examine it, for the reason that his predecessor had decided that it should not be examined by the Second Auditor. He feels himself bound by the decision of his predecessor, and therefore he is unwilling to act.

Mr. BIGGS. Will the Senator from Wisconsin permit me to interrupt him for a moment. If the claimants here have a legal right, have they not the power to enforce it in the courts? If the Secretary of the Treasury or the Auditor of the Treasury refuses to execute this law, have not the claimants a remedy in the courts?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Perhaps in the Court of Claims the matter might be prosecuted; but I do not understand that a claim against the Government can be prosecuted in any other court.

Mr. BIGGS. If it can be prosecuted in the Court of Claims, it seems to me it ought to be referred to the Court of Claims.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The act of Congress provided—

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator indulge me for a moment. That seems to involve the rights of a citizen of Alabama. Am I correct in that?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It is the claim of the heirs of George Fisher, deceased. There is a certificate of the Governor of Alabama involved in the case, but whether the parties reside in the State of Alabama I am not certain. It may be so.

Mr. CLAY. A gentleman by that name formerly resided in my State, and I suppose these claimants are now citizens of the State. I should like to look into the matter, and with that view, I move to postpone the joint resolution for the present. I wish to look into it myself. It is evident it cannot pass now without opposition, and I should prefer to let it lie over. I move to postpone it for the present, and let it come up in its regular order.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have no objection to the postponement.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. YULEE. I call for the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the bill (S. No. 143) in relation to the office of Fourth Assistant Postmaster General.

Mr. IVERSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Army bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Florida is pending.

Mr. YULEE. If I understand correctly from the Senator, that it is very desirable to the Government that there should be immediate and early action upon the Army bill which he is pressing, I shall, of course, give way to his motion.

Mr. IVERSON. Then I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 313) to provide one regiment of mounted volunteers for the defense of Texas, and to authorize the President to accept the service of four other regiments of volunteers.

Mr. STUART. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion, because I am unwilling that the consideration of the Minnesota bill shall be postponed for that measure or for anything else.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. IVERSON. This matter is urged with a great deal of force by the President and Secretary of War. They consider it very essential to the public service that the question should be decided either one way or the other, whether additional troops are to be allowed or not. We have agreed to adjourn over until Monday, and then the Minnesota bill will be in order. That will supersede the Army bill for days, perhaps, and it may be the last of next week before we can get up the Army bill in regular order, if we do not take it up now. In the mean time, the public business is suffering for the want of a decision of this question; for the President and Secretary of War do not understand what disposition they are to make of the present force, until they know whether Congress is going to allow an additional force or not. Every day now is worth an ordinary week, and perhaps more than a week to the Government on this question.

Mr. STUART. I am well aware of the importance of this bill; but it is not as important, in my judgment, as the question of admitting a State into the Union that has been applying since the first of the session. It certainly is in the power of the Senate to dispose of the Minnesota bill in a very short time, and the responsibility is with us; we can do it if we will; and I am unwilling that so great a matter as the admission of a State shall be postponed for any other business.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I do hope that my honorable friend from Michigan will withdraw his opposition to acting on the Army bill. It is not intended that we shall act finally on the Minnesota bill to-day. We know how several days have been consumed upon it fruitlessly; and surely, in point of magnitude and public importance, it can now bear no comparison to the Army bill. Whether, after such long delays, one or two days more are to elapse before this State is admitted or rejected, is a matter of no very great national consequence. But now, when the country is in a state of quasi warfare, when we have been asked for additional military force as necessary for the occasion, that we should not even let the Executive know whether we intend to grant this or any additional force, is a matter of great national consequence. If nothing is to be granted, we ought to let him know it, so that he may make the best provision he can with the means he has under his control; and if we are to grant it, it is full time that we had done so, in order to enable him to bring whatever force you may allow into the field in time to be of service to the country. I hope that the call for the yeas and nays, which was made by my honorable friend from Michigan, always so judicious and conciliatory as he is, will be withdrawn on this occasion. At any rate, I hope the Senate will take such a course as will bring up for consideration the Army bill.

Mr. STUART. So far as I can hear my friend from Kentucky, I do not think he and I disagree as to the importance of this measure; but, if I understand him correctly, he says that it is not intended that the Minnesota bill shall pass to-day. Now, sir, it ought to be intended, and it ought to pass to-day. There should be no reason against its passage very soon; and if there is an intention that it shall not pass, I confess I have an anxiety to see where that intention is, who entertains it, what the motive is for detaining the bill here. I know it is not an intention which is entertained by my honorable friend from Kentucky. He has from the first been in favor of passing this measure, and passing it promptly. It was for that very reason that I made the call for the yeas and nays. It is in the power of the Senate to pass the Minnesota bill, and pass it promptly. It has been discussed here for days, and every subject connected with it is thoroughly understood. The Senate is as well prepared to vote upon the bill this minute as it will be a month hence; and if there is any understanding or any intention that does not come to the surface, let it be known. So far as regards the Army bill, it ought to have been passed days ago, and this bill also. This bill might have been passed days ago; and it is for the very reason that the Army bill is important and ought to pass, that I think it had better stay behind this one, so that this may pass in some reasonable time.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

NEW SERIES...No. 90.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. If I understand the motion, it is to postpone the Minnesota bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No, sir; the motion is to proceed to the consideration of the Army bill. The hour for the special order has not arrived.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am willing to take up the Army bill at any time except to the prejudice of the Minnesota bill; and as it is within two minutes of the time fixed for the special order, I vote "no," so as to take up the Minnesota bill.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 28, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Brown, Clay, Crittenden, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Henderson, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Kennedy, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Sillidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Wright, and Yulee—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Bright, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Dixon, Doollittle, Douglas, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Jones, King, Seward, Stuart, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—23.

ARMY BILL.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill (H. R. No. 313) to provide for the organization of a regiment of mounted volunteers for the defense of the frontier of Texas, and to authorize the President to call into the service of the United States four additional regiments of volunteers.

The Clerk read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour having arrived for the consideration of the special order, it requires the vote of a majority of the Senate to proceed with the consideration of this bill.

Mr. IVERSON. I move to postpone the special order, in order to proceed with the consideration of the Army bill.

Mr. HALE called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered; and, being taken, resulted—yeas 30, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Brown, Clay, Crittenden, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Henderson, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Sillidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Wright, and Yulee—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Dixon, Doollittle, Douglas, Durkee, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Seward, Stuart, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—19.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was in section one, lines three and four, to strike out the words "and required" after "authorized," so that it will read:

That the President of the United States be authorized to receive into the service of the United States one regiment of Texas mounted volunteers, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The second amendment of the committee was in section one, line twenty-two, to strike out the word "forty," and insert "twenty-five;" so as to make the clause read:

Each of said officers below the rank of major—non-commissioned officers, musicians, farriers, and privates—shall furnish and keep himself supplied with a good serviceable horse and horse equipments, for the use and risk of which, in addition to the pay and allowances herein provided, he shall receive twenty five cents a day.

Mr. IVERSON. The Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, in proposing that amendment, acted under a misapprehension of the facts; and I am instructed, by them, to correct it. As the bill came from the House of Representatives, forty cents a day were allowed for each horse for the Texas mounted volunteers. We were under the impression, at the time we reported the amendment to insert twenty-five cents, that that was the remuneration for the maintenance of the horse. It is not so. The rations allowed the horse are at the rate of eight dollars a month. The forty cents which are allowed in the House bill are intended for the hire of the horse, not for his maintenance or feed; and that has been usual heretofore where volunteers have furnished their own horses. They have been allowed forty cents. I ask the Senate, therefore, to disagree to this amendment.

Mr. HUNTER. Do I understand that by rejecting the amendment, we leave it where it has been, according to custom?

Mr. IVERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUNTER. This is the usual compensation, not more?

Mr. IVERSON. Yes, sir.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the committee was, in section two, line eleven, after the word "have," insert "mustered," so that it will read:

But no field officer shall receive forage for a greater number of horses than he may, from time to time, actually have mustered in service.

Mr. PUGH. We had better insert the word "been" before that, because "muster" is used as a verb in the passive voice. It should be "have been mustered in service."

Mr. IVERSON. That is a grammatical criticism; and I disagree with the Senator from Ohio. If the section read, "but no field officer shall receive forage for a greater number of horses than he may from time to time actually have been mustered in service," it would refer to the field officer himself being mustered into the service; but when it reads, "no field officer shall receive forage for a greater number of horses than he may from time to time actually have mustered in service," it is proper.

Mr. PUGH. Does the Senator understand that horses are mustered into the service?

Mr. IVERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. PUGH. I never understood so before. It is the man that is mustered, not the horse.

Mr. IVERSON. The man is mustered with his horse.

Mr. PUGH. I never before heard of the horse being mustered in.

Mr. IVERSON. I have no objection to disagreeing to the amendment, and leaving out the word "mustered," so that it shall read, "the number of horses that he may from time to time actually have in service."

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the committee was to strike out the third section of the bill, which is in the following words:

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That all the officers of said regiment of mounted men shall be appointed or selected in the manner prescribed by the laws of Texas."

Mr. PUGH. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia why the committee have proposed to strike out that section?

Mr. IVERSON. Because the same thing is provided for in the fifth section, which refers to all the regiments. This third section provides for the Texas regiment, and the fifth section provides for them all.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was, in section four, line four, to strike out the words "northern and northwestern" before the word "frontiers," so that it will read:

That for the purpose of quelling disturbances in the Territory of Utah, for the protection of supply and emigrant trains, and the suppression of Indian hostilities on the frontiers, the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to call for and accept the services of any number of volunteers, not to exceed in all four regiments of seven hundred and forty privates each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was, in section four, lines sixteen and seventeen, to strike out the words "and except the appointment of officers," so that the clause will read:

Said volunteers, if called for and received as mounted men, shall be constituted in the same manner as is provided in the first section of this bill for the Texas regiment of mounted volunteers, and shall receive the same pay and allowances, shall be subject to the same rules and regulations, as are provided in this bill for said corps.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was, in section five, to strike out the word "said" before "volunteers," and after "volunteers" to insert the words "provided for by this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The last amendment of the committee was, in section five, after the word "belong," to insert, "except the quartermasters, commissaries, surgeons, and assistant surgeons, who shall be detailed from their respective departments of the regular Army of the United States," so as to make the section read:

That the volunteers provided for by this act shall not be accepted in bodies of less than one regiment, whose officers shall be appointed in the manner prescribed by law in the several States or Territories to which said regiments shall respectively belong, except the quartermasters, commissaries, surgeons, and assistant surgeons, who shall be detailed from their respective departments of the regular Army of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTER. In section four, line seven, I move to strike out the word "four" and insert "two," so that it shall authorize the raising of two additional regiments besides the Texas regiment, making three in all, instead of five. I think the sense of the Senate was pretty distinctly manifested in regard to the number of troops to be raised, when the Senate bill was under discussion. It seemed to be the impression then that three regiments would be sufficient, and I think they will be. They are designed, as I understand, simply for the defense of the frontier against Indians. One in Texas, and two others, I think, should be sufficient for the defense of the frontier against Indians. I hope it will be the pleasure of the Senate to strike out "four" and insert "two." I am not for raising any more men than are necessary, and the Senate have indicated an opinion that three regiments are enough.

Mr. PUGH. I would suggest to the Senator from Virginia that we have already amended this bill so that no difficulty can occur. This bill, as it originally stood, and the bill we had up before, were compulsory on the President. This merely authorizes him to accept the services of volunteers. He may call for as many regiments as he requires. He is not absolutely directed to call for a single one. It is purely left at his discretion to call for the mounted regiment from Texas. I think it would be better, in reference to this campaign, of which we, as yet, know very little—we do not know how long the time will be, or how large a force will be necessary—to leave the whole matter to the executive department. It amounts to five regiments, about the number the War Department requested of us. I am disinclined myself to vote for more than three regiments; but I believe the President and Secretary of War will exercise their discretion wisely. If they find three regiments sufficient, they will not ask for any more. I think we had better leave the bill, in this respect, as it came from the House of Representatives, leaving the discretion to the President to call for what number he pleases.

Mr. HUNTER. I know the bill has been altered, so as to leave it at the discretion of the President to raise as many regiments as will be necessary. I do not believe he would desire to raise a man or expend a dollar more than he believes to be necessary; but if we pass the bill authorizing five regiments, there will be an immense pressure on him to call them into service. Another thing: I think we ought to go before the country with such a measure as we are willing to be responsible for. I am willing, under the circumstances, to vote for three regiments; not for five. I hope the Senate will adopt the amendment, especially when we come to consider the means as well as the appropriations. We shall have to raise the means for paying these additional regiments, and we ought to look to both sides. Three regiments, I believe, will be sufficient; but the matter has been fully discussed before, and it is not my purpose to weary the Senate with any further discussion.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, called for the yeas and nays on the amendment; and they were ordered.

Mr. IVERSON. I do not wish to discuss any feature connected with this bill, for it has been so much discussed that every Senator is perfectly familiar with it. The committee are satisfied that there is no possible chance to get an accession of the regular Army at this session of Congress. The House of Representatives have indicated their opposition to that scheme in too decided a manner to leave room for the supposition that any proposition of that sort would meet the approbation of that House. The question, therefore, is simply presented to the Senate, whether we shall authorize volunteers, or no addition to the public service. I was myself decidedly opposed to the use of volunteers, and I am still. I do not think that they are efficient in service—not that I have any doubt about their natural courage and physical capacity, but I think that undisciplined and irregular troops, such as we must necessarily have in the volunteer service, must be inefficient. If you could take the uniformed volunteer companies, such as they have in this city, in Baltimore, in New York, Boston, and elsewhere, you would have troops almost equal to regulars, perhaps quite equal to regulars, and having more pride of character; and as much efficiency probably, in every respect, as regulars. They would be commanded by skillful officers. But what sort of volunteers are we going to have under the operation of this bill? What sort are we likely to get? Raw militia, and nothing but raw militia, and most of them probably men picked up in the grog-shops of the various cities, having nothing to do, no means of employment. Such, in my opinion, will be their character. Still, the Government desires the use of those troops. I am only giving an excuse for my own vote—not to have any influence with the Senate. I am not particularly favorable to the bill; but inasmuch as the President and Secretary of War have said that they desire to have the power to take these troops, if they can get nothing better, I am willing to yield my objections to the volunteer element, and vote for this bill. My own opinion is that the Government will want more troops than they have at present. That opinion I expressed on a former occasion in the Senate. I am not one of those who believe the Mormon war is to be treated lightly, and I think the Government, from what we can see, is well satisfied that it will be a formidable obstacle to overcome. They are, if I understand properly the movements of the Government, intending to throw into Utah five or six thousand troops. The volunteers, though I do not think they will be efficient in Utah, in a contest with the Mormons, may be used by the Government, as I apprehend they will be used, to guard the trains which pass backwards and forwards between the settled portions of the United States and the Territory of Utah. They may be successfully employed in that service.

The regiment of Texas rangers may, doubtless, be usefully employed on the Texas frontier, and they will be efficient troops for that service, probably quite as efficient as regulars, because that is an irregular, erratic service which volunteer troops are quite as capable of performing as regular troops; and the use of that regiment in Texas will enable the Government to withdraw one of the regular regiments now stationed on the frontier of Texas and add it to the Utah army. The use of two other regiments of volunteers may enable the Government, perhaps, to withdraw from other service two regiments of regulars and attach them to the Utah army; so that in fact the whole Utah army may be composed of regular troops. I presume it will consist of regular troops, the volunteers authorized by this bill being employed on the emigrant routes or in guarding trains passing between Kansas and Utah, and upon the Indian frontiers of the United States to protect the inhabitants from incursions of the Indians. In this way these volunteers, although inefficient, may be serviceable, and I apprehend that is the mode in which they will be employed by the Government, if at all.

In regard to this amendment of the Senator from Virginia, I will say that I am willing to take the two regiments, because I believe that no more than two regiments, in addition to the Texas regiment of rangers, will be necessary. I think the Government would not call more into the service, probably, if the four be authorized, but it is proper that we should restrict the expenditures of the Government as far as possible; and whenever the question comes up before me, as to whether we shall authorize four or two volunteer regiments, believing that two will be all that the Government will require under the circumstances, I am disposed to take the two instead of the four. If they are content with that number, I can see no reason why we should provide for a larger number.

Mr. PUGH. If the Government are willing to take two regiments, I am ready to give two, and am perfectly satisfied with that; but I do not intend to have the Government put on me, as one Senator, the responsibility of refusing them any suitable number of volunteers to defend the country. When the Committee on Military Affairs, first as a committee, and next speaking on behalf of the Administration, say they are satisfied with two regiments, I am satisfied perfectly, and I shall vote for the two on that assurance. But I wish to give notice that I do not intend to have it said to me hereafter, that I was not willing to give the Government sufficient troops to defend the frontiers.

The Senator from Georgia has repeated here, that he considers volunteer troops inefficient; that they will be people picked up in the streets and gutters. That is where you pick up the regular soldiers. You never pick up volunteers there.

Mr. IVERSON. But you drill the regulars.

Mr. PUGH. But how will you drill them for the Utah campaign? You want them now, or else you do not want them at all. The demand is for soldiers now. I grant that if you were going into a permanent increase of the Army, it would be a very good idea to have regular soldiers, because a regular soldier is considered a recruit for the first three years; he is not considered a full-fledged soldier until he has been three years drilled. But if you want a man for the present service, within this present year, to go out and fight the Indians, or the Mormons, I tell you the volunteer is worth ten regulars. It was well known in the Mexican war, that, although in point of service the old regiments of the regular Army, consisting of soldiers long in the service, were very valuable—and I do not underrate them—yet the rank and file of the new regiments did not compare with the rank and file of the volunteer regiments. I tell the President and Secretary of War, that if they want efficient troops for present service immediately, within the next six months, they had better take volunteers for their own credit. I know how the regulars are recruited. They are recruited in the city of Cincinnati: that is one of the recruiting stations. They get people that are fit for nothing else. They pick them out of the gutters, truly; and the consequence is, that of the rank and file of your regular Army a large majority are not even naturalized; they are men who can find no other employment; but yet, the Senator says that volunteers, our own citizens, who are anxious to go forth and defend the honor and the flag of the country, and who offer to do so, not from the inducement of your pay, are not going to be as available as regulars!

Now, sir, if this amendment of the Senator from Virginia, to which I have no objection, provided the Administration take the responsibility of it, be adopted, I shall move to strike out so much of the fifth section as stipulates that the President shall not receive less than one regiment from a State; for if there are to be but two regiments, I want every State to have a chance. Let the rule be, "first come, first served;" let companies be offered, and let the President, as far as he can, distribute them and give all the States a chance. There are many States who want to offer the services of their citizens. I think it is a poor business for a young man to go into. I will tell him that; and I will tell him, from a little experience, that he had better stay at home; but still, if he wants to go, give him a fair chance. Distribute these companies to the various States. If we are going to have but three regiments—one for the State of Texas—I think it wrong that only two other States should have an opportunity to furnish men; but let us provide that the President shall not receive more than one company from a State, and then there will be no controversy; otherwise there will be a controversy. I do not know how many troops have been offered to the War Department; I know that I have been beset ever since I have been here by very good men, by companies which have long been in existence—many of them served in the Mexican war, and have been under organization ever since—to present their applications. They want to offer the President a whole regiment from my State, even two regiments; but I do not suppose he can take more than one tenth part of them. I hope, however, he will give my State a chance to offer him a company or two, at all events. If I should not make that point with him and the Senate, my constituents would not be satisfied. If we are to have but two regiments, I shall move that amendment, provided this be adopted; and I presume, after the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia, that nobody will make any objection to it. We may as well withdraw the call for the yeas and nays, and let the amendment be adopted. Then I shall move, in the fifth section, line three, to strike out the word "regiment," and insert "company."

Mr. CAMERON. I desire to say a few words in reply to the remarks of the honorable Senator from Georgia, in regard to volunteers. I think what he said with reference to our volunteers is entirely incorrect; and if he had known those volunteers, he would not have said what he did say. He represents that persons hanging about grog-shops, and unfit for service, are entered as volunteers. In reply to that, I will say that I had the honor myself to offer the services of a company from Pennsylvania the other day for the Utah war—a uniformed company—composed of the best young gentlemen of the county of Fayette, in which they reside. They are not the kind of men who usually enlist, but are thrifty, industrious young mechanics, and intelligent, well-educated, young lawyers and physicians. I will add that if there is any doubt about getting men to fill up the Army, the volunteers of the State of Pennsylvania will furnish the whole number. We will give you the two regiments, and I will venture to say they will be composed mainly of men who are fit to meet us anywhere—intelligent, well-bred men. I agree with the Senator from Ohio, that it is an unprofitable business, and generally does no benefit to the young man who becomes a volunteer soldier, but it is a matter of taste. It seems to be a part of our nature in this country to be soldiers. Our people desire to put on military uniforms; and when they have done so, they like to be in a fight. I shall be very sorry indeed if the honorable Senator believed that the men I have spoken of are not fit for volunteers.

Mr. IVERSON. I am very happy to hear the Senator from Pennsylvania state that his State has so many patriotic and efficient men ready to engage in the service of the country, and I trust the Government will take these regiments from Pennsylvania, if they have so many soldiers and gentlemen very willing to fight. I apprehend, however, that by the time they have traveled twelve hundred or fifteen hundred miles across the plains in the heat of the summer, they will get sick of it, and be glad to be back again. Still, that is a matter of no consequence now. I think volunteers are efficient enough when they are drilled, but they are not efficient when they are not drilled; and the annals of the country, from the revolutionary war to the present time, show it. But I rose, principally, to speak to the amendment which the Senator from Ohio has moved to the fifth section.

Mr. PUGH. I have not offered an amendment; but as soon as the motion of the Senator from Virginia is carried, I shall move the amendment which I indicated.

Mr. IVERSON. I shall reserve what I have to say upon it until it is offered.

Mr. POLK. I am very much like the Senator from Ohio. I do not want to vote more volunteers than the Administration wants; but I should like to be very well satisfied that it will only want three regiments instead of the five proposed by the bill as it stands.

Mr. HUNTER. They have standing authority, I believe, to call out the militia if they should need them. The Senate expressed its opinion before, after long debate, that three regiments would be sufficient; and the Military Committee proposed an increase of the regular Army to the amount of three regiments. I have no doubt they acted on proper information.

Mr. POLK. I wish information to guide my own vote. I know what the Senate did; and it was not done in accordance with my judgment. My judgment has not varied all the way through. I am now for the whole number called for in the bill, if the Administration wants authority to raise that many regiments; but if the Administration says that two regiments in addition to the Texas regiment are all it wants authority to raise, then I am willing to give no more.

Mr. IVERSON. I am not authorized to speak for the Administration on this question; I have had no conference with the President and Secretary of War as to the number of regiments required. The President and Secretary both told me, in casual conversation, that they were content to take the bill as it came from the House, and that they desired the passage of that bill. I understand, from the Senator from Virginia, that they are content to take three regiments instead of five; and can get along with that number. The Administration will be satisfied if Congress give them the three. As they are satisfied with that number, I am not disposed to go beyond that. I only speak on my own personal responsibility, however, not as the organ of the committee.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not know that it is necessary to say much on this subject, and I am not disposed to occupy any time unnecessarily. If I understood the honorable Senator from Georgia, he said that, if volunteer companies could be procured, such as are enrolled in the towns and cities, they would be qualified, perhaps, as well as regulars, to discharge this duty. Now, sir, just look to the probability of volunteers of any description being immediately prepared for service. Those volunteers are not in the habit of mustering more than fifty-two times in a year; so that a daily habit of mustering for twenty-six days in succession would qualify them as well as the fifty-two days in the course of the year that they have been drilled; and men of any degree of aptitude, in the course of twenty-five or thirty days, will not only understand the manual and the step, but they will understand the evolutions of companies and regiments remarkably well, and so as to render them perfectly efficient.

The honorable Senator from Georgia further said, they would do very well to guard trains, and such like matters, but they would not do for war. Why, sir, that is a very strange notion. I believe that in all our wars, from the Revolution down to this day, the grandest achievements have been made by the militia or by volunteers. The army of the United States in the Revolution was nothing more than an army of volunteers.

The regulars are mustered for a certain period; but if they have careful and intelligent officers to drill them, they are as well prepared for all the duties of a soldier in six months, as they are at the expiration of their five years' service, except as regards economy in the details of living and camp police. The Senator from Georgia says that these volunteers will do to guard the trains. I take it that will be one of the most important matters connected with the Mormon war. The trains will be in great danger, for if the Mormons have any sagacity, their first effort will be to cut off the supplies of the Army, to deprive them of transportation, and thus render them inefficient. If they succeed in this, the Army will be at once at their mercy. It will require the greatest degree of vigilance, adroitness, and capacity to protect the trains. You can as well go into action with volunteers, after they have been drilled for thirty days, as you can with the regiments of the regular Army now in Utah, or that will be there. Employ these two regiments as you please, and I guaranty, from the composition that they will be formed of, that they will be the most efficient troops in the field whether you bring them in contact with an enemy, or whether you employ them in other service. They will excel in the celerity of their movements, the activity of their discipline, their indomitable valor; and in the shock of battle they will sustain themselves as well as any men can do.

But, sir, I cannot believe that there will be a necessity for more than two regiments besides the one which you propose to provide for Texas. Give to Texas one regiment of rangers, well supplied, and well armed, and Texas can dispense with every regular soldier within her limits, or, at any rate, she would not require more than fifty men at each post which the Government has established there. You will, then, have two thousand men to dispose of, and you can add them to the army in Utah. The Government will then have an Army of fifteen thousand regulars, officers and men, who can all be directed to one point if necessary, except the few who will be required to occupy the fortifications. I am satisfied that, in addition to this number, two regiments of volunteers will be sufficient for the occasion. I do not mean to offer any speculations as to what the Government ought to do, or to suggest any course in regard to the conduct of the campaign. I have no doubt of the competency of the Administration and its constitutional advisers to suggest and pursue a proper course. I apprehend that there will be difficulty in Utah, and I should be very glad to see provision made for defending the train by this light corps of volunteers. I think it will conduce to the success of the campaign; for if they are not efficient and successful in giving security to the trains, it will be a most disastrous campaign. None can do it if they cannot.

Let not the Senator from Georgia say that these volunteers will be inefficient and worthless men brought from cities. Sir, those are not the men who can equip themselves and go into this service; they are not the men who will be received; but they are the very men who would compose a regular army. I am in favor of two regiments of volunteers. I have no doubt they will give to the projected war all the efficiency that can be given by an equal number of men, whether veterans, regulars, or any new levies that you can make of any description of troops.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Georgia, the acting chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, whether two regiments in addition to the Texas regiment are all that the Administration deem necessary for the service?

Mr. IVERSON. I have just remarked that I cannot speak the sentiments of the Administration on the subject. I have had no conversation with them about it. I explained a little while ago—the Senator probably did not hear me—[Mr. DOUGLAS. I did not.]—that in a conversation with the Secretary of War he indicated to me a desire that the bill of the House of Representatives should pass. We only spoke then of the general terms of the bill authorizing volunteers. We did not speak specifically of the number of regiments. I understand since, however, that the Senator from Virginia has had some conversation with the President, or some member of the Administration, and that they are content with two regiments.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Is the Senator from Virginia authorized to give us an assurance that two will be satisfactory?

Mr. HUNTER. I am not authorized to give any assurance. I move the amendment on my own responsibility.

Mr. IVERSON. Perhaps I went too far in quoting the Senator from Virginia. I did not suppose it a matter of any consequence, and therefore I felt authorized in stating what I did.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I desire to give whatever force is necessary. The object of my inquiry was simply to ascertain that fact.

The question being taken on Mr. HUNTER's amendment by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 28, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Broderick, Brown, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Clay, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Fitzpatrick, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Mason, Pearce, Seward, Slidell, Trumbull, and Wade—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Crittenden, Douglas, Evans,

Fitch, Green, Jones, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Stuart, Thompson of New Jersey, Wright, and Yulee—14.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PUGH. I now move my amendment in section five, line three, to strike out the word "regiment" and insert "company."

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I should like to inquire what the effect of that will be on the field officers? By whom will the field officers of the regiments be appointed then?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. STUART.) The section will be read as amended. The Clerk will read the section as proposed to be amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

"The volunteers provided for by this act shall not be accepted in bodies of less than one company, whose officers shall be appointed in the manner prescribed by law in the several States or Territories to which said regiments shall respectively belong."

Mr. IVERSON. I trust that amendment will not be adopted. The effect of it will be to interfere entirely with that provision in the fifth section which provides for the selection of field officers. The provision is that the field officers shall be appointed according to the laws of the States from which the regiments come. The various States have different modes of electing field officers. In some States they are appointed by the Governors; in others they are elected by the regiments themselves. If this amendment of the Senator from Ohio be adopted, suppose you have a regiment of ten companies, and each one comes from a different State, by what law are you to select the field officers? One company comes from a State where the law prescribes a particular mode of electing field officers, and another company comes from a State where a different mode is prescribed, and so on. You will introduce confusion; and you cannot have any mode by which you can elect field officers if you accept the volunteers in companies. The most convenient plan is to take them in regiments. Let a regiment come from a State, that State has laws by which field officers are elected; and then no difficulty can ensue, but the officers will be elected according to the laws of that State.

If you take this amendment, there may not be any law applicable to the election of the field officers of the regiments, and it will devolve on the President to appoint them. The volunteers do not want officers appointed by the President; they desire to have the election of their own officers, or to have them selected by the Governor of their State—men who come from amongst themselves; who feel with them; who associate with them; who understand their feelings and wishes. It is better that they should select their own field officers, men in whom they have confidence, than that they should have officers appointed over them by a stranger. Here comes one company from Georgia, another from South Carolina, another from New York, and another from Pennsylvania. They are put together in a regiment—thrown together by the Secretary of War into a regiment—all strangers to each other, and knowing nothing about the officers who are to command the companies. They know nothing of the candidates who will present themselves for field officers, and great confusion must necessarily ensue. But if a whole regiment is taken from a State, and they elect their own field officers, they will act understandingly when they come to elect their officers; and I think that is much the best provision.

Mr. PUGH. One of these regiments, it will be observed, is to be confined to the State of Texas, and therefore, as to that, no difficulty will occur. All officers there, field officers and company officers, must be elected according to the law of the State of Texas. The section confines the mounted company to the State of Texas. Then the only question occurs as to the two other regiments. Mark my prediction: if you take two other regiments of volunteers into the service, you will never have the whole of a regiment at any one place at one time; and you do not need any field officers for them; they are wholly immaterial and useless. The volunteers will be used in battalions of two, three, or four companies; and the senior captain will command. If you were going into a war like the Mexican war, where you required from ten to twenty, or thirty thousand troops in the field, you would use whole regiments at once; but when you ask that there shall be simply two regiments to be used for this service, neither of the regiments will ever be used as an entirety. If you use them to garrison posts, they will be in detachments of two or three companies each. If you use them on the march, they will be in battalions of two companies, three companies, or five companies—you cannot tell; and if you take them to the field, it is perfectly immaterial whether they have a field officer there, because they will be commanded by a general or by a colonel of the regular Army. The fact is, if you are only going to call for two regiments of volunteers, you do not want a single field officer for them; and you might just as well save that expense. You will have better troops, because you will have a wider field to select from; you will open the rivalry to all the States. Let them all offer a company, or two companies apiece, as the case may be.

As I said before, if you were going to make a large call for ten thousand volunteer troops, it would be material to consider field officers. As it is at present, I do not think there is any use for field officers for these two regiments. You might as well save their pay and expense. Therefore, my proposition is that as to these two additional regiments, besides the Texas regiment, you call for them in companies, and you will have twenty companies. That is all there is of it. You can use them in companies, and they will be so used; especially, if, as the Senator says, they are to guard trains, take my word for it, they will be divided into battalions of two or three companies each.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. We now see the effect of the amendment which was offered by the Senator from Virginia, and adopted by the Senate. That amendment was to restrict the additional force to two regiments, thus striking off two regiments from those provided for by the bill of the House of Representatives. Immediately upon the adoption of that, the Senator from Ohio offers a proposition which disjoins the entire bill. It may amuse the Senator. I do not know, nor do I care.

Mr. PUGH. I am amused at the Senator's idea that I have disjoined the bill. I mean nothing disrespectful to him.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Does not this proposition disjoin the bill? If this amendment be adopted, I should like to know how field officers are to be provided for these regiments? It cannot be done if you stick to the volunteer system upon which this bill is based. The Senator is the great advocate of the volunteer system, and yet he proposes an amendment under which, of necessity, the field officers must be appointed by the President, thus abandoning the volunteer system, in part. Therein lies the secret at the bottom of all this trouble. It is that those who represent each State want a part of this pitiful public patronage, that is to result from calling the volunteers from their own section. That this may be done, it is now proposed to prevent the Government from receiving volunteers in regiments, and restrict them to companies. Then the President may be required by gentlemen in this body, and the other House, to receive a company from this State, and a company from that. When you so receive them, where are you to rendezvous them? At what point are you to concentrate them? When these companies all get together, how are they to elect their officers? They cannot do it. It is palpable that you must change the whole character of the bill, if this amendment be adopted, or else, what is worse, defeat the Army bill.

The Senator from Ohio, who, I believe, did more than any other man, certainly as much as any one to defeat the Army bill when it was here before, now proposes to destroy it in this way. When he produces that state of things and gives the Executive the patronage of appointing these officers, which he must do, for he has no regular laws under which he can appoint them, the bill must be sent back to the House of Representatives, even if you pass it here, and be rejected there, so that the Government will not be supported in carrying on this war in any way whatever. Thus the bill will fall between the two Houses, and the responsibility must then rest with Congress of refusing to sustain the Executive in carrying on a public war, which is now existing; for if it be not a declared war we know the fact to be that hostilities are existing. Then the executive department will be shielded from the responsibility of what they may do in regard to this matter, and throw it upon Congress. They will be able to throw on Congress the responsibility of having refused to extend to them that reasonable support which has been constantly called for, and which the facts and documents laid before us show to be necessary.

I hope the Senator from Ohio will not insist upon his amendment. If he does, and it be adopted, I think the best thing the Senate can do, will be to recommit the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs, and have it so framed that it shall present some kind of unity. If this amendment be adopted the bill will be very defective, and it will contain a provision that will prevent its passage in the House of Representatives. I believe we did wrong in adopting the amendment of the Senator from Virginia, reducing the number of regiments. I consented to it, but I had no idea at the time that it was to be followed by a motion like this, providing for receiving single companies, and in effect abandoning the volunteer system, or at least that portion of the system which took away Executive patronage, to which I have no objection. If the Senator insists on this amendment, I shall move to reconsider the vote adopting the amendment of the Senator from Virginia, so that the Executive may have it in his power to call for four regiments, and take them from whatever quarter he pleases. I am willing to leave that matter in the discretion of the Executive. The bill does not require him to call out those regiments, and I would leave with him the responsibility of determining how many to call out. I think, therefore, it would be better to leave him authority to call out four regiments, as the bill of the House of Representatives provides. I believe so sincerely; and if the Democratic party, through its representative at the head of the Government chooses to call for but two, he will only call for two. If we adopt the bill of the House of Representatives without any material amendment, it can become a law very soon. I regard the amendment reducing the number of regiments as material. The States will fight over these two, and in order to get their portion they will divide them up into companies, and when you have done that, you have abandoned the volunteer system, and when you have abandoned it, you lose all the support the bill is to receive.

I am sorry that things have advanced to this stage. And if the Senator from Ohio insists upon his amendment, and it appears likely to prevail, I shall ask the Senate now to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senator from Virginia was adopted.

Mr. HUNTER. Let us take the vote on this amendment. It will not pass.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. But if we should take the vote, and the amendment should be adopted, what will be the consequence? The regiments will be accepted in companies, piecemeal, in every direction throughout the United States. Is not that so?

Mr. HUNTER. As I understand it, whether we vote this amendment down or not, a motion can still be made to reconsider the vote by which my amendment was adopted.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I can move to reconsider the vote adopting the amendment of the Senator from Virginia; but who will move to reconsider the amendment of the Senator from Ohio if that should be adopted? Does he not desire that a regiment shall be called for from Ohio?

Mr. PUGH. I do not care whether it be so or not.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Can the Senator say as much for every member of the House of Representatives from his own State?

Mr. PUGH. I have never conversed with one of them on that subject.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The secret of a great deal of this contest in regard to the Army bill is to be found in the patronage connected with it. Surely the public business here ought not to be carried on with reference to such considerations. Every one of us scorns such a principle, when we examine it calmly. It is not right. That spirit is destroying the public service in more branches of it than this one. I believe it ought to meet with the condemnation of every man, wherever it does exist. That it does exist, no one can doubt. I do not say that any feeling of that kind is to be attributed to any Senator here; but such a spirit does exist in some instances. I fear very much that if we restrict the bill to two regiments, it will stand in danger when it goes back to the House of Representatives; and certainly if, besides restricting the number of regiments, we adopt the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, and thus destroy the volunteer system in regard to the appointments of the higher officers, I am satisfied it will never pass the House of Representatives; and I doubt whether the bill, if amended in that way, could be passed in this House. I do not know that I could agree to vote for it in that shape, because it would be a mass of confusion. That amendment will leave the bill perfectly confused, unless we go on and perfect it; and to perfect it will require time to coolly deliberate upon and consider well each provision of the bill, so as to assimilate them together.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Mr. President, I have felt some regret that, at a time of great public necessity like the present, it should have been required of us to increase the expenses of the Government by an additional military force; but our circumstances are not yet so desperate that we are not able to employ and sustain whatever force the service of this Government and the people of the United States may require. I have therefore been willing to vote for such an increase of the Army as the President of the United States has recommended. No matter who administer this Government, whether gentlemen hold them in favor or not, some degree of confidence must be conceded to every Administration to enable it, practically and efficiently, to carry on this Government. Here, the source from which we had a right to expect information, the authorities which manage this branch of the public service, the Army, all unite in saying to us that an increase of the Army is necessary. Well, sir, I act upon that necessary confidence. I act upon the idea that I am required to give a certain amount of constitutional confidence to every branch of the Government. I give it in this respect; and I am willing to vote for the additional regiments.

But, Mr. President, as to this particular case now, it seems to me that the emergency requires prompt action. We must act now, or we need not act at all. We have come to the last moment. You cannot bring any additional force that you may think necessary into action and make it useful, unless you provide for it instantaneously. Not a day should be lost. Under this sense of duty to the country, I would have been prepared to take this bill as it comes from the House of Representatives, with all its imperfections, and pass it in an hour. I did vote against the change from five to three regiments; not because three regiments possibly might not be all that was necessary, but the bill stood for five, and the President might call the whole, or a less number of regiments, as he pleased. I would rather have left it there than made so material an amendment to the bill; which, if it is to be useful, ought to pass at once.

The lapse of another fortnight, or another ten days, is fatal to the object of the bill; and yet we are remodeling it. I voted against that, preferring dispatch even to amendments that might be useful. So I am opposed to the amendment of my friend from Ohio; and I hope that he will find, in the emergency of the case, whatever merit there may be in his amendment, a sufficient reason for withdrawing it. It may make the bill better; it may be a good amendment; but it is an amendment that will occupy time. It is an amendment which will change the frame of this bill very essentially. It is a measure of procrastination. It will have that effect, though not so intended. If the amendment could be now adopted and become a law within an hour, it is not suited to this case. The President wants this force; and the public service requires this force, if at all, now. It is not a day too soon. The troops cannot get to the scene of action in time, unless you pass this bill instantly.

Under these circumstances, what is the effect of this amendment? I agree entirely with my friend from Arkansas on this question. Is the President to range in his selection of volunteers all over this great Union? take a company here and a company there? As he well says, the difficulty of collecting them, the difficulty of organizing them, the difficulty of putting strangers at their head, the inefficiency that would result from putting one company from Pennsylvania, one from Massachusetts, one from Ohio, one from Kentucky, and so on throughout the Union, together, must create trouble in the organization. Two regiments will march into the field free of jealousies arising from a recent election in which there have been many complaints. It is not a system suited to the present occasion, nor good in itself. We must take them as the bill provides, by regiments that are ready to march at the word of command; and as to the mode of their election at home, or the mode of their organization at home, it seems to me we shall act wisest the less we have to do with that. For instance: in Kentucky we have a regiment all ready, with all the officers and all the men. It could march to-morrow, if you gave the order. Will they submit to be disorganized, and have a company picked out here, and a company there, and marched off? Will it do to say to the States, "we will allow you to elect, or to appoint, as high as a captain, but when you come to the higher ranks of the Army you are not to be trusted. Your citizens are to be divested of all those higher officers; your State is to be divested of the power of conferring them; you cannot go higher than a captain; all higher officers must be selected by the General Government?" No, sir, you will get very few troops in that way. They will go slowly to the field under such circumstances. If you want only two regiments you can get them to the scene of action soon. If, however, the President is sent abroad to pick up a company here and there throughout this wide domain and organize them, and have the officers selected, we shall not get them there before midsummer.

I hope this amendment will not be adopted. How the regiment in Kentucky may have been organized I do not know—I do not want to prescribe here; but it is enough that they are organized under the authority of the State, and commissioned by the Governor of the State; and you have no occasion to look any further to see how or by what process they attained their organization. I do not know myself how the regiment in Kentucky is organized. The Legislature passed a resolution on the subject, directing a regiment to be raised. They have raised it. It is now ready to march into service at four and twenty hours' notice. Is it to be changed to suit the militia mode or the volunteer mode in this, that, or another State? or had we not better leave each State to manage these matters as she pleases? The Administration ask you for volunteers in regiments, and the States are ready to give regiments. That is all you ought to require. I trust, therefore, that, on reconsideration, my friend from Ohio will withdraw this amendment. If it is adopted, like the gentleman from Arkansas, I should be disposed to go against the bill. I should take no further part or interest in it.

Mr. PUGH. My honored friend, the Senator from Kentucky, misunderstands the principle of my amendment. I have no idea of having the field officers appointed by the President of the United States to command these regiments. I propose to dispense with the field officers. There is no necessity for them, if you have but two regiments.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I understand my friend so, but they must necessarily go under the command of the Federal officers who are already appointed.

Mr. PUGH. I said that in battle they would be commanded by a regular officer anyhow—the whole command would be.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. At all times they must be. The gentleman does not suppose that twenty companies will be serving under the command of twenty captains always. They must go into regiments. They will be organized into regiments and battalions, and officers of the regular Army will be placed over them. That is a matter of necessity, and therefore I say that is the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. PUGH. I do not expect the twenty companies ever to serve together, and I am certain they never will serve together, nor ten of them, nor six of them. If you call for twenty companies of volunteers by this bill, I never expect to see any six of the companies serving together. I said that in battle they would be under the command of a general officer—of a colonel commanding with the command of a general officer. If they are put on their march as the Senator from Georgia suggests, they will be commanded by a colonel or lieutenant colonel of the regular Army—the whole command will be; and on the march the whole army is split up into small divisions, generally of two or three companies each. Therefore my amendment will not affect that at all.

But I intended to reply to some very severe animadversions of the Senator from Arkansas which I thought were entirely unjustifiable. I am not guilty of any of the accusations the Senator has made.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The Senator will allow me to interrupt him. I do not intend to be in the wrong, if I know myself, in any case where I can help it. It has been suggested to me that I made some remarks which may have been severe. They were certainly not meant to be so towards the Senator personally. That is very certain; but if any such thing was done, it was against my will.

Mr. PUGH. I did not misunderstand the Senator in that regard. I think he forgot the course of the discussion on this very measure; and he seemed to misunderstand my object and my votes. I am willing to take this bill as it came from the House of Representatives. I agree with the Senator from Kentucky in that respect. I wanted to take the bill as it came from the House, and pass it and be done with it; but the Committee on Military Affairs took it in hand—not I, but the committee, to which the Senator from Arkansas belongs, the committee to which the Senator from Georgia belongs—they put amendments into this bill which require it to go back to the House of Representatives. Therefore my amendment does not delay it a moment. It must go back to the House of Representatives; and if it goes back, I say perfect the bill; that is all. It must go back, not merely on verbal amendments, but on the vital amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia. It was when he offered his amendment that I gave notice to the Senate, that if his amendment carried, I would offer this other amendment, not otherwise. If the amendment of the Senator from Virginia is reconsidered and thrown out, as I think it ought to be, and all those immaterial amendments, for they are immaterial, offered by the Committee on Military Affairs are reconsidered and thrown out, I will vote for the bill just as it came from the House of Representatives; and, as my friend from Kentucky says, it can be a law in an hour. I say, then, I am not responsible for any procrastination. I did not begin it; but I say, after these amendments have been put on the bill, as an act of justice the amendment which I propose ought to be adopted.

Now, sir, is it true that I defeated the former Army bill? The Committee on Military Affairs reported to us two sections, first, increasing the number of companies, and second, increasing the rank and file. I offered to vote for the section increasing the rank and file of the regular Army, but I was not in favor of the additional companies, and I stated the reason at the time. The committee would not agree to that. They insisted on the two companies, not upon the increase of the rank and file, and when they had carried the two companies, they withdrew the section for the increase of the rank and file. I could not go for that bill under the circumstances. I stated my reasons. I was willing to vote for a bill simply increasing the rank and file of the Army; but the committee never would give us a chance to vote for that. Then what was the rest of my sin? That I offered an amendment for five regiments of volunteers—that is this bill. Who defeated it? Not I. I voted for it. I believe my friend from Arkansas helped to defeat it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Let me ask the Senator if he did not vote to convert the bill into a volunteer bill—to make the force volunteers instead of regulars?

Mr. PUGH. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. That killed the bill. Your friends who went for putting it in that shape, when they had got it in that shape, refused to vote for it, and threw off those of us who supported the original bill.

Mr. PUGH. The amendment providing for volunteers was carried, and the question came up on ordering the bill, as thus amended, to be read a third time. I voted for ordering it to be read a third time, and voted for its passage. My friend from Arkansas voted against it. Those who wanted an increase of the regular Army joined with those who wanted no Army at all; they defeated the bill, and the responsibility is upon them. I take none of it. I say the responsibility is upon those who insisted upon increasing the regular Army. If they had voted for the bill which was adopted, as an amendment, by the majority of the Senate, on my motion, it would have been through Congress, and the President would have had force enough, before this time. He offers to take it now. It could as well have been passed then as now. I do not say this to criminate the Senator from Arkansas, but to show him that his accusation against me is not well founded.

I say again, I am willing to vote for this bill as it came from the House of Representatives, with all its imperfections, if there be any; but if the amendment of the Senator from Virginia is to stand, it is a simple act of justice that my amendment shall be adopted. My friend from Kentucky says that Kentucky has a regiment ready and officered. I believe half a dozen other States have offered an entire regiment each, all officered and ready, and you will have a controversy. Why not, as you did in the Mexican war, divide out the whole service amongst the various applicants? It was so in Kentucky then, and in my State, and in Indiana, and in Illinois, and I suppose in nearly every other State, certainly in all the western States; there were three times as many troops offered to the Government as the Government could accept, and the Government then apportioned them fairly to the several States.

Now, my friend from Arkansas thinks the reason why I insist on this amendment is that I want the President to take a regiment from the State of Ohio. I do not care whether he takes it or not. He can have it. He can have two regiments. He can have five regiments. He can have ten regiments, if he wants them. He has never called for soldiers from my State that he did not get them, and have more offered than he could accept. If they wait for me to go to the President or Secretary of War, and ask or implore them to employ any of my constituents, either in the civil or military service of the United States, they will wait till doomsday. I never solicited any of these appointments from any President, and I do not expect to do so. Nor do I know, so far as I am concerned, that a single Representative from Ohio has ever been to him on the subject. If he has, it was not with my knowledge. The only member from my State of whose course I know anything on this subject, is one who is a member of the Committee on Military Affairs of the other House, and he voted for the increase of the regular Army, and made a speech for it—my own immediate Representative in the other House, as well as my personal friend; so that it is not true, though the Senator may think so, that in any course which I have seen fit to take on this bill, I have been influenced by any desire that the President should take any citizen of Ohio into the service.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I exculpate the Senator from that entirely, on his statement, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. PUGH. I am happy to be exculpated. Now, is it true that it injures the volunteer system to accept them by companies? They were accepted by companies, in many instances, in the Mexican war. The State of Florida had only two companies. She had no regiment. The State of New Jersey had less than a regiment. The six New England States together, my friend from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] suggests to me, made one regiment. A battalion was called for from New Jersey, less than a regiment, I think, five or six companies, and two companies from Florida. They were as good troops as any. I served for a while with the troops from the State of Florida. I never knew that they were in any wise injured by being only two companies. They were very good companies—very good officers, and excellent men. They were none the less thought of because they had no field officers.

Mr. YULEE. They had a field officer.

Mr. PUGH. Not those with whom I served. There were two companies from Florida—no regiment at all. I know they were stationed in the city of Puebla. Perhaps at a subsequent call of volunteers there was a field officer from that State. I presume there were two calls on that State, as on most others.

Mr. YULEE. There was a major from Florida.

Mr. PUGH. I think there was no major at that station. At least I have no recollection of any such officer. Now, I say, if you raise only two regiments of volunteers for this service, you will never employ them as entire regiments, and you might just as well avoid the controversy. If Kentucky has offered her ten companies, I see no reason why the President should not take five of them, or three of them, and take three from Missouri—I presume Missouri is forward, as usual, offering her troops—and two or three from Arkansas; for I have no doubt Arkansas is as anxious to send her troops forward as any other State. My friend may not think that is the case because they want any particular employment from the Government, for not one of them will ever be paid for the trouble of going, or anything like it. They lose money in every sense. I do not know what it is that possesses these people who want to go, unless it be, as the Senator from Pennsylvania said, that there is a natural unsophisticated love of fight in the American citizen. He will go, and wants to go; not because he wants to be paid for it, for he will never get any pay comparable to his services.

As far as delay is concerned, I will say to the Senator from Arkansas, that if he will have the amendment of the Senator from Virginia reconsidered, I shall withdraw my motion with great pleasure. If we can defeat that amendment, and throw off those other amendments, we can have the House bill passed; but if we are to have the bill amended and sent back to the House, we might as well perfect it. You will have jealousy and trouble and controversy growing out of the fact that, of two regiments you take them all from two States; and there will be just as much controversy if the President were to take one of them from my State as from the State of Kentucky. You had better avoid the controversy. I do not care anything more about it than that. It is perfectly immaterial to me what disposition the Senate make of it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I took notes of the remarks of the Senator from Ohio; but I know very well that if we go into this matter it will be endless, and I believe I shall not distinguish myself by rendering any subject that I take hold of one of that character. I shall therefore, although the Senator could easily be answered in regard to the points objectionable to myself, make no reply to his remarks, further than to say as to the merits of the bill, which I desire sincerely to see passed to-day, that if the Senator's amendment be adopted, it does disjoint the bill and abandon the volunteer system; it does throw us upon the conflicting laws of the different States. That result is inevitable, or we are to have the volunteer troops of the different States carried into the field, and commanded by regular officers who have no sympathy with them, and will meet with resistance at almost every step from each company, private, and company officer. I believe it will be lamentable to bring them into the service in that shape. I think the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, however good his intentions in regard to it are, is not founded in wisdom, and is destructive of the bill.

As the opinion of the Senate has been given in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Virginia, by a decided majority, I shall not move to reconsider it unless the amendment of the Senator from Ohio be adopted. If that prevails, I shall move to reconsider the vote adopting the amendment of the Senator from Virginia, hoping that those who insert the amendment of the Senator from Ohio into the bill, will, themselves, afterwards move to reconsider it, and relieve us from that which must destroy the principle on which the bill was originally framed in the House of Representatives.

Mr. PUGH. Why not move now to reconsider the vote adopting the amendment of the Senator from Virginia? Do that, and I shall withdraw my amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I do not make the motion because I do not believe, from the expressions which I have heard from Senators around me, that the amendment of the Senator from Ohio has the least chance of being adopted. I do not wish to ask the Senate to reconsider an amendment which they have already adopted restricting us to two regiments, in the face of their last vote without anything to present to them to show the necessity for such action. I will await the action of the Senate before moving that reconsideration, and I shall not move it unless the Senator's amendment be adopted.

I pass by the remarks of the Senator, declining to take up those points which are matters of consideration between him and myself, and not matters that really affect the merits of the bill before us, because it is unnecessary to go into that line of discussion, and it is easy to make it of an unpleasant character; and I do not wish to contribute to make it that. I hope we shall succeed in obtaining a vote upon the passage of the bill in some shape to-day, and certainly when it is passed, it should be a measure having unity within itself, and a power of organization which it will not have if the amendment of the Senator from Ohio be adopted.

Mr. HUNTER. It was obvious that this bill must of necessity go back to the House of Representatives; for as it came here, even in regard to the mounted regiment for Texas, it did not leave it to the discretion of the President to raise that regiment, but required him to raise it whether he should think it necessary or not. I presume that on consideration there are few persons here who would desire such a regiment to be raised if the President should not think it necessary. I thought that as the bill had to go back to the House of Representatives, it would be better to send it back in the shape in which we could best present ourselves to the country in support of it. I do not see, however, why reducing the number of regiments from five to three, should create any necessity for the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, if it did not exist before. If you raise five regiments, you cannot assign one to each State that will probably apply; nor do I think that that is a legitimate consideration in regard to such a bill as this, to distribute the patronage to result from raising the regiments amongst the different States. The President ought to select them where he can get the best troops, where it will be best for the public service, and there is no more necessity for distributing them in companies amongst the different States when you raise two regiments, than when you raise four or five. I hope, therefore, that the amendment of the Senator from Ohio will not be adopted. There is force in the objection which the Senator from Arkansas has urged, it would destroy the principle of the bill, and might create obstacles in the House of Representatives. As it now stands, its rejection will not delay the bill a minute. I presume it is considered necessary by almost every one here to strike out that provision requiring the President to raise the regiments whether he considers it necessary or not; and therefore we must amend the bill in that respect. Nor do I believe that, in point of fact, my amendment will delay it much. If the House of Representatives insist upon the five regiments, I imagine that the bill will pass in that shape without controversy. I think, therefore, no delay can be produced by adhering to the amendment which the Senate has adopted on my motion, and I hope they will adhere to it. I believe that if a volunteer force of three regiments be enough—and I think they will be found to be sufficient—they will be used probably on the frontiers to defend the country against the Indians. Under that belief, I hope the Senate will adhere to the amendment already adopted, and vote down that proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have a very few words to say on this subject, and I shall endeavor to confine myself to the suggestions contained in the amendment of the Senator from Ohio. Great as is my respect for the intelligence and experience of that gentleman, I cannot concur with him in opinion in this matter. If two regiments are to be raised, besides the regiment of Texas rangers, you cannot apportion a company to each State in the Union, for there would be but twenty companies for thirty-one States. All cannot be gratified. As to the distribution of patronage, I look upon it as a trifling consideration on an occasion of this kind.

But, sir, if you desire to secure efficiency and expedition, I think the volunteers should be raised in regiments, and not in companies. If you take them in single companies from different States it will require some length of time to organize them, and to get them prepared to march to the front.

If, however, regiments are detailed from States, such as the Executive may think most proper, they can be forthwith at the point designated, and get into service without any delay whatever; they will, in the progress of the march, have assimilated themselves to each other; the men will have become acquainted with their officers; they will have officers of their own selection in whom they have confidence; and they will be prepared immediately for prompt and efficient action. If, however, you select single companies from different States, discord will arise; they will be designated as company A, from such a place, and company B, from such another place, and they will not act harmoniously. Take a whole regiment from one State, and all its companies will feel as members of a family; they will be homogeneous in their character; there will be no dissimilarity in their feelings or their objects.

It is for this reason that I desire to see the regiments taken each from a State, with the power to select their own officers. If, as the Senator from Ohio supposes, they will be detailed in small divisions for various purposes, it is most important that they should have officers of their own selection; that the field officers should not be strangers to them, but should be acquainted with the capacity and disposition of the various subordinate officers in their regiments, that they may make suitable details for special purposes, and thereby accomplish more efficient service than they could do without this knowledge. I am decidedly of opinion that it is best to select regiments from States. I do not say this because I expect any to be taken from the State in which I reside, nor would I care to have any taken from there; but I am satisfied that this matter ought to be left discretionary with the President to accept the services of volunteers in regiments, so as to give the greatest facility to the action that is expected to be taken under the provisions of this bill. I shall vote against the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, satisfied that there is no substantial reason for its adoption, and I can see many impediments to the prosecution of the campaign if it should be adopted. It will produce delays, discords, dissimilarity of character, and want of capacity in the commanding officers to make the details that might be requisite for special services.

Mr. PUGH. As the friends of the volunteers, as well as the friends of the regulars, appear to be opposed to my amendment, and I have put in sufficient protest and warning to guard myself against the consequences, I shall ask leave of the Senate to withdraw it; and when the bill comes out of committee, I shall demand the yeas and nays on the amendment of the Senator from Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. STUART in the chair.) The Senator may withdraw his amendment.

Mr. PUGH. I withdraw it.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. PUGH. I ask for a separate vote on concurring in the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. IVERSON. I hope the other amendments will be concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the Chair will state the question on all the amendments except the one alluded to.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I beg leave to inquire of my friend from Georgia whether the amendments are of an essential character, and necessary to the operation of the bill? If they are not essential, I submit to him, as one of the patrons of this measure, whether we had not better waive these amendments altogether, and take the bill as it comes from the House of Representatives?

Mr. IVERSON. I will respond to the Senator from Kentucky by saying that there are some amendments which I could not consent to waive, and especially that one which relates to the appointment of quartermasters and commissaries. The original bill gives the appointment of quartermasters and commissaries to the regiments themselves. The Secretary of War I know is decidedly opposed to any such provision, and so am I, and so are the Committee on Military Affairs. That is an essential amendment.

Mr. KING. On some of the amendments the committee were unanimous.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. But are they necessary?

Mr. KING. We thought so.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will take the question on concurring in all the amendments, except the one reducing the number of regiments.

The amendments were concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now recurs on the amendment offered, in Committee of the Whole, by the Senator from Virginia, to reduce the number of regiments.

Mr. PUGH called for the yeas and nays on concurring in the amendment; and they were ordered.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I wish now to say a single word. By the bill as it now stands, four regiments are authorized, in addition to the Texas mounted regiment; and the President is authorized to accept as many of them as the public service requires. If the Government want but two, we can rely on the President to call for but two. The President must know the condition of the Treasury as well as we do, and that will have the proper influence, besides the general considerations of his duty. We must suppose him to have firmness enough not to be overcome by a captain or a colonel who comes there, and wants to be taken into the service. To make such a material alteration to the bill may subject it, in the other House, to serious delays, which are fatal to the measure. I shall vote against the amendment, and leave the President to his responsibility, to say what is necessary and what is not.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I concur with the Senator from Kentucky. In supporting the amendment before I yielded my own judgment; but upon full reflection, I am satisfied that it is better to leave the discretion to the President. Then he can and will limit the number of troops to those that he wants, rather than to those who are sought to be obtained at his hands, and therefore I must change my vote. On that point I shall vote against the amendment.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 34, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Benjamin, Biggs, Bright, Broderick, Brown, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Clay, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Evans, Fessenden, Fitzpatrick, Foster, Gwin, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Mason, Pearce, Seward, Sidel, Thomson of New Jersey, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bigler, Crittenden, Douglas, Fitch, Green, Hammond, Henderson, Johnson of Arkansas, Jones, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Stuart, Thompson of Kentucky, and Wright—16.

So the amendment was concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time; and on the question "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. WADE called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. HALE. I do not wish to occupy the attention of the Senate more than a moment or two, but simply to call attention to the fact that this bill now is put upon an entirely different footing from that which was presented at the beginning of the session. Then we were asked by the Administration for an increase of the Army. That came before us in a modified shape, by the bill of the Military Committee, asking for additional companies and additional men, but still looking to a permanent increase of the Army. The idea that the Administration wanted volunteers, was then rejected. That proposition failed; and now the measure has come up in this shape, a bill simply providing for two regiments of volunteers, and one more for Texas. I look upon it as substantially a proposition for a permanent increase of the Army; and as that in the bald shape has been voted down, I look upon this as an insidious step advancing in that direction. I believe that if we vote these three regiments of volunteers now, before the time arrives when they are to be discharged, the Administration will be asking, instead of volunteers, for a permanent increase to the regular standing Army. I look upon this as a step in that direction; and looking upon it in that light, I shall vote against it. I shall make no argument, but I simply appeal to every man on this floor who is opposed to the first step—no, not the first step, but to a step by which this Government is to be converted from a Republic of law to a military despotism—to vote against any increase of the Army.

Mr. HOUSTON. I take the very opposite view of the gentleman from New Hampshire. I have no doubt that if it is necessary to employ troops, the efficiency of the volunteers will be such as to convince the public mind that they are the only efficient description of troops that will hereafter necessarily be employed in the defense of the country. In that way it will supersede the passion that may exist for the increase of the regular Army. I think it is the only possible means of defeating, rather than contributing to, the desire for an increase of the regular Army. That is one reason which prevails with me on the present occasion to support the volunteer system in preference to the regular Army; for I have determined, as I have before expressed myself, never to vote for an increase of the regular Army, unless it is in time of war, and never for the purpose of suppressing intestine broils.

Mr. WILSON. I am a member of the committee who reported this measure. I have expressed myself heretofore in favor of granting to the Administration a volunteer force for the purpose of being used in the Territory of Utah in support of the laws of the country. This bill comes before us now, I think, in the best possible form in which a measure of this character can come at all. It confines the use of these troops to that Territory, or to the suppression of Indian hostilities on the western frontier, and on the frontiers of the State of Texas. I shall therefore give my vote for this bill, for I am in favor of maintaining the authority of the Government in the Territory of Utah. I would vote to support the Government in maintaining the laws of the country there, and, at the same time, I would send a commission to that Territory to ascertain the real cause of the difficulties there, and to see how they could be settled. I would treat that people as I would a tribe of Indians; and if I could purchase their country, and get them to leave the United States for any portion of the North American continent, I would vote any reasonable amount of money very cheerfully for that purpose. But these people lie in the heart of the continent, on the highway to the Pacific coast. They are in rebellion against this Government. I do not know that the Government of the United States has wronged them. The Government of the United States asks for sufficient volunteer force to suppress this rebellion, and this bill proposes to grant them two regiments of volunteers to be used there. I cannot see what my friend from New Hampshire sees in this measure; and I shall vote for the bill cheerfully.

Mr. HALE. I know that the Senator from Massachusetts would not do anybody injustice; he certainly would not do me injustice; but I am not willing to be put in a false position by purpose, or even by accident. When the Senator says he is going to vote for this volunteer force because he is in favor of sustaining the law, it would seem to imply that those who vote against it do so because they were not in favor of sustaining law. Now, sir, it is because I am in favor of law and against brute force; it is because I am in favor of civilization, and law, and liberty, regulated by law; because I am jealous of your Executive, and jealous of the purposes with which he comes here asking for an increase of the regular Army; it is because I am in favor of law and against violence; in favor of law in Kansas as well as in Utah; in favor of law in Washington city and in every other place, that I go against strengthening the hands of this Executive, that has now been here ever since the commencement of this session, asking in every shape in which importunity could put its requests, for an increase of the military force of this country. Is there any man in this country, civilian or military man, who is to tell me that the military force of this country to-day is not able to put down a rebellion which only consists in Brigham Young's proclamations? What is your Army of fifteen thousand men about? What is the greatest standing Army we ever had in a time of peace, employed about? Is it in fighting Indians? Sir, read the history of your Indian wars, and you will find that your Army have provoked, rather than put down, hostilities. We have pending before this Government, in some shape or other—I do not know how many, but we shall find out before the session is over—bills for paying five or six million dollars of debt, that have been incurred in these Indian wars.

A few days ago, a gentleman whose name I do not remember—but probably there are some in the Senate who can enlighten me on it, when I tell them that he was superintendent of Indian affairs in Oregon prior to the last administration—had a conversation with me on this subject. He went to the superintendency of those Indians, as he told me, and requested in the first instance that every soldier might be withdrawn; he did not want any army. It was done; and he had peace—no war, no quarrel, no $5,000,000 claim to be paid. He was superseded or resigned; he went out of office, and somebody else succeeded him. Different counsels prevailed, and soldiers were sent there. The result was, if the accounts published by your own General Wool are to be relied upon, that there was one of the most infamous wars—it does not deserve to be dignified with the name of war, but one of the most infamous butcheries of the Indians that was ever perpetrated on the face of this globe. It was perpetrated under your command. That is the result of giving the Administration soldiers to send into the Indian country. If I had my way, I should withdraw every soldier from the Indian country.

It is for the reason that I am for peace and liberty regulated by law, that I am opposed now, as I always have been, to increasing the military power of the Government. I would just as soon vote for regulars as I would for volunteers, because I know where it leads, and I should like to take the step with my eyes open, and not to be hoodwinked or deceived. This Administration have tried and tried, as long as they could, to get regular soldiers; and you have refused, and rightfully refused. Failing in that, still having the same purpose, the same object, the same end, they now say, though before they would not have volunteers and repudiated the idea, "if we cannot get regulars we will take volunteers;" and the same men who but a little while ago rejected your volunteers with scorn are now here asking for them.

How was it on the other side of the House? Who voted down the volunteers before? The very gentlemen who are now asking for them. I think I see in his seat the honorable Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. Brown:] I hope he has not altered his mind. I heard what he said upon the subject of volunteers, and nobody rebuked him. I hope those gentlemen who voted against volunteers have not altered their minds. I have not; and it is for this reason that I am opposed to the bill. I am not willing, by expression, or by implication, or by silence, to be put in the attitude of being opposed to law because I do not want to increase the brute force of an Administration in which I have no confidence. I have no confidence in them, nor in the purposes for which they want this army. I have voted against it, and shall continue to do so.

Mr. CAMERON. I voted for the original bill providing for raising five regiments of regular troops. I did so with a protest against their becoming a portion of the standing Army; but I voted for it because my course always has been to give the Administration in power such troops as they think necessary to defend the country in time of war. They say there is a war in Utah, and they say it is necessary to have a certain amount of troops to protect the honor of the country. I think they have made a great mistake in producing that war. In my judgment it would have been much better if they had sent new governors and other officers into the Territory with a small escort, and with a conciliatory message. But the Administration have thought differently; and if there was no war before, they have provoked one now. When the country is engaged in war I cannot refuse to allow the Administration to have such troops as they think necessary to protect the honor and the interests of the country. I shall vote for volunteer regiments with a great deal more pleasure than I voted for the regulars, because I cannot believe that by any process they can be conjured into a portion of the regular standing Army. I have too much faith in the representatives of the people in the other House, and the representatives of the States here, to believe that by any trick, by any management unworthy of men, volunteer soldiers who are called out for a special purpose can be made a portion of the regular standing Army. I have always been opposed to large standing armies. I think the interests of our country do not require them, and the genius of our institutions is against them. But this war is a war of the Administration; and I desire that the responsibility of it shall be on the Administration. I have no faith in their ability to conduct it; and I believe that before a year has passed over it will be evident to every citizen of the country that they have committed a great blunder; that they have expended millions upon millions of dollars in a fruitless endeavor to give power to themselves. I wish them to have the responsibility of it, and not the party to which I belong; and therefore I shall vote for this volunteer bill.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I had no idea of saying a word that the Senator from New Hampshire would consider, by implication or otherwise, as reflecting upon his position. I have no doubt of the purity of his motives in his action upon this measure. My object was simply to state the motives that governed me in the vote I am about to give. The Administration came here asking for five additional regiments. One of the reasons given by the Administration for a permanent increase of the Army of the United States to this extent, was the necessity of using troops to put an end to the difficulties in the Territory of Utah. The Administration has failed, signally failed in both Houses of Congress, in the attempts at an increase of the regular Army. It was rejected in the Senate by a large vote. The House of Representatives rejected it, and passed a bill to raise five volunteer regiments, one regiment to be used on the frontier of the State of Texas, the object being, as I understand, to take from the State one regiment of the regular Army, and send it to Utah. We have amended the bill to-day by reducing the number of regiments from five to three; and I am told, though I do not know that it is true, this is satisfactory to the Administration.

This bill provides for the use of these volunteers in the Territory of Utah, or on the frontiers of the country, in suppressing Indian hostilities. It is a small matter of itself. I do not know what will come of the Utah difficulty. There may be trouble, and the Administration may need military force. I take it that, in the present condition of the public Treasury, the Administration will not summon volunteers to the field unless it needs force. When the proposition is put in the shape in which it now stands, I am unwilling to deny to the Administration the authority to accept the small force of two regiments of volunteers to aid, if it deems the force necessary, in supporting the laws of the country in the Territory of Utah. I am willing to give the Administration this authority, and I hope it will be followed up by a proposition to send proper men to that Territory, and endeavor, if possible, by peaceable means, to make some arrangement to preserve the peace there, or to remove the people out of the territory of the United States. Without meaning to reflect upon any one, or to question the motives of any Senator, I shall give my vote for this bill, simply as a measure connected with the Mormon difficulty in the Territory of Utah.

Mr. GREEN. I rise to a privileged question—not to interfere with the passage of this bill, but to make a motion to reconsider the order by which the Senate resolved that when they adjourned to-day, it should be to meet on Monday next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That motion will be entered.

Mr. BROWN. I wish to say a word in reply to the Senator from New Hampshire, who made an allusion to me a moment ago. I know that the Senate is impatient to get clear of this bill, for I learn, from an announcement just made from the House of Representatives, that "Monsieur Tonsen has come again;" Kansas has appeared again, and, of course, we can do nothing until we get her out. But, on this subject of the Army bill, in the earlier part of the session, I took very decided and emphatic ground against the use of volunteers for this service. I am opposed to them now. I think no such troops ought to be sent into the field, and especially, that none such should be sent to Utah. I want peace in Utah. I have never believed there was any danger of war there, if we should only have prudent counsels here, and a prudent execution of the law elsewhere. But our Republican friends take the ground that they will have no increase of the Army. Let Kansas bleed; let Utah bleed; let the torch belighted up all along the line of the frontier; let women and children be indiscriminately butchered: they will stand by, coldly look on, and vote no increase of the Army. What boots it to them that one hundred and fifty women and children are murdered by the savages in cold blood, and that the Executive Government comes here and asks for additional troops to protect your emigrants? What do they care, if law and order and Constitution are all trampled under foot in Utah? They stand coldly by, and refuse to vote any additional troops. What care they, if Kansas bleeds at every pore? They only make capital of it. I want order; I want a triumph of the law and of the Constitution in Utah, in Kansas, and everywhere else; and when savages commit outrages upon our people, I want to see justice following close upon their heels, chastising them into obedience to the superior authority of this Government.

It ought to be done through our regular Army. I do not sympathize with that mawkish sympathy which is afraid of a few thousand soldiers; which is apprehensive that the addition of two or three regiments to the standing force is going to overthrow the liberty of the country. Why, sir, old Virginia, worn out and decrepit as she is, with the addition of Maryland, could take your whole standing Army and drown them man by man in the Potomac. Talk about a mere handful of soldiers, sixteen or seventeen thousand men, overturning liberty, when there are twenty-five million freemen to defend it with their strong arms and their brave and patriotic hearts! It is nonsense to talk in that way. It is underrating the energy, the physical and mental energy of your people, to indulge in and express any such apprehensions.

I am opposed to the volunteer service, because I believe the regular service will go into the field under better discipline, and be more likely to keep the peace than volunteers. I want peace. I want it with the Indians; I want it in Utah; I want it on the frontier; I want it everywhere. It is because I believe that the regular Army is a peace establishment, that it will get up no unnecessary war, that I have gone for an increase of the regular Army; but when the Senator from New Hampshire, the Senator from Massachusetts, and other Senators on the Republican side get up here and denounce the Administration, saying that there is some secret purpose to increase the Army for bad motives, then I can go with them no longer. I supposed, when I went with them against volunteers, that they were doing it honestly and sincerely; that I was to have their support for some sort of increase of the regular Army up to the standard of the actual public necessity; but I find that, instead of that, they will go for no increase. They will leave anarchy and confusion to govern throughout all the land, and the more of it the better. In that state of things, finding that the Opposition is determined to vote for no increase of the Army of any kind, I shall withdraw my former declaration, and vote for this bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. Though I am anxious to vote upon this bill, and do not desire to detain the Senate, I think it proper to allude to some remarks which have been made. In the first place, I regretted to hear an attempt, on the part of the Senator from New Hampshire, to reflect upon the President of the United States, as I thought, in an unjust manner. I am not the advocate of the President of the United States; he does not expect advocacy at my hands; but I am willing and anxious to render justice to him. It will be found, I think, by reference to the annual message of the President of the United States, that he founded his recommendation for an increase of the Army upon the suggestion of the Secretary of War and the Commanding General, who, after a conference between themselves, had informed him that it was very important that the regular force of the United States should be increased. The President, adopting that recommendation, presented it to Congress upon the authority of those officers, and suggested, as a reason for the increase, the difficulties with Utah. It was natural that the President of the United States, relying upon the heads of this branch of the Government, should have adopted a recommendation so plausible as that which was presented to his consideration, and refer it to this body. From all his antecedents, however, I am satisfied that he is not himself in favor of an increase of the regular Army to an undue extent. Such has not been his course heretofore; nor do I believe it is his desire at this time, but it seemed to be proper that he should submit the question to Congress and ask for its action when the matter was pressed, by the high officers to whom I have referred, upon his notice. I think, then, the reflections cast upon him are hardly as courteous as the characteristic generosity of the Senator from New Hampshire would have induced him to expect.

The Senator from Mississippi deprecates any mawkish apprehension of the increase of the regular Army, and says that old Virginia could whip it. Well, sir, I do not think it is necessary to make any calculation upon the subject, but to prevent the possible occurrence of such an unpleasant event, I should regard the present establishment as all sufficient for the purposes of the Government. There are now, I think some two thousand two hundred regular troops in Utah; but it will be recollected that our regular Army amounts to fifteen thousand men, and if they be withdrawn from points at which they are utterly inefficient and unnecessary and concentrated in Utah, they will be amply sufficient for the purpose of subjugating the Mormons, if it be possible to do so.

It is said, however, that the regular troops are necessary for the protection of the frontier against the Indians. I say they are as useless as so many post oak trees upon the frontier. If you put volunteers behind the trees, they will be more efficient than regulars. Upon the frontier, the regulars are stationed in forts, and who ever heard of a fort giving protection to a settlement, unless by affording the inhabitants a place of refuge to which they might fly. A few well mounted savages can go between the forts, make a foray into the country, abstract cavalry from the citizens, and return unmolested. It is useless for you to start infantry to pursue them and reclaim the horses. They will march with great alacrity, it may be some fifteen miles a day; but the Indians make the space of fifty or seventy miles a day; and how long will it take for them at that rate to overtake the foraging party of the Indians? They would not succeed in it, and that is the history of all the efforts of the infantry. They are perfectly useless for this service. What does the Indian care for them? I have said, and I repeat, they only provoke hostilities on the part of the Indians. They can pass by the white forts, and steal horses and return in triumph to their tribes with their trophies, and it is an achievement. When the warrior returns, after having passed by the white man's fort and his great warriors, he is swelled into a man of importance, and perchance he brings back a few scalps to exhibit at the war dance. This provokes them. They can pass around the forts if necessary, and entice a soldier away, and he is as defenseless as you can imagine a creature to be, and they scalp him and bear off his scalp as a trophy, from within sight of the fortress. This is the result of your system of defending the frontier by stationing infantry in forts.

The stationing of your regulars on the frontiers provokes the Indians to hostilities; and, unless they are cavalry or dragoons, they are utterly useless. They cannot be maintained, at any reasonable expense, in a situation to give protection to our frontiers. The system must be changed; you never can give efficient protection to the frontier with infantry stationed in forts. The Indian must be a great simpleton who would go within reach of the cannon or small arms of a fort, but he can pass by the fort and go one hundred or two hundred miles into the interior, reach the settlements, and commit depredations. You may make a cordon of posts, but, unless you build a rampart connecting one with another, you will never prevent the Indians coming in between them. To suppress Indian depredations, you must have mounted rangers, who will traverse the frontier and surprise the Indian when he does not expect it—men adroit to such warfare; men capable of taking advantage of the Indians; men who have been inured to dexterity of this kind. You may withdraw all your regular troops from Texas, and thereby add two thousand to your army in Utah, if you will give us a regiment of rangers. Give us that, and I will answer for the defense of our frontier. These are the efficient men.

Sir, it is no mawkish fear of the regular Army that has ever induced me to go against its increase. I am opposed—not to its influence upon the nation as a formidable assailing power; not as one that is to march to Washington city, dictate laws, and say who shall rule; not as praetorian guards, nor as janissaries that are to march here, and place an imperial scepter in some lordling's hand. I have no fear of that kind; but there is a more fearful and terrible influence at work now. That influence is felt here; it is felt at the other end of the Capitol; it is felt throughout all the veins of society; every artery thrills with it, and every nerve vibrates to its touch. It is the increase of officers in the Army, whose friends rally to their rescue if aught should menace their continuance in the service. It is the influence of friends, those who have relatives in the Army, on the Representatives at the other end of this Capitol, and operating upon Senators through the Legislatures of States, that is to subvert this Government at some future day. They are now becoming sufficiently numerous to form a privileged class in society, and that is never favorable to the perpetuity of free institutions; it never will sustain this country; but it will sap the foundations by degrees; and every increase you bring to the regular Army is but adding to the insidious influence that is to undermine the institutions of the country.

That is what I contend against. It is what I will always contend against. This is the result of no mawkishness; but, looking into the vista of future time, I perceive an influence which has grown into importance, obscured in its outset, but manifest in its terrible developments to this nation, when even Congress will legislate to contribute to its grandeur and its elevation. Yes, sir, that is what I dread and what I apprehend. I shall not live to see it, but others will witness the melancholy catastrophe that awaits this country; and gradually, in its progress, you must arrest it. I would stop here. Your fortresses can be well kept up by your regular Army now in service; but I tell you, Mr. President, whenever war comes, and your national honor has to be sustained and defended, it has to be done by the volunteers of the country—the heart and soul of this nation; for when have your institutions or your national honor been assailed or invaded when the great national heart did not throb and send a force through the arteries of this nation to every extremity, that called forth the volunteer men of the nation to vindicate your honor and defend your rights? Had you any example of delinquency on their part, you might distrust them; but as long as they are faithful to your banners, as long as they bear your eagles aloft, as they have already done, rely upon them as the great saving principle of liberty and the continuance of your institutions. But yield not to mercenaries who by accident are thrown upon our soil, forming our rank and file in the Army, who have no sentiments of nationality with us, and who only as mercenaries fight or act—men who have no national soul about them, but merely contribute to numbers without that chivalry, that amor patriæ, which will always give victory to your arms when you grapple with an adversary worthy of your steel.

The yeas and nays being taken on the passage of the bill, there were—yeas 41, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Bell, Benjamin, Biggs, Bright, Broderick, Brown, Cameron, Crittenden, Douglas, Evans, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Harlan, Henderson, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Seward, Shidell, Stuart, Thompson of Kentucky, Thomson of New Jersey, Wilson, Wright, and Yulee—41.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, King, Pearce, Seward, Trumbull, and Wade—13.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. HUNTER. I move to amend the title of the bill by striking out "four" and inserting "two."

The amendment was agreed to; and the title reads: "An act to provide for the organization of a regiment of mounted volunteers for the defense of the frontier of Texas; and to authorize the President to call into the service of the United States two additional regiments of volunteers."

KANSAS—LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

While Mr. WILSON was addressing the Senate on the volunteer regiments bill, and before Mr.

BROWN's allusion to that subject, a message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I am directed by the House of Representatives to inform the Senate that the House has passed the bill (S. No. 161) entitled "An act for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union, with an amendment; in which I am directed to ask the concurrence of the Senate."

Mr. GREEN. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate ordered that, when it adjourned to-day, it should be until Monday next.

Mr. BRODERICK called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, were—yeas 33, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bright, Brown, Clay, Douglas, Evans, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Henderson, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Shidell, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Wright, and Yulee—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Pearce, Seward, Thompson of Kentucky, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—21.

So the vote was reconsidered.

The question then recurred on the motion to adjourn to Monday next; which was decided in the negative.

Mr. GREEN. I move that the Senate bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of Kansas as a State into the Union, which has been returned from the House of Representatives with an amendment, be taken up for consideration. If it should give rise to discussion, I presume it will hardly be possible to get through with it to-night; and in that event, after I have submitted a motion, I shall be willing that the bill and the amendment be ordered to be printed, so that to-morrow we may consider and decide the question. But, in the first place, I move that the bill be taken up for consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GREEN. I move to dispense with the reading of the amendment.

Several SENATORS. Print it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. STUART in the chair.) The Chair will suggest to the Senator that objection having been made, the amendment must be read.

Mr. GREEN. Who objects?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I presume there will be no objection to dispensing with the reading of the amendment, ordering it to be printed, and letting it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection was made to the amendment being acted on until it was read, I understand.

Mr. SEWARD. It is understood there will be no action to-night.

Mr. GREEN. That is the understanding. I desire to submit a motion to print the amendment; second, that the Senate disagree to the amendment; next, that its further consideration be postponed until to-morrow; and then that the Senate adjourn.

The motion to print the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GREEN. I now move that the Senate non-concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives; and, having submitted that motion, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 1, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. SEPTIMUS TUSTIN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER stated that the business first in order was the call of committees for reports.

POLICE FORCE OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask the unanimous consent of the House for leave to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into the sufficiency of the present police force for the preservation of the peace, and for the protection of persons and property in said District; and whether it is expedient that Congress shall adopt any measures to give increased efficiency thereto, with liberty to report at any time, by bill or otherwise.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. The Committee for the District of Columbia have that subject before them now; but I do not know that I object to the resolution.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Let the resolution be adopted; it is important that it should be.

The resolution was agreed to.

BILLS UPON THE SPEAKER'S TABLE.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, until one o'clock, when it is the wish of the House to take action on the Kansas bill, I hope the House will consent to take up and dispose of the bills upon the Speaker's table antecedent to that bill.

Mr. BLISS. I want to know what the bills are?

The SPEAKER. There are seventeen bills before the Kansas bill, which the House desires to vote on to-day.

Mr. BLISS. I understand that this does not include any bill which is up for engrossment? I understand that there is a bill upon the Speaker's table for engrossment, and included in the eleventh order of business.

The SPEAKER. That is after the Kansas bill upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. BLISS. That is all I wish to know.

There being no objection, the bills on the Speaker's table were taken up, read a first and second time, and disposed of as indicated below.

STEAMER FEARLESS.

An act (S. No. 57) to authorize a register to be issued to the steamer Fearless. Referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REGISTERS FOR VESSELS.

An act (S. No. 32) to repeal an act entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to change the names of vessels in certain cases," approved 5th March, 1856.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope there will be no objection to that bill being put upon its passage. When the bill is read there will be no objection to it.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Mr. Speaker, there should be no objection to putting that bill on its passage. Under the law passed during the last Congress, there have been ninety-two vessels which have had their names changed, and of that number thirty-five have foundered at sea. Petition after petition has come into this House asking for the repeal of that law. It is simply taking it out of the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury, and compelling gentlemen who wish to change the name of a vessel to come, as heretofore, before Congress. There can be no possible objection to it.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. What is the law that it is proposed to repeal?

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I will send the law to the Clerk to be read.

The Clerk read the law, as follows.

"Be it enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to permit the owner or owners of any vessel to change the name of the same when, in his opinion, there shall be sufficient cause for so doing; and he may establish such rules and regulations as he shall deem proper for that purpose."

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to inquire whether the object is to bring everybody here who wants the name of a vessel changed? I think it is wrong, for the Secretary of the Treasury can certainly attend to it better than Congress.

Mr. COMINS. As I took some interest in the passage of the law which this bill is intended to repeal, I desire to say a single word upon it before it is put upon its passage, or referred to a committee. When foreign vessels have been purchased and rebuilt by American citizens, and the repairs upon which have been equal to three fourths of their value when ready for sea, as American vessels, it has been the universal practice of Congress to pass special acts authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue a register, and under such name as the owner might desire. These cases have become frequent. That Congress might not be put to the trouble and expense of passing a special act to meet each and every case which might arise, it was deemed advisable that a general law on this subject should be passed. My attention was first called to this matter, Mr. Speaker, by one of your colleagues in the Thirty-Fourth Congress, [Mr. Aiken,] whose experience in the Committee on Commerce, and whose general good judgment taught him the necessity of such a law. The act of March 5, 1856, was passed. It is due to myself to remark that it was considered in committee, and passed in the House in my absence from sickness; but frankness requires me to say also, that I was in favor of a general law of this kind, and had I been present I should undoubtedly have voted for it. It was intended to facilitate commercial business. Under no conceivable circumstances could it be supposed that such abuses could be perpetrated as are alleged to have been practiced under it.

It appears that the law is too broad in its character, that it gives the Secretary of the Treasury too much power; under that law the Secretary of the Treasury can change the name of any vessel at his pleasure, under such regulations as he may deem it expedient to adopt. Under that law, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. JOHN COCHRANE] has said, a large number of vessels have had their names changed, many of which have foundered, or otherwise been lost at sea. Under that act the celebrated George Law, of filibuster notoriety, was changed to that of Central America, and hundreds of our fellow-citizens found a watery grave who otherwise would never have been decoyed on board that notoriously unseaworthy ship. Its repeal has been demanded. It has been demanded by the various boards of underwriters, by the mercantile community, and by the universal traveling public. But, Mr. Speaker, the fault is not in the law, it is in the abuse of it by those who administer it. I repeat that it was passed for the benefit of the commercial and navigation interests. I am still of the opinion that a general law on this subject is desirable; that such a law can be framed in committee that will not be objectionable in its features, and be submitted for the consideration of the House. The Secretary of the Treasury having suspended all operations under this law, there need be no haste in the matter. And for the reasons which I have stated, I desire this bill may take the usual course, and be referred to the Committee on Commerce. I make that motion.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope it will be so referred. The gentleman from New York has told us that of the ninety-two vessels whose names have been changed under this law, thirty-five have foundered.

Mr. COBB. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and, under the operation thereof, the bill was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. COBB moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

VICE ADMIRAL MEHMED PASHA.

A resolution (S. No. 18) for the reception of Vice Admiral Mehmed Pasha, of the Turkish Navy, and to facilitate the objects of his mission in superintending the construction of a vessel-of-war in the United States.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Whatever reason may have existed for the passage of such a law does not exist at this time; and I feel authorized to say that the gentleman at the head of the Department, at whose instance it came from the Senate, does not desire its passage. I move that it be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

BENEVOLENT CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

An act (S. No. 97) to incorporate the Benevolent Christian Association of Washington city. Referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

COLUMBIAN INSTITUTION.

An act (No. 99) to amend the "Act to incorporate the Columbian Institution for the instruction of the deaf and dumb and the blind," approved February 16, 1857. Referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

GONZAGA COLLEGE.

An act (No. 76) to incorporate Gonzaga College, in the city of Washington and District of Columbia.

Mr. KELLY. I trust that bill may now be put upon its passage. It is a bill to which no one will have any objection. It was brought before this House in February, and relates solely to a matter concerning the District of Columbia. I move that it be put upon its third reading.

Mr. BURNETT. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. KELLY. I had the floor, and the gentleman cannot take it from me to make a motion. I call the previous question.

Mr. BURNETT. The gentleman had yielded the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was of opinion that the gentleman from New York had yielded the floor, or of course he would not have recognized the gentleman from Kentucky. If the gentleman had not surrendered the floor, the gentleman from Kentucky could not have made the motion.

Mr. KELLY. Very well, I will not object. I move to refer the bill to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

LIABILITY OF SHIP-OWNERS.

An act (S. No. 77) to amend an act entitled "An act to limit the liability of ship-owners, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1851.

Mr. WADE. I move that the bill be read a third time, and put upon its passage.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I move to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WADE. I move the previous question on my motion.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I thought I was recognized to make a motion to refer.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not recognize the gentleman.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I hope the House will not sustain the previous question. It is an important bill, and ought to go to a committee.

Mr. WADE. I withdraw my motion, and move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

ROME ARSENAL.

An act (S. No. 170) to grant Rome arsenal to the State of New York, on certain conditions. Referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PROCESS IN THE UNITED STATES COURTS.

An act (S. No. 36) to provide for the issuing, service, and return of original and final process in the circuit and district courts of the United States in certain cases. Referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN VERMONT.

An act (S. No. 111) to alter the time of holding the circuit and district courts of the United States for the district of Vermont. Referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PROVIDENT CLERKS' ASSOCIATION.

An act (No. 151) further to amend the act entitled "An act to incorporate the Provident Association of Clerks in the civil departments of the Government of the United States, in the District of Columbia." Referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN UTAH.

A resolution (No. 22) providing for the payment of certain expenses of holding the United States courts in the Territory of Utah. Referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

WILLIAM ALLEN.

An act (No. 117) for the relief of William Allen, of Portland, in the State of Maine. Referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

NATIONAL FOUNDRY IN PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be, and are hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a national foundry at Harrisburg or Lebanon, in the State of Pennsylvania.

WASHINGTON AQUEDUCT.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Is there not a bill on the table to condemn lands needed for the Washington aqueduct?

The SPEAKER. There is such a bill.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The superintendent of the work was here a few days ago, and spoke to me on this subject. It is very important to the progress of the work that this bill shall pass immediately. There is some land owned by minors, married women, and others, of which the Government cannot get the title except such a bill be passed. I ask that the bill be put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that there are only four or five more Senate bills on the table; and perhaps they can be all disposed of.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Very well.

LIEUTENANT WILLIAM N. JEFFERS.

Joint resolution (S. No. 24) authorizing Lieutenant William N. Jeffers to accept a sword of honor from her Majesty the Queen of Spain.

The resolution gives the assent of Congress to the acceptance, by Lieutenant William N. Jeffers, of the Navy of the United States, of a sword of honor presented to him through the Department of State by her Majesty the Queen of Spain, as an acknowledgment of the very efficient assistance given by him and his vessel to the Spanish schooner Cartajena, in the waters of Parana, on the 26th, 27th, and 28th of October, 1855.

Mr. FLORENCE moved the previous question on the third reading of the joint resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and, under its operation, the joint resolution was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. FLORENCE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JAMES L. DONALDSON.

An act (S. No. 145) for the relief of Brevet Major James L. Donaldson, assistant quartermaster of the United States Army. Referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES.

Joint resolution (S. No. 17) explanatory of the joint resolution giving an increased compensation to all laborers in the employment of the executive and legislative departments of the Government in the city of Washington, approved August 18, 1856. Referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

JEREMIAH Y. DASHIELL.

An act (S. No. 202) for the relief of Jeremiah Y. Dashiell, paymaster in the United States Army. Referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

WASHINGTON AQUEDUCT.

An act (S. No. 197) to acquire certain lands needed for the Washington aqueduct, in the District of Columbia.

The bill was read in extenso. It makes provisions for the acquirement by the Government of the United States of lands needed for the construction of the Washington aqueduct, held by persons who require unreasonable compensation therefor, by minors, femes covertis, persons non compos mentis, and persons residing out of the District of Columbia.

Mr. KEITT. I see that there is a provision in that bill for condemning valuable lands. I wish to know if that provision is limited to the District of Columbia?

A MEMBER. It is.

Mr. KEITT. Then I have no objection.

Mr. FLORENCE. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill. It seems to be conceded on all sides that it ought to be passed.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I hope the previous question will not be pressed upon this bill. It is one of the most serious import—once, to be sure, of beneficial purpose, but one which, as it contemplates the disruption of private interests, should certainly not be passed under the pressure of the previous question. I think that there are many provisions in it which should be referred to some committee for consideration. I move, therefore, that the bill be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot make that motion pending the demand for the previous question.

Mr. FLORENCE. I will merely say that this subject has been investigated. It was investigated by a committee of the Senate. It is absolutely necessary, if this work is to be proceeded with, that this bill should be passed. Its provisions guard every interest very carefully. My only objection to it is that it provides for a publication in only one newspaper, instead of several; but that arises, probably, from my natural desire to give patronage to the newspapers. I demand the previous question.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. If the gentleman will withdraw the demand for the previous question for a moment, I will renew it.

Mr. FLORENCE. As this matter would be likely to occupy some time, I will withdraw the demand for the previous question, and move that the bill be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia; because, after an examination before that committee, its importance will be made more apparent to the House, and it may be passed at any time in half an hour; and, inasmuch as the bill is of great importance, I move that the committee have leave to report at any time.

Mr. SEWARD. Is that latter motion in order? The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. SEWARD. Then I object to it.

Mr. FLORENCE. Very well, then, let the bill go to the committee unconditionally.

Mr. HOUSTON. I hope the gentleman from Georgia will withdraw his objection, and allow authority to be given to the committee to report at any time. It is important that the bill should pass speedily if it is to pass at all. The work is now partially suspended, and will have to be entirely suspended unless the bill is passed. There can be no harm in authorizing the committee to report at any time, and I hope the gentleman from Georgia will withdraw his objection.

Mr. FLORENCE. I suppose the Committee for the District of Columbia will report it back immediately, and the committees will probably soon be called for reports. The work is already partially suspended, and sympathy for those who are thrown out of employment will, I am sure, induce such a sympathizing set of gentlemen as we have here to pass the bill independently of any other consideration.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I object to this debate.

Mr. SEWARD. With my usual good nature, I withdraw my objection. I am always over-persuaded and sometimes do wrong. [Laughter.]

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and, under the operation thereof the bill was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and said committee was authorized to report at any time.

Mr. FLORENCE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LIFE-SAVING STATIONS.

Mr. ROBBINS submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be directed to inquire into the propriety of making an appropriation for the payment of the keepers of the life-saving station-houses on the coast of New Jersey and New York, as was contemplated by the passage of the act authorizing the appointment of said keepers in December, 1854.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Postmaster General in answer to the resolution of the House of Representatives relative to the returns for box rents at city post offices; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Superintendent of Public Printing, in answer to the resolution of the House of the 16th of March, showing the aggregate cost of the public printing ordered by the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

OFFICERS OF THE HOUSE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House communications from the Clerk, Doorkeeper, and Postmaster of the House, in reply to the resolution of the House of the 27th instant, as to the persons employed by them, and so forth; which were severally laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS FROM COURT OF CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House bills and adverse reports from the Court of Claims. The adverse reports were ordered to be placed upon the Calendar, and the bills were (without reading) considered as read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN NORTHERN OHIO.

Mr. MOTT, by unanimous consent, and in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to authorize the holding of terms of the United States district court for the northern district of the State of Ohio at Toledo; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

THE CENSUS OF 1860.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I desire to ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer resolutions similar to the resolution which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] asked for a suspension of the rules to enable him to offer on Monday. The House on that occasion refused to suspend the rules by a small vote. I voted, however, for the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio. It was upon the subject of the appointment of a committee to report to this House the best mode of taking the next census. I think it is a useful resolution, and it seems to be generally so regarded by the House.

Mr. BURNETT. These resolutions can only be introduced by unanimous consent.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. That is what I am asking.

Mr. BURNETT. I object.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I hope the gentleman will allow the resolutions to be read. I think he will then withdraw his objection.

Mr. BURNETT. I have no objection to their being read; but I shall object to them.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed by the Speaker, whose duty it shall be to inquire into and report by bill or otherwise, at as early a period as may be convenient, to the next session of the present Congress, the best mode of taking its next census, so that it shall be national in its character, and represent fairly and truly the progress of our country and of every section.

Resolved, That said committee shall continue until such report shall be made, or until otherwise ordered by the House.

Mr. BURNETT. I object to the resolutions.

CONNECTICUT RIVER.

Mr. ARNOLD submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce is hereby instructed to inquire into the necessity and expediency of making an appropriation for the removal of the obstructions at the mouth of the Connecticut river, and to report by bill or otherwise.

PRIVILEGED QUESTION.

Mr. HASKIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a privileged question. I have for several days observed men upon this floor who are not entitled to its privileges. I see one here now, who is a scribbler for the Herald, and who published in that paper that I had gone over to the Black Republicans, and was with MATTESON and the lobby. He is a thief of character of the name of Shaw. I move that the Doorkeeper shall show him the door, and that the Speaker shall particularly direct the attention of the Doorkeeper to the 17th rule, defining who is and who is not entitled to the privileges of this floor.

The SPEAKER. So far as the latter part of the gentleman's remarks are concerned, it is wholly unnecessary, for the Chair has repeatedly called the attention of the Doorkeeper to the rule.

Mr. HASKIN. I have called the attention of the House to this matter because I have seen men here who were not entitled to the privileges of the floor. As this is an important day in the history of the country, I hope that the Doorkeeper will be compelled to enforce the 17th rule.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will see that the rule is enforced.

ATLANTA, GEORGIA, A PORT OF DELIVERY.

Mr. GARTRELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to establish Atlanta, in the State of Georgia, a port of delivery; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

EXTENSION OF BOUNTY LAND LAW.

Mr. REILLY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill granting bounty land to artificers, ship carpenters, carpenters, and blacksmiths employed under the direction of competent authority in any war in which this country has been engaged since the year 1810; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

GOVERNMENT BARRACKS, SAVANNAH.

Mr. SEWARD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to authorize the transfer and cession of the Government barracks of Savannah, Georgia, to the city of Savannah; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

EQUALIZATION OF PENSIONS.

Mr. FLORENCE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, by unanimous consent, reported a bill to equalize the Army, Navy, and Marine pensions; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

UNSOLD PUBLIC LANDS IN OHIO.

Mr. NICHOLS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to cede to the State of Ohio, the unsold public lands within the limits of said State; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

SALEM, NEW JERSEY, A PORT OF DELIVERY.

Mr. CLAWSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to establish Salem, in the State of New Jersey, a port of delivery; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

JAMES RUMPH.

Mr. MOORE, from the Committee of Claims, by unanimous consent, reported a bill for the relief of James Rumph; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

REVOLUTIONARY PENSION LAWS.

Mr. HICKMAN, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, by unanimous consent reported a joint resolution, authorizing the pensions which certain officers and soldiers of the Revolution were entitled to at the time of their death to be paid to their widows, or their children, or their legal representatives; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I ask the unanimous consent of the House for leave to introduce a bill to authorize and facilitate the construction of a northern and a southern and a central Pacific railroad, and for other purposes.

Mr. KEITT objected, but subsequently withdrew the objection.

Mr. CLEMENS renewed the objection.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, the hour of one having arrived, I move, in pursuance of notice, to take up the Senate bill for the admission of Kansas.

The bill was read a first time by its title; as follows:

An act for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I object to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio making objection to the bill, under the 116th rule, the question propounded to the House will first be, "Shall this bill be rejected?"

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, called for the reading of the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas, the people of the Territory of Kansas did, by a convention of delegates, called and assembled at Leecompton, on the 4th day of September, 1857, for that purpose, form for themselves a constitution and State government, which said constitution is republican, and said convention having asked the admission of said Territory into the Union as a State on an equal footing with the original States—

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the State of Kansas shall be, and is hereby declared to be, one of the United States of America, and admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever. And the said State shall consist of all the territory included within the following boundaries, to wit: beginning at a point on the western boundary of the State of Missouri, where the thirty-seventh parallel of latitude crosses the same; thence west on said parallel to the eastern boundary of New Mexico; thence north on said boundary to latitude thirty-eight; thence following said boundary westward to the eastern boundary of the Territory of Utah, on the summit of the Rocky Mountains; thence northward on said summit to the fortieth parallel of latitude; thence east on said parallel to the western boundary of the State of Missouri; thence south with the western boundary of said State to the place of beginning: Provided, That nothing herein contained respecting the boundary of said State shall be construed to impair the rights of person or property now pertaining to the Indians in said Territory, so long as such rights shall remain unextinguished by treaty between the United States and such Indians, or to include any territory which, by treaty with such Indian tribe, is not without the consent of such tribe to be included within the territorial limits or jurisdiction of any State or Territory; but all such territory shall be excepted out of the boundaries, and constitute no part of the State of Kansas, until said tribe shall signify their assent to the President of the United States to be included within said State, or to affect the authority of the Government of the United States to make any regulation respecting such Indians, their lands, property, or other rights, by treaty, law, or otherwise, which it would have been competent to make if this act had not been passed.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the State of Kansas is admitted into the Union upon the express condition that said State shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the public lands, or with any regulations which Congress may find necessary for securing the title in said lands to the bona fide purchasers and grantees thereof, or impose or levy any tax, assessment, or imposition of any description whatever upon them, or other property of the United States, within the limits of said State; and that nothing in this act shall be construed to abridge or infringe any right of the people asserted in the constitution of Kansas at all times to alter, reform, or abolish their form of government in such manner as they may think proper, Congress hereby disclaiming any authority to interfere or declare the construction of the constitution of any State, except to see that it be republican in form, and not in conflict with the Constitution of the United States; and nothing in this act shall be construed as an assent by Congress to all or to any of the propositions or claims contained in the ordinance annexed to the said constitution of the people of Kansas, nor to deprive the said State of Kansas of the same grants, if hereinafter made, which were contained in the act of Congress, entitled "An act to authorize the people of the Territory of Minnesota to form a constitution and State government, preparatory to admission into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," approved February 26, 1857.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That until the next general census shall be taken, and an apportionment of representation made, the State of Kansas shall be entitled to one Representative in the House of Representatives of the United States.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That from and after the admission of the State of Kansas as hereinbefore provided, all the laws of the United States which are not locally inapplicable, shall have the same force and effect within that State as any other State of the Union; and the said State is hereby constituted a judicial district of the United States, within which a district court, with the like power and jurisdiction as the district court of the United States for the district of Iowa, shall be established. The judge, attorney, and marshal of the United States for the said district of Kansas, shall reside within the same, and shall be entitled to the same compensation as the judge, attorney, and marshal, of the district of Iowa.

The question was then taken; and resulted—yeas 95, nays 137; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Chapin, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark D. Cochran, Coffey, Comins, Covode, Craig, Curtis, Danrell, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Eide, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Goode, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Robert B. So the House refused to reject the bill.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. COX said, I vote in the negative, with the view of having the bill radically amended.

Mr. BURNETT. I object to debate.

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

THE SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

The result was then announced, as above recorded.

THE SPEAKER. The motion to reject the bill having been negatived, second reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was accordingly read a second time.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. It is not my purpose to discuss this bill. I understand that the opponents of the bill have agreed to a proposition which they wish to offer as a substitute. I am willing to allow that proposition to be offered. The gentleman who is to offer it, [Mr. MONTGOMERY.] I understand, desires a few moments to explain the provisions of the amendment.

My friend upon my right [Mr. QUITMAN] also has a substitute which he proposes to offer for the amendment to be offered by the opponents of this bill. I am willing to yield for that purpose also.

I now yield, temporarily, to allow the amendments of the opponents of this bill to be offered.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I move to amend the bill by striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting the following:

That the State of Kansas be, and is hereby, admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever; but, inasmuch as it is greatly disputed whether the constitution framed at Leecompton on the 7th day of November last, and now pending before Congress, was fairly made, or expressed the will of the people of Kansas, this admission of her into the Union as a State is hereby declared to be upon this fundamental condition precedent, namely: that the said constitutional instrument shall be first submitted to a vote of the people of Kansas, and assented to by them, or a majority of the voters, at an election to be held for the purpose; and as soon as such assent shall be given, and duly made known, by a majority of the commissioners herein appointed, to the President of the United States, he shall announce the same by proclamation; and thereafter, and without any further proceedings on the part of Congress, the admission of said State of Kansas into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever, shall be complete and absolute. At the said election the voting shall be by ballot, and by indorsing on his ballot, as each voter may please, "for the constitution," or "against the constitution." Should the said constitution be rejected at the said election by a majority of votes being cast against it, then, and in that event, the inhabitants of said Territory are hereby authorized and empowered to form for themselves a constitution and State government by the name of the State of Kansas, according to the Federal Constitution, and to that end may elect delegates to a convention as hereinafter provided.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said State of Kansas shall have concurrent jurisdiction on the Missouri and all other rivers and waters bordering on the said State of Kansas, so far as the same shall form a common boundary to said State and any other State or States now or hereafter to be formed or bounded by the same; and said rivers and waters, and all the navigable waters of said State, shall be common highways and forever free, as well to the inhabitants of said State as to all other citizens of the United States, without any tax, duty, impost, or toll therefor.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That, for the purpose of insuring, as far as possible, that the elections authorized by this act may be fair and free, the Governor and Secretary of the Territory of Kansas, and the presiding officers of the two branches of its Legislature, namely, the President of the Council and Speaker of the House of Representatives, are hereby constituted a board of commissioners to carry into effect the provisions of this act, and to use all the means necessary and proper to that end. Any three of them shall constitute a board; and the board shall have power and authority, in respect to each and all of the elections hereby authorized or provided for, to designate and establish precincts for voting, or to adopt those already established; to cause polls to be opened at such places as it may deem proper in the respective counties and election precincts of said Territory; to appoint, as judges of election, at each of the several places of voting, three discreet and respectable persons, any two of whom shall be competent to act; to require the sheriffs of the several counties, by themselves or deputies, to attend the judges at each of the places of voting, for the purpose of preserving peace and good order; or the said board may, instead of said sheriffs and their deputies, appoint, at their discretion, and in such instances as they may choose, other fit persons for the same purpose; and when the purpose of the election is to elect delegates to a convention to form a constitution, as hereinbefore provided for, the number of delegates shall be sixty, and they shall be apportioned by said board among the several counties of said Territory, according to the number of voters; and in making this apportionment, the board may join two or more counties together to make an election or representative district, where neither of the said counties has the requisite number of voters to entitle it to a delegate, or to join a smaller to a larger county, having a surplus population, where it may serve to equalize the representation. The elections hereby authorized shall continue one day only, and shall not be continued later than sundown on that day. The said board shall appoint the day of election for each of the elections hereby authorized, as the same may become necessary. The said Governor shall announce, by proclamation, the day appointed for any one of said elections, and the day shall be as early a one as is consistent with due notice thereof to the people of said Territory, subject to the provisions of this act. The said board shall have full power to prescribe the time, manner, and places of each of said elections, and to direct the time and manner of the returns thereof, which returns shall be made to the said board, whose duty it shall be to announce the result by proclamation, and to appoint therein as early a day as practicable for the delegates elected (where the election has been for delegates) to assemble in convention at the seat of government of said Territory. When so assembled, the convention shall first determine, by a vote, whether it is the wish of the proposed State to be admitted into the Union at that time; and, if so, shall proceed to form a constitution and take all necessary steps for the establishment of a State government, in conformity with the Federal Constitution, subject to the approval and ratification of the people of the proposed State. And the said convention shall accordingly provide for its submission to the vote of the people for approval or rejection; and if the majority of votes shall be given for the constitution so framed as aforesaid, the Governor of the Territory shall, within twenty days after the result is known, notify the President of the United States of the same. And thereupon the President shall announce the same by proclamation, and thereafter, and without any further proceedings whatever on the part of Congress, the admission of the said State of Kansas into the Union, upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, shall be complete and absolute.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That in the elections hereby authorized, all white male inhabitants of said Territory, over the age of twenty-one years, who are legal voters under the laws of the Territory of Kansas, and none others, shall be allowed to vote; and this shall be the only qualification required to entitle the voter to the right of suffrage in said elections. And if any person not so qualified shall vote, or offer to vote, or if any person shall vote more than once at either of said elections, or shall make, or cause to be made, any false, fictitious, or fraudulent returns, or shall alter or change any returns of either of said elections, such person shall, upon conviction thereof before any court of competent jurisdiction, be kept at hard labor not less than six months, and not more than three years.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the members of the aforesaid board of commissioners, and all persons appointed by them to carry into effect the provisions of this act, shall, before entering upon their duties, take an oath to perform faithfully the duties of their respective offices, and on failure thereof, they shall be liable and subject to the same charges and penalties as are provided in like cases under the territorial laws.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the officers mentioned in the preceding section shall receive for their services the same compensation as is given for like services under the territorial laws.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the said State of Kansas, when her admission as a State becomes complete and absolute, shall be entitled to one member in the House of Representatives, in the Congress of the United States, till the next census be taken by the Federal Government.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the following propositions be, and the same are hereby, offered to the said people of Kansas for their free acceptance or rejection, which, if accepted, shall be obligatory upon the United States and upon the said State of Kansas, to wit: First, That sections numbered sixteen and thirty-six in every township of public lands in said State, and where either of said sections, or any part thereof, has been sold or otherwise been disposed of, other lands, equivalent thereto, and as contiguous as may be, shall be granted to said State for the use of schools. Second, That seventy-two sections of land shall be set apart and reserved for the use and support of a State university, to be selected by the Governor of said State, subject to the approval of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and to be appropriated and applied in such manner as the Legislature of said State may prescribe for the purpose aforesaid, but for no other purpose. Third, That ten entire sections of land, to be selected by the Governor of said State, in legal subdivisions, shall be granted to said State for the purpose of completing the public buildings, or for the erection of others at the seat of government, under the direction of the Legislature thereof. Fourth, That all salt springs within said State, not exceeding twelve in number, with six sections of land adjoining, or as contiguous as may be to each, shall be granted to said State for its use; the same to be selected by the Governor thereof within one year after the admission of said State, and when so selected, to be used or disposed of on such terms, conditions, and regulations, as the Legislature shall direct: Provided, That no salt spring or land, the right whereof is now vested in any individual or individuals, or which may be hereafter confirmed or adjudged to any individual or individuals, shall by this article be granted to said State. Fifth, That five per centum of the net proceeds of sales of all public lands lying within said State, which shall be sold by Congress after the admission of said State into the Union, after deducting all the expenses incident to the same, shall be paid to said State for the purpose of making public roads and internal improvements, as the Legislature shall direct: Provided, The foregoing propositions hereinbefore offered are on the condition that the people of Kansas shall provide, by an ordinance, irrevocable without the consent of the United States, that said State shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the soil within the same, by the United States, or with any regulations Congress may find necessary for securing the title in said soil to bona fide purchasers thereof; and that no tax shall be imposed on lands belonging to the United States, and that in no case shall non-resident proprietors be taxed higher than residents. Sixth, And that the said State shall never tax the lands or the property of the United States in that State: Provided, however, That nothing in this act of admission shall be construed as to ratify or accept the ordinance attached to the said constitution formed at Lecompton, but said ordinance is hereby rejected by the United States.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. By an arrangement made since the amendment was offered, it is understood that no remarks will be made by me upon the subject. The bill is its own interpreter; it speaks its own language.

I will state that I have furnished copies of the amendment to every gentleman who has indicated a desire to read it. I have a number of copies yet left, and if any gentleman in the House desires a copy he can be supplied by sending a page for it.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I now yield temporarily to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. QUITMAN,] that he may offer his proposition.

Mr. QUITMAN. I offer, as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MONTGOMERY,] the Senate bill, with the following words stricken from the second section:

"And that nothing in this act shall be construed to abridge or infringe any right of the people asserted in the constitution of Kansas at all times to alter, reform, or abolish their form of government in such manner as they may think proper, Congress hereby disclaiming any authority to intervene or declare the construction of the constitution of any State, except to see that it be republican in form, and not in conflict with the Constitution of the United States."

Mr. MONTGOMERY. With the permission of the gentleman, I desire to state that there is a slight change in the amendment I have offered from that of the printed amendment. The last two lines of the printed amendment read, "attached to said constitution; but said ordinance is hereby rejected by the Government of the United States." I have changed the language so that it reads now, "attached to the said constitution formed at Lecompton; but said ordinance is hereby rejected by the United States." The error was merely typographical.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I propose, before the vote is taken upon either substitute, to amend the original bill as it came from the Senate, by moving to strike out from that bill the same words which are excluded by the substitute offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia has the floor.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I cannot yield for any such purpose.

Mr. PENDLETON. I understand that it is now the intention of the gentleman from Georgia to move the previous question; I would like to ask the Chair whether, in case the previous question is sustained, it will be in order to move an amendment to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

The SPEAKER. If the previous question is sustained an amendment would not be in order.

Mr. PENDLETON. I then ask the gentleman from Georgia to yield the floor to me for the purpose of offering an amendment to that substitute.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. What is it?

Mr. PENDLETON. It is to strike out certain words from the fourth section of the substitute.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Read them.

The SPEAKER. Perhaps the Chair can save the gentleman the trouble, by stating that an amendment to an amendment in the third degree would not be in order.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The original bill, which I think is the best that can be passed, is before us; the amendment agreed upon, as I understand, by the opponents to the original bill, is also before us; the substitute for it offered by the gentleman from Mississippi is also before us. No other amendments, therefore, being in order, I move the previous question, that we may come to a fair vote.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I want the gentleman from Georgia to bear in mind, and the record to show the fact, that the gentleman from Georgia refuses to permit me to offer the amendment I have indicated.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. PENDLETON. I desire to appeal to the gentleman from Georgia to give me the floor for one moment that I may state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania the amendment which I propose to offer, and ask him to adopt it as part of his substitute.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I will hear the gentleman.

Mr. PENDLETON. The proposition which I would have offered if I had the opportunity, and which I now ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to adopt as a portion of his substitute is, to strike from the fourth section of the substitute the words "who are the legal voters under the laws of the Territory of Kansas." The object which I have in view in proposing this modification is to allow the qualifications for voters at the election to be held under it to be at least as liberal as those prescribed in the Lecompton constitution, which are as fair as can be desired. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he is willing to accept that as a part of his substitute?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I am not.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Then I ask the previous question.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I wish to state why I do not receive the amendment proposed.

Mr. CLEMENS. I object to debate.

The previous question was seconded.

Mr. PENDLETON asked for the yeas and nays on ordering the main question.

The yeas and nays were not ordered; only seventeen members voting therefor.

The main question was ordered.

The first question now being on Mr. QUITMAN's amendment,

Mr. CAMPBELL called for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GARNETT. I rise to make an inquiry of the Chair. I wish to know whether the question is not now on substituting the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUITMAN] for that of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MONTGOMERY?] in other words, if it is not a competition between the Mississippi proposition and the Pennsylvania proposition?

The SPEAKER. The proposition of the gentleman from Mississippi is offered as a substitute for that of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GIDDINGS. It is to amend the original bill before the question is taken on the substitute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi offers his proposition as an amendment to the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. There is no pending amendment to the original bill, except the substitute offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I wish to ask a question. If the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi be voted down, we will then be brought to a direct vote on that of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

The SPEAKER. That is the effect.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 72, nays 160; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Boccock, Bonham, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Caskie, John B. So the amendment was not agreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. MONTGOMERY's substitute.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 120, nays 112; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Horace F. Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cox, Cragin, Curtis, Damrell, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, English, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foley, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Groesbeck, Grow, Lawrence W. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Trippie, Ward, Warren, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, John V. Wright, and Zollcoffer—112.

So the amendment was agreed to.

When the Speaker announced the result of the vote there was considerable applause manifested in the galleries, accompanied by hissing.

Mr. KEITT. I move that the galleries be cleared.

Mr. McQUEEN. Not the ladies' galleries.

Mr. KEITT. I mean the gentlemen's galleries. I insist on the enforcement of the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair begs to remind gentlemen in the galleries that they are not in a theater; and if the disturbance be repeated, the Chair will exercise the authority vested in him for ordering the Doorkeeper to clear the gentlemen's galleries.

Mr. HOUSTON. It would be a hardship to clear the galleries of those gentlemen who behave themselves.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot believe that every gentleman in the gallery has been guilty of the impropriety, or he would have at once ordered the gentlemen's gallery to be cleared.

Mr. GROW. There was no objection when the applause was on the other side.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question ordered.

Mr. CAMPBELL called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 120, nays 112; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Horace F. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Tripp, Ward, Warren, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, John V. Wright, and Zollicoffer—112.

So the bill, as amended, was passed.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Is it in order to move to strike out of the preamble a portion of the language?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that it is not. The question has been suggested within the last few minutes. The proper time to have moved any amendment to the preamble was, in the opinion of the Chair, before the bill was ordered to a third reading.

Mr. MONTGOMERY moved that the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered; and that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. CAMPBELL, the House (at five minutes to three o'clock, p. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

Friday, April 2, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. SAMUEL ROGERS.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SEWARD. I wish to submit to the Senate Mr. William Henry Ward's mode of signal telegraph for general marine service, together with a communication from him on the subject. This communication connects itself with the bill introduced by the Committee on Commerce authorizing the establishment of a code of marine signals for the marine service. As the bill has been reported, I shall be content to let this communication lie on the table, and ask the attention of the Senate to it when the bill shall come up.

The memorial was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SLIDELL presented the memorial of T. Hart Hyatt, United States Consul at Amoy, in China, praying compensation for judicial services performed under the act of Congress of August 11, 1848; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, presented papers in relation to the claim of Levi Johnson and Mary Burchfield, in the right of Samuel Slaughter to bounty land; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JONES presented a memorial of the Legislature of Iowa, praying for a grant of land to aid in the construction of a railroad from Fort Dodge to Sioux Falls, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FITCH presented a memorial of citizens of Martin county, Minnesota, for the establishment of a mail route from Winnebago City to Jackson; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have received two petitions very numerous signed by citizens of Maine, who represent that, by the provisional articles of the treaty of 1782, the boundary between the State of Maine and the Province of New Brunswick was defined to be by a line to be drawn along the middle of the river St. Croix, from its mouth, in the bay of Fundy, to its source, and from its source north, &c., and by the treaty of 1783 the same boundary was given. The boundary from the source of the river to the northernmost point has been marked and defined; but the line along the river has never yet been defined, leaving the islands in the river still in dispute. These memorialists ask that "your honorable bodies will adopt such measures as will cause the requisite commission to be raised or appointed by the two Governments to run and define said line." I move that the memorials be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. SEWARD, it was Ordered, That the petition of Townsend Harris, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

On motion of Mr. IVERSON, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of John W. Phillips, and that he have leave to withdraw his memorial and papers.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, it was Ordered, That the petition of John B. and Thomas Johnston, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. KING, it was Ordered, That Emma A. Wood have leave to withdraw her petition and papers.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. IVERSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Charles Knap, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce; which was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, announcing that the House had passed the bill of the Senate (S. No. 176) to acquire certain lands needed for the Washington aqueduct in the District of Columbia.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SEBASTIAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 233) for the relief of Samuel C. Phagin and others; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 234) concerning the remission of fines, penalties, and forfeitures; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further petitions or reports, the first business in order is the following resolution from the House of Representatives:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring.) That the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives declare their respective Houses adjourned sine die on the first Monday of June next, at twelve o'clock, m.

Mr. BROWN. I think it very manifest that we ought not to concur in that resolution now. I move that for the present it lie on the table.

Mr. HAMLIN. I hope not.

Mr. SEWARD. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion.

Mr. BROWN. If there be any objection to that precise motion, I will move to postpone the resolution until to-morrow, as Senators around me tell me that will put it on the Calendar to come up in its order. All I ask is, that there be no action on it now. I do not think we are in a condition to dispose of it now.

Mr. SEWARD. There is no objection to that.

Mr. BROWN. Then I move that it be postponed until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

KANSAS ELECTIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next business in order is the resolution offered by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS], on the 4th of February, calling for information in relation to the elections in the Territory of Kansas.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I suppose the day has gone by when the information would be of any service, if obtained; and I move that the resolution lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. STUART. I reported a bill yesterday, which passed the Senate at the last session; and although it is a bill of only eight or nine lines, it is very important: simply authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue patents to the States in cases where grants of land have been made to them for purposes of railroad construction, or other similar constructions, in order that they may have evidence to put on record of their title. I suppose there will be no objection to it, and I move that it be taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands from the Clerk that it has not come from the Printer. It is not here.

Mr. STUART. Then I will ask the Senate to take up a bill for the relief of Mark Layman, reported from the Committee on Public Lands some days since.

Mr. BIGGS. I would respectfully suggest to the Senator from Michigan, that instead of calling up the case of which he speaks, about which there is some doubt as to whether it is on the Calendar, we proceed to take up the Calendar regularly until the hour of one o'clock arrives. I think that would be better.

Mr. STUART. Very well, sir.

Mr. BIGGS. I move to take up the bills on the Calendar in their regular order.

The motion was agreed to.

JUDGE OF CRIMINAL COURT.

The first bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 54) to equalize the salaries of certain judges of the courts for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Mr. IVERSON. I understand that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. PEARCE] has an amendment to offer to that bill, and he is not in his seat. I move, therefore, to postpone it until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

INDIANA MEETING OF FRIENDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 46) to grant the right of preemption in certain lands to the Indiana yearly meeting of the Society of Friends.

Mr. BIGGS. I ask for the reading of the report in that case.

The Clerk read the following report, made by Mr. PUGH, on the 21st of January:

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred Senate bill No. 46, "to grant the right of preemption in certain lands to the Indiana yearly meeting of the Society of Friends," has had the same under consideration, and recommends its passage.

The committee adopts the report on this subject made at the last Congress, namely:

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the memorial of Charles F. Coffin, clerk, "signed by direction, and on behalf, of the meeting for sufferings of Indiana yearly meeting of Friends," has had the same under consideration, and asks leave now to report:

It appears that almost, or quite, forty years ago, the Indiana yearly meeting of Friends, in conjunction with the Baltimore and Ohio yearly meetings of the same religious society, appointed a permanent committee to found a mission with the Shawnee tribe of Indians, and instruct them, as far as possible, in the arts of civilized life, in letters, and in the doctrines of the Christian religion.

Acting under the direction of these yearly meetings, and furnished with funds by them, from time to time, the committee established a school, and made other suitable arrangements for the mission at Wapakousta, in the State of Ohio, where the Indians then resided. The school was maintained faithfully until the Shawnees disposed of their land in Ohio to the United States, and migrated to their present location beyond the Mississippi river when, at the earnest solicitation of the chiefs and councilors of the tribe, the committee removed the school and mission to what is now Kansas Territory, and there erected buildings, and made other valuable improvements, upon a tract of land designated for that purpose.

It appears, furthermore, that in the new establishment, as in the former one, these yearly meetings, by their committee, labored zealously and in good faith, to promote the temporal and spiritual welfare of the Indians with whom they have been so long connected.

Previous to the treaty dated May 10, 1854, those in charge of the school and mission were allowed, by the authorities of the tribe, to inclose and use as much land as they required, and obtain timber from any part of the Shawnee domain. By that treaty, however, the committee of Friends was restricted to a tract of three hundred and twenty acres, constituting the mission farm, which tract is almost or entirely destitute of timber. And it seems to be now impossible to maintain the establishment, even with a large annual expenditure of money from the yearly meetings above mentioned, unless a supply of timber can be secured.

The yearly meeting of Indiana, therefore, asks permission to locate and purchase, as a preemption right, at the price of one dollar and twenty-five cents an acre, two tracts in the neighborhood of the mission farm, namely, one hundred and twenty acres west of the farm, and two hundred acres on the south side of the Kansas river.

This application has been approved (the committee understands) by the Shawnee tribe in council, as well as by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Commissioner of the General Land Office. The only obstacle is in the fact that our general statutes do not authorize any such pre-emption. The Commissioner of the Land Office speaks of it, however, in this language:

"The application is one which would recommend itself favorably, I should think, to the consideration of Congress; and it would be gratifying to me to learn that it had met with favor from that body, who alone can grant relief in the premises."

It should be recollected, also, that this mission is the first ever established with the Shawnees; that they were then in a wild, and, in fact, desolate condition; that they are now comfortably established in a fertile country, and have cultivated farms, with horses and cattle, and are far advanced in civilization.

The treaty of May 10, 1854, reserved two or three entire sections of land for the benefit of the Methodist mission—an establishment of much later date—for which payment is to be made by the education of a specified number of the Shawnee children. In these circumstances the proposition of the society of Friends to purchase the mission farm assigned to it, and two neighboring tracts of woodland, three hundred and twenty acres, at the usual price in cases of preemption, seems to your committee entirely reasonable.

A bill is reported, therefore, in accordance with the prayer of the memorial, with a section (third) intended to prevent the lands, or any part of them, from ever being used for the purposes of speculation.

Mr. BIGGS. I see that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PUGH] who made that report, is not in his seat. When the bill was up before, I think there was some objection made to it. I move to postpone its further consideration until to-morrow.

Mr. STUART. I really hope that will not be done. I can correct the recollection of my friend, I think. At the time the bill was up before, the Senator from Ohio was very anxious to pass it; but it will be recollected that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. CLAY] desired that it should be delayed until he could look into it. That I presume he has done. The Senator from North Carolina will see that this case is certainly one of the strongest that could be presented. The bill is simply to enable this society to pay $1 25 an acre for this land for the purposes of timber connected with their school. It had a careful investigation by the committee, and an equally careful one by the Department. It is regarded as eminently just and proper. It received the favorable consideration of the committee at the last session, and passed the Senate; and it is important, as these lands are being settled up, that the question should be determined. The Indians are for it; and the executive Department of the Government having charge of such cases is for it; and I think the report shows a very good case indeed. I hope, therefore, it will not be postponed. I assure the Senator from North Carolina that the Senator from Ohio is very anxious for its passage.

Mr. BIGGS. I took it for granted that the Senator from Ohio was in favor of the bill, as he made the report. I alluded to the fact of his absence, not recollecting what Senator made the opposition when the bill was pending before. I recollect very well indeed that there was some opposition to it, and the Senator from Michigan reminds me that it came from the Senator from Alabama. The Senator from Alabama also is not in his seat; and as he wished to investigate the matter—I presume he has investigated it—and is not present now, it seems to me to be improper to take up the bill for consideration at this time. I will very frankly say to the Senator from Michigan that the principle involved in the bill does not meet my approbation. It is the extension of the preemption laws to religious societies; this being a religious organization. I think the preemption laws go far enough already. I shall not discuss the question; but as the Senator from Alabama, who heretofore made the objection, is absent, I hope the bill will be postponed.

Mr. STUART. I am very anxious indeed for the passage of this bill. I think it is important, highly so, to the Indians who are connected with and benefited by this school. If the Senator from Alabama, when he comes in to-day, shall say that he has not examined this question, and wants time and opportunity to do so, I shall have no objection to a motion to reconsider being entered, so that he may have that opportunity; for I feel assured that the more this bill is examined the more it will impress itself on the mind of every Senator here as being, as I said before, eminently just and proper.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina insist on his motion to postpone?

Mr. BIGGS. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I wish to state that, as a member of the Committee on Public Lands, I was not present when this report was adopted. The bill extends the preemption privilege to a religious society. We have had during the last two or three Congresses, not less than one thousand petitions in behalf of various societies throughout the United States, asking for public lands. This bill, it is true, requires the payment into the Treasury of $1 25 an acre for the land. So far it is no injustice to the public; but whenever you commence extending facilities or benefits of this character, connected with the public lands, to societies of any description whatsoever, you will have taken a step that leads to—where, no one can tell.

I am satisfied, with reference to the public lands and their disposition in the future, that this will be as unwise a step as we can possibly take. I say to those gentlemen who represent the old States, and have ever been so jealous in regard to the disposition to be made of the public lands, that by passing this bill, they now take the first step towards a system of donation of the public lands for every kind of wild scheme that can be presented to Congress. Pass this bill, and your files here will show, within twelve months from this time, certainly within the period of the next Congress, a very large increase of petitions, that will be presented here in favor of various schemes, for the disposition of the public lands. If you grant this special favor to this society, it will be taken as a precedent, and the dollar and a quarter an acre will become a matter of small consequence, the precedent having been extended of giving privileges of this kind connected with the public lands. You will find it not very long before the dollar and a quarter will be dispensed with, and they will become nothing but naked donations for the objects which the parties preferring petitions may have in view.

I hope this bill will not be passed by Congress; I hope it will never become a law. It is for charitable, educational, and various other purposes that these petitions have hitherto been presented. Hitherto the most extensive provisions have been made by the laws of Congress in the new States for educational purposes, by grants of public lands to the States for that object. Then in regard to the Indians, if it is upon that ground that the Senator wants this grant, we can well say that the Government of the United States has incurred expense without stint in every direction for the Indians; and many persons, myself among the number, think your Indian expenditures have been, in some respects, of the most extravagant character. I do not think the public lands now ought to be opened to objects of that kind. It seems to me that sound policy would forbid our embarking in any system of this nature. This is but the inception of it; and I hope it will not succeed. I know of no instance in which a bill of this nature has ever been passed and become a law hitherto. I hope very much it will not be permitted to pass now; I dread the consequences of its passage.

Mr. STUART. I confess that I had no idea of eliciting so much discussion on this subject; but I can assure my honorable friend from Arkansas that this bill does not involve the principle which he has stated, and which he says might readily be conceived to be an opening of an important question. The bill before us is simply this, and no more: this land is not in market; it has not been offered for sale; it lies adjacent to the lands these people occupy for the purposes of their school. The Shawnee Indians ask that they may, through this society, be permitted to secure a wood tract for the use of the school by having a preemptive right to pay a dollar and a quarter an acre for it. The bill limits it so that the land cannot be disposed of for any other purpose. It is singly and solely to afford an opportunity to the managers of this Indian school at their own request to buy this quantity of wood-land at $1 25 an acre, and keep it for that purpose. I do think it is the plainest proposition of propriety, so far as the education of the Indians is concerned, that could be presented to the Senate; and it does not at all involve the question of embarking in the project of granting the public lands to religious societies, or any other societies. It is simply to aid this Indian school in having some woodland by which to sustain the school, at $1 25 an acre.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I ask why it is that the parties who petition for these rights, as the land is yet public, cannot with propriety meet that species of rivalry which everybody else has to meet in acquiring lands? It is just as open to them as to anybody else to enter the land when the time shall come that it will be open for settlement. It may be that you interfere with the rights of some others by giving exclusive privileges to them. I ask the Senator from Michigan why it is they are not equally safe with any other society, or any other individual, without the passage of a special act of this kind?

Mr. STUART. I will answer the Senator with a great deal of pleasure. It simply prevents speculators from coming into competition with this Quaker Indian school, and compelling them, perhaps, to pay twenty, thirty, or forty dollars an acre for this land when it shall be offered at public sale. The committee have ascertained, and so has the Indian bureau, that there are no settlers on the land. There is no rivalry of interest at all. The bill simply authorizes this school, as I said before, to secure a wood tract by paying $1 25 an acre for it, and prevents them from ever alienating it. I certainly can see no objection to that.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I am certainly opposed to this bill. The speculators are constantly brought before this body in regard to the public lands as a scare-crow, when it is sought to secure some special and particular privilege, and establish some monopoly. I have not seen so much harm come out of these speculators to the public Treasury, for it is invariably the case that if they purchase public lands, the Treasury gets the money. If they pay an increased price for the land, it must have been worth the price to those who gave it. But it is said this is for the benefit of the Indians. Well, sir, I do not know a wealthier people on this continent, and I do not believe there is in the world, than some of the Indians we have. Absolutely at this time there are tribes worth more, per capita, than any people who live on God's globe. There is no question of this fact. I know that some of the Indian tribes are the richest people that live upon the face of the earth. They are worth money; they have plenty in their treasury; they are able to make public expenditures; they pay no taxes; and yet we are constantly legislating in this direction.

Now, the Senator speaks of speculators. So soon as speculators are brought up to a charge on this body, we gather in a flock and fly; we will do anything to avoid them. Speculators are terrible men! Well, sir, the petitioners in this case have the very same opportunities to enter these lands that other individuals have. Having these opportunities, I do not see that it is necessary that we should give them peculiar privileges and enable them to come in and get lands at a less price than persons who may be living upon them, and get them without regard to the rights of others. There are very honest people who may be, and I have no doubt will be, ruled out by granting a privilege of this kind. I do not think it is right. I know it is the commencement of a system that will end, not with the application of this one religious society, but will go on to all the rest. I do not believe, as one person living in a new State, that we ought to commence this system.

Mr. HUNTER. I think there is a great deal in what has been said by the Senator from Arkansas. I know we have made ample provision for the education of the Indians. As he says, some of these tribes are among the richest people on earth. Our annual Indian bill has always a large amount in it for the education of Indians. I do not see now why we should extend the preemption system to societies. It was designed to encourage settlement. But surely, as the Senator from Arkansas says, it would be a dangerous precedent to begin to allow societies to select the best lands, to enter them at preemption prices, to give them exclusive privileges. I quite agree with him that the bill ought not to pass.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Anything concerning the Indians who have been placed under our care and protection has always been a subject of interest to me. It seems to me that the object of this bill is a very meritorious one. I did not understand my friend from Arkansas to say anything to the contrary as to this particular instance; but he is apprehensive of the consequences of its admitting a species of claims hitherto disregarded, but which may be set up by societies generally for religious or charitable purposes. Now, sir, all future Congresses must distinguish between the good and the bad; and we may trust them to make the discrimination; and if we are satisfied that this bill is for a present and meritorious charity, can we refuse it because of our apprehensions of the evils that may grow out of the precedent? May we not trust our own discretion or the discretion of those who are to succeed us to do good without allowing it to become afterwards a precedent for evil?

The bill is not to give the Indians three hundred and twenty acres of land. If it was, would it be any great matter? We purchased all these lands from them for a mere trifle in most instances. What is the object for which this little concession is asked? The Quakers, or the Society of Friends, as they call themselves, have undertaken, with that benevolence which characterizes the whole of that body of respectable and benevolent men, to engage in the civilization and instruction of the Indians. This land they ask not for any private or personal emolument, but as necessary to maintain that school and those teachings by which they are endeavoring to lead that race from a savage to a civilized condition. That is the reason why they ask it. They propose to pay for it; and it is rendered by the bill inalienable by them without the consent of Congress; showing that they sincerely and earnestly and faithfully intend to apply this land to the very purpose which is expressed—to assist in teaching the Indian the ways of a civilized man; to teach him how to work and to teach him how to read. These are the first great elements in the progress of mankind. These they are endeavoring to teach him.

The question is, whether you will enable the teachers by this little grant to prosecute successfully, or with convenience, their labors—will you give three hundred and twenty acres of land for the purpose of enabling such teachers as these are to make the Indians better and wiser and less dangerous to you, less dangerous on your frontier? It is the best mode of obtaining settled peace. It is performing, on our part, an act of duty, an act of that high guardianship which rests upon us toward this race, going so fast to ruin and destruction. I will give this land cheerfully for such a purpose, secured as it is, to it, and I will not fear the consequences. If hereafter it be permitted to be run out into evil consequences, let the responsibility be upon those who permit them. The best way in this life always, it seems to me, in small and great matters, is to look at the duty which is immediately before us, look at the duty which is at hand close by, and if you go on so through life, there is not likely much injury to follow. Those who, for mere purposes of justice and benevolence, now grant this little tract of land, are not the men most likely hereafter to squander the public Treasury with speculative or visionary projects, or for the purpose of establishing religion in one place or another. Do the duty which is just at hand and just before us. Perform that and so go on. This seems to me to be one of the duties which lies before us, and is just at hand. I will vote for this bill.

Mr. CLAY. This bill was postponed the other day I believe on my motion. I then stated that it was my purpose to look into it. I had not had an opportunity of doing so, and indeed did not know that such a bill was pending at all. I did not suppose it would be called up on any other than private bill day, and hence I have not examined it. I hope it will go over until I can look into it. I have no desire to oppose it if I see that it is right. I would ask what committee has reported the bill?

Mr. STUART. I will say to the Senator that it was reported from the Committee on Public Lands, at the last Congress, by the Senator from Ohio, who is a member of that committee. The report, which is of considerable length, has been read this morning, and it shows that the proposition meets the favor of the Interior Department, and has been very carefully considered by the committee. Before the Senator came in I had explained it very fully. I do not think that the Senator, on looking into it, will find any real objection to the bill.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I think the bill had better lie over. I am entirely unacquainted with its details. I have just learned from the Senator on my right [Mr. CLAY] the general object of it; and I think it at least pertains equally as much to the Indian Committee as to the Committee on Public Lands, and probably more so. It interferes with the general policy which the Government is pursuing toward the Indians, a matter peculiarly appropriate to be examined into by the Committee on Indian Affairs. I shall not move the reference of the bill to that committee; but I ask that it may lie over, in order that the members of that committee may at least look to the provisions of the bill, and to the policy indicated in it. I hope, therefore, the motion to postpone will prevail.

Mr. STUART. I have no desire to press this subject on the consideration of the Senate without proper examination; but I trust that the Senator from Arkansas, who has last spoken, and the Senator from Alabama will take an early occasion to look into this report; and, as I said before, I think if they do so, it will meet the approbation of their judgment. I shall be very glad to have it passed at an early day, because the matter is of importance to the parties; but I will not press it further at this time.

The bill was postponed until to-morrow.

KANSAS—LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

The hour fixed for the consideration of the special orders having arrived, the President pro tempore announced the first question to be on the unfinished business of yesterday, the bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union, which had been returned from the House of Representatives, with an amendment.

The amendment of the House struck out all after the enacting clause, and inserted a substitute, which the Clerk proceeded to read.

Mr. SEWARD. I do not know that it is necessary that the amendment should be read. I think the reading may be dispensed with. It has been printed.

Mr. GREEN. I should like to hear it read to know whether it is printed correctly or not. ["Proceed with the reading."]

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

That the State of Kansas be, and is hereby, admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever; but, inasmuch as it is greatly disputed whether the constitution framed at Lecompton on the 7th day of November last, and now pending before Congress, was fairly made, or expressed the will of the people of Kansas, this admission of her into the Union as a State is hereby declared to be upon this fundamental condition precedent, namely: that the said constitutional instrument shall be first submitted to a vote of the people of Kansas, and assented to by them, or a majority of the voters, at an election to be held for the purpose; and as soon as such assent shall be given, and duly made known, by a majority of the commissioners herein appointed, to the President of the United States, he shall announce the same by proclamation; and thereafter, and without any further proceedings on the part of Congress, the admission of said State of Kansas into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever, shall be complete and absolute. At the said election the voting shall be by ballot, and by indorsing on his ballot, as each voter may please, "for the constitution," or "against the constitution." Should the said constitution be rejected at the said election by a majority of votes being cast against it, then, and in that event, the inhabitants of said Territory are hereby authorized and empowered to form for themselves a constitution and State government by the name of the State of Kansas, according to the Federal Constitution, and to that end may elect delegates to a convention as hereinafter provided.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said State of Kansas shall have concurrent jurisdiction on the Missouri and all other rivers and waters bordering on the said State of Kansas, so far as the same shall form a common boundary to said State and any other State or States now or hereafter to be formed or bounded by the same; and said rivers and waters, and all the navigable waters of said State, shall be common highways and forever free, as well to the inhabitants of said State as to all other citizens of the United States, without any tax, duty, impost, or toll therefor.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That, for the purpose of insuring, as far as possible, that the elections authorized by this act may be fair and free, the Governor and Secretary of the Territory of Kansas, and the presiding officers of the two branches of its Legislature, namely, the President of the Council and Speaker of the House of Representatives, are hereby constituted a board of commissioners to carry into effect the provisions of this act, and to use all the means necessary and proper to that end. And three of them shall constitute a board; and the board shall have power and authority, in respect to each and all of the elections hereby authorized or provided for, to designate and establish precincts for voting, or to adopt those already established; to cause polls to be opened at such places as it may deem proper in the respective counties and election precincts of said Territory; to appoint, as judges of election, at each of the several places of voting, three discreet and respectable persons, any two of whom shall be competent to act; to require the sheriffs of the several counties, by themselves or deputies, to attend the judges at each of the places of voting, for the purpose of preserving peace and good order; or the said board may, instead of said sheriffs and their deputies, appoint, at their discretion, and in such instances as they may choose, other fit persons for the same purpose; and when the purpose of the election is to elect delegates to a convention to form a constitution, as hereinbefore provided for, the number of delegates shall be sixty, and they shall be apportioned by said board among the several counties of said Territory, according to the number of voters; and in making this apportionment, the board may join two or more counties together to make an election or representative district, where neither of the said counties has the requisite number of voters to entitle it to a delegate, or to join a smaller to a larger county, having a surplus population, where it may serve to equalize the representation. The elections hereby authorized shall continue one day only, and shall not be continued later than sundown on that day. The said board shall appoint the day of election for each of the elections hereby authorized, as the same may become necessary. The said Governor shall announce, by proclamation, the day appointed for any one of said elections, and the day shall be as early a one as is consistent with due notice thereof to the people of said Territory, subject to the provisions of this act. The said board shall have full power to prescribe the time, manner, and places of each of said elections, and to direct the time and manner of the returns thereof, which returns shall be made to the said board, whose duty it shall be to announce the result by proclamation, and to appoint therein as early a day as practicable for the delegates elected (where the election has been for delegates) to assemble in convention at the seat of government of said Territory. When so assembled, the convention shall first determine, by a vote, whether it is the wish of the proposed State to be admitted into the Union at that time; and, if so, shall proceed to form a constitution and take all necessary steps for the establishment of a State government, in conformity with the Federal Constitution, subject to the approval and ratification of the people of the proposed State. And the said convention shall accordingly provide for its submission to the vote of the people for approval or rejection; and if the majority of votes shall be given for the constitution so framed as aforesaid, the Governor of the Territory shall, within twenty days after the result is known, notify the President of the United States of the same. And thereupon the President shall announce the same by proclamation, and thereafter, and without any further proceedings whatever on the part of Congress, the admission of the said State of Kansas into the Union, upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, shall be complete and absolute.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That in the elections hereby authorized, all white male inhabitants of said Territory, over the age of twenty-one years, who are legal voters under the laws of the Territory of Kansas, and none others, shall be allowed to vote; and this shall be the only qualification required to entitle the voter to the right of suffrage in said elections. And if any person not so qualified shall vote, or offer to vote, or if any person shall vote more than once at either of said elections, or shall make, or cause to be made, any false, fictitious, or fraudulent returns, or shall alter or change any returns of either of said elections, such person shall, upon conviction thereof before any court of competent jurisdiction, be kept at hard labor not less than six months and not more than three years.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the members of the aforesaid board of commissioners, and all persons appointed by them to carry into effect the provisions of this act, shall, before entering upon their duties, take an oath to perform faithfully the duties of their respective offices, and on failure thereof, they shall be liable and subject to the same charges and penalties as are provided in like cases under the territorial laws.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the officers mentioned in the preceding section shall receive for their services the same compensation as is given for like services under the territorial laws.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the said State of Kansas, when her admission as a State becomes complete and absolute, shall be entitled to one member in the House of Representatives, in the Congress of the United States, till the next census be taken by the Federal Government.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the following propositions be, and the same are hereby, offered to the said people of Kansas for their free acceptance or rejection, which, if accepted, shall be obligatory upon the United States and upon the said State of Kansas, to wit: First, That sections numbered sixteen and thirty-six in every township of public lands in said State, and where either of said sections, or any part thereof, has been sold or otherwise been disposed of, or lands, equivalent thereto, and as contiguous as may be, shall be granted to said State for the use of schools. Second, That seventy-two sections of land shall be set apart and reserved for the use and support of a State university, to be selected by the Governor of said State, subject to the approval of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and to be appropriated and applied in such manner as the Legislature of said State may prescribe for the purpose aforesaid, but for no other purpose. Third, That ten entire sections of land, to be selected by the Governor of said State, in legal subdivisions, shall be granted to said State for the purpose of completing the public buildings, or for the erection of others at the seat of government, under the direction of the Legislature thereof. Fourth, That all salt springs within said State, not exceeding twelve in number, with six sections of land adjoining, or as contiguous as may be to each, shall be granted to said State for its use; the same to be selected by the Governor thereof within one year after the admission of said State, and when so selected, to be used or disposed of on such terms, conditions, and regulations, as the Legislature shall direct: Provided, That no salt spring or land, the right whereof is now vested in any individual or individuals, or which may be hereafter confirmed or adjudged to any individual or individuals, shall by this article be granted to said State. Fifth, That five per centum of the net proceeds of sales of all public lands lying within said State, which shall be sold by Congress after the admission of said State into the Union, after deducting all the expenses incident to the same, shall be paid to said State for the purpose of making public roads and internal improvements, as the Legislature shall direct: Provided, The foregoing propositions hereinbefore offered, are on the condition that the people of Kansas shall provide, by an ordinance, irrevocable without the consent of the United States, that said State shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the soil within the same, by the United States, or with any regulations Congress may find necessary for securing the title in said soil to bona fide purchasers thereof; and that no tax shall be imposed on lands belonging to the United States, and that in no case shall non-resident proprietors be taxed higher than residents. Sixth, And that the said State shall never tax the lands or the property of the United States in that State: Provided, however, That nothing in this act of admission shall be so construed as to ratify or accept the ordinance attached to the said constitution framed at Leecompton, but said ordinance is hereby rejected by the United States.

Mr. GREEN. I have submitted a motion to disagree to this House amendment, and that brings up the question in a direct form. It leaves this amendment open to further amendment, if its friends think proper to propose any; but the affirmative vote to disagree, even after they shall have perfected it as far as they please, if it prevail, will leave the Senate reaffirming the original bill as it passed. I submit that motion, because I believe that the peace of the country, the good of Kansas, the harmony of the Union, demand of us to adhere to the original bill. I shall not consume the time of the Senate by discussion. This subject has been, perhaps, more fully discussed than any other that has ever been before Congress. It has been discussed in every aspect in which it can possibly be presented. I should trespass on the patience of the Senate, and travel over ground which has already been occupied much better than I could myself, if I were to undertake to do so. I shall, therefore, trust this question to the judgment of the Senate without any further explanation.

Mr. BIGLER. Mr. President, I am not prepared to vote on this question without first submitting a few remarks explanatory of the views which I entertain. I do not intend to delay the Senate by an attempt at an argument, at length, against this House amendment; I shall be content to state, very briefly, some of the points which I think involve conclusive objections to the measure.

In the first place, I think this amendment involves an utter and violent abandonment of the doctrine of non-intervention. It presents a broad question, whether a doctrine which the party to which I belong have cherished, a doctrine which is found in the organic law of Kansas, and which was enunciated in the Democratic platform at Cincinnati, is to be abandoned, and we are to look for some other system of legislation with regard to the Territories.

I had hoped, sir, that when the wise men of the country, with Clay, and Webster, and Cass in the lead, presented and adopted this new mode of settling the slavery question—the enlarged and liberal doctrine that when the people of the Territories were prepared for admission as States, they should come in with or without slavery, as the constitution presented by them might provide at the time—it would have proven a finality on this question. In the liberal doctrines maintained by the Democratic party, that the people of the several States may go into the Territories with whatsoever property they possess, including slaves, and when there, and when about to organize a government, preparatory to admission as a State, on terms of perfect equality with the other States, shall be left perfectly free, not only as to the kind of government they will have, but as to the mode and manner of making it, I had hoped we were to find a simple and satisfactory solution of this unhappy difficulty which seems to arise on the application of each State for admission.

When this doctrine was proclaimed here it was at variance with and superseded the former practice of the Government; but it was one which commended itself to the judgment and patriotism of the people. It was a proposition to settle the controversy about slavery upon high principle—sacred principle; a principle that was coextensive in its operation with the entire country, with all we possessed then, or ever can possess, and as imperishable as the Government itself, equal to every emergency that may arise. An essential element in that doctrine, is that Congress will not interfere with the domestic affairs of the Territories; that as to the mode and manner of making a government, the people of the Territories should be unrestrained; that Congress would decide only upon the question of admission under the obligations of the Constitution, and that would be on the single point whether the government presented was republican in its form, and not as to the mode of making the constitution—leaving that work with the people.

I had hoped that we were about to witness a beautiful illustration of the wisdom of this doctrine, by the admission of two States, the one slave, and the other free, under this, its principles. Thus its beauties would be illustrated and illuminated; and I tell you, Mr. President, that, in my humble judgment, no act of Congress would go further toward restoring those relations of fraternal feelings which in the younger and purer days of the Republic existed between its extremities, than the consummation of such a work. Nothing, in my humble judgment, would tend more to give peace to this great country, to promote its future progress and prosperity, to give prosperity and peace to the people of the various Territories. Sir, that is the doctrine of the Democratic party, held by them because it is consistent with the Constitution—consistent with the true interests of this great country, and with the rights of all classes of the people, and all sections of the Union.

Now, sir, I regard the House proposition as direct and violent intervention, because it proposes to discard what the people have done and to institute a new mode of proceeding. It proposes to set aside what the people of Kansas have done in the way of changing their government from a territorial to a State form, and to prescribe to them how they shall proceed hereafter in making a government. I wish to mark the distinction between a case where the people of a Territory have not acted at all, and especially where a Territory may not possess the usual population for a State, where that question has rested in abeyance, and where Congress volunteers to offer to those people an invitation to come into the Union. That we did in 1856 to the people of Kansas under the Toombs bill. They could hardly presume, with the population which they then possessed, that they would be admitted as a State. Congress extended an invitation to them, they having taken no proper legal action on the subject. It is different now. They have acted; they have presented themselves here with a republican form of government, which has come up to us through legal channels and regular steps. They have exercised the power which you gave them in the organic law, when you said their legislative power should extend over all the rightful subjects of legislation, and that the people should be left perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way.

But, Mr. President, if it were allowable on principle for Congress to remand to the people this government which they have sent here, and insist upon a revision of what they have done, I could not agree to the mode and manner prescribed in the House bill. The objections I make ought to be more specially unpleasant to those who have opposed the admission of Kansas under the Leecompton constitution than to those who have favored it; and why so? Because the people of Kansas are required to vote on this constitution for the reason, as it is alleged, that it may not be acceptable to the majority. In the early part of this discussion, much was made out of the form of voting presented by the Leecompton convention. It was said to be unfair. It was said that the elector, in order to vote for or against slavery, was bound to vote for or against the constitution; that those, therefore, who were not for that constitution, had no opportunity of voting on the slavery question. I do not care now to inquire whether that view was a correct and allowable one or not; but I do say that the presentation of the question, as proposed in this amendment, would be liable to quite as conclusive objections as the mode of voting prescribed by the Leecompton convention. What is the form? It reads thus:

"At the said election the vote shall be by ballot, and by indorsing on his ballot, as each voter may please, 'for the constitution,' or 'against the constitution.'"

That form you perceive, sir, would not present to the people of Kansas the great question at issue there, the question which has agitated the country from one extremity to the other, to wit: whether Kansas shall be a free or a slave State. Slavery is in the constitution as it stands, and the question thus presented would be, whether they would have a slave State or no State at all. Those who desire it to be a free State would have no fair opportunity of carrying out their will. They are to be disfranchised on this vote. They can have no voice. Now, sir, if this measure is to be adopted, the form of voting ought to be such as would give those people the opportunity of deciding, unembarrassed, the question of slavery which has harassed them from the first hour of their organization. Look at the practical workings of the proposition. An elector presents himself at the polls who is in favor of slavery. He sees that his ballot must be for or against the constitution. He desires to vote for slavery, but he dislikes many features of the constitution; and he is driven from the polls. If a free-State man, on the other hand, makes his appearance, he encounters similar difficulties. He likes the constitution and all its features, except that of slavery. He desires to adopt the constitution, but he cannot do that without agreeing that Kansas shall be a slave State; and he is disfranchised. Now, sir, if this proposition is to prevail, why put it in this shape? Is it that there will be no alternative left to the free-State party but to vote the constitution down and to secure an indorsement of the opinions of those who have held that a majority were against this constitution? Is it to secure a rejection of the President's policy. If I were for this measure, I should not agree to present it in this shape. I certainly could not, if I had stood so peculiarly and tenaciously up to the rights of the free-State party in Kansas.

But, sir, there are other features to which I wish to call attention. The first clause reads as follows:

"That the State of Kansas be, and is hereby, admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever; but inasmuch as it is greatly disputed whether the constitution framed at Leecompton on the 7th day of November last, and now pending before Congress, was fairly made," &c.

It is a question whether the constitution was fairly made. What is the deduction? It must be that in some way or other the obligation rests upon Congress to know that the constitution is fairly made; that fraud and violence shall not prevail. Now, sir, I do not care to raise or debate that question of fact at present. Whatever might have been held heretofore under the former policy of the Government, I cannot see how those who subscribe to the doctrine that the people should be left perfectly free to form and regulate their institutions in their own way, can investigate this question of fairness and form. Is it maintained that we sanction the constitution by voting for the admission? That is not my understanding. The government which the people send here we must take or reject. I do not speak now of mere matters of form, but the vital features of the government. These we cannot touch. Is it otherwise held anywhere? I have not heard a Senator allege that by voting for the admission of Kansas he necessarily sanctioned the constitution, or vice versa.

Now, sir, the point which I wish to make is this: if Congress has no right to touch the work of the people of Kansas—the government which they have sent here—what does it concern us that we inquire how that work was done? Here is a proposition simply to inquire how it was done; conceding that we had no power over the production itself. Not only that; but while this constitution is to be sent back on the assumption that it was not fairly made, what is proposed in addition? Why, sir, in case this constitution be voted down, the people of Kansas are authorized to elect delegates to constitute a new convention; they are to vote on that constitution, and then, if it be adopted, they become a State by the proclamation of the President.

Where is the guarantee that that new government will be made fairly? Where is the protection against fraud in that process? Who supervises that action? If it is the duty of Congress, in the case of the Lecompton constitution, to see that it is fairly made, it is the duty of Congress in every other case. If it is the duty of Congress to inquire whether this constitution has been fairly made, it is an equal obligation not to give the opportunity of making any constitution unfairly. Here is a proposition to allow the people to make a government, put it in operation, and admit it into the Union, without its ever making its appearance before Congress at all. I do not understand how alleged frauds in this place can be claimed as reasons for returning this constitution, if we at the same time authorize the making of a State without any guarantee whatever as to how that power may be abused, without any protection against fraud, violence, and usurpation.

Then, sir, there is another point, and that is the extraordinary proposition which makes the President of the United States perform functions which the Constitution, in express words, vests in Congress. I do not speak now as to the government of Kansas that is before us; that we have seen; that constitution we have read; that Congress knows to be republican; that we may, on certain conditions, allow the President to announce admitted, and hold that the State is in the Union; but it is to the other alternative—the right to make a constitution and State government, and put it in operation, and put it into the Union by a proclamation of the President, without ever having it before Congress at all—that I object. Who knows that it will be a republican government? Who can guaranty that it will be admissible in form? And if republican, may it not contain other features, making it entirely unacceptable? Sir, I have not that measure of confidence in the men who would be likely to get hold of this government in Kansas just now. Who is satisfied that General Lane would exercise power with moderation? Who believes that if he controlled a convention, he would not indulge the excesses of his feelings of prejudice against the southern States?

Sir, I should not be surprised if a constitution made in that way would emancipate the slaves that are in the Territory and confiscate the property value in them. I should not be surprised if a constitution made in that way, without consulting Congress, should attempt to interdict or embarrass the execution of the fugitive slave law, or would set up other issues with the Federal authority; and yet, whilst Congress might not seriously entertain the idea of admitting such a State, the President would be obliged to admit it by proclamation. You will discover that it gives the President no discretion. The duty is imperative on him. When the facts are properly certified, he must announce that the State is in the Union, no matter how objectionable the constitution may be. Here is State making with a vengeance. Any measure of fraud may be practiced; any extent of violence and usurpation in making the constitution; and no matter how badly made, and yet the State must come in. The proposition is monstrous.

Now, sir, the subject-matter of the bill is suggestive; it presents a wide field for discussion. I do not intend to pursue it this morning; but I could not persuade myself to vote quietly on this question. I know that there are certain very insidious features about this measure—features which can be used with great effect before the populace. It may be alleged that we have voted against a bill which was to give the people the right to vote on their constitution. That would be true; but I answer, that I hold a still more liberal doctrine toward the people of Kansas; I hold that they can make a constitution in any way they please; making it according to law and in regular form. I would give to the people of Kansas that measure of right which those whom I represent here exercised; they made a constitution twice through their delegates; they have revised and amended that constitution through the agency of a popular ratification. It was competent for the people of Kansas to do the same thing; and if those in Kansas, who claim to be adverse to this slavery article, who object most to this constitution, had exercised their high prerogative as freemen, probably we should have had no excitement on this occasion. But, sir, they did not perform the duty. In June, when they might have decided the question of slavery by electing delegates, they would not vote; the "bogus laws" were in their way. In October, when the question of slavery was not involved, but when offices were at stake, they did vote. In December following, when they had a direct vote on the question of making Kansas a free or a slave State, they could not vote—it would not do to recognize the "bogus laws," and the "bogus convention." But, a few days afterwards, when it was a question of gaining the local offices, they rushed to the polls and elected the officers under what they termed the "Lecompton swindle." There is the source of the trouble; and as this issue stands, the most that those on the other side can make out of it would be (taking their own ground) an issue between those who, through the forms of law, had abused, to some extent, the right of suffrage, and those who had set themselves up against the use of that right; who had preferred other means; who had not exercised the high functions of freemen under our laws and under our policy of government. They avowed that determination, and they adhered to it. There may have been fraud, and there may have been usurpation, to some extent, on the one hand. The best that can be said for the other was that it presented matured, persistent, and stupendous insubordination, to the laws, if not rebellion to the government. Which of these alternatives shall we take? I shall not, for my part, cast a vote that will give success to those who have stood out persistently against the laws.

It may be said, and it is said, that this constitution is not agreeable to the majority of the people. Well, sir, I have searched in vain in the complicated history of legislation on this subject for the instance in which that question was distinctly raised and discussed, where it was claimed as a duty on the part of Congress to know that a majority of the people were for the form of government which they sent up to Congress. No such question could have arisen in the case of the State of my venerable friend from Kentucky, for that was declared in the Union a State before the form of government was made, not by the proclamation, I believe, but by act of Congress. That could not have been an ascertained fact in regard to Florida. No member of Congress, as I understand the history of that case, could have known whether the people preferred the constitution of Florida or not. Why not? I shall show. In 1838, the people of Florida held a convention, and made a constitution. They submitted it, it is true, to the ratification of the people; and, as I learn the history of it, a majority was only found by throwing out certain districts on the ground of informality. That constitution was sent up here. It was filed away in the archives of the Senate legislative department. There it lay, cobwebbed and dusted over, for six long years. When it became necessary to bring in Iowa as a State, these musty papers were drawn from their solitude, and on them Florida was made a State. Who would say that the people who held that convention, and voted on the constitution, still remained in Florida? Who would say, that in the six years which intervened, there was not a large accession of population to the Territory of Florida? There could have been no satisfactory evidence that the people of Florida approved that constitution; no man could have known that it embodied their will. I only present these historical facts for the purpose of showing that the doctrine that Congress must know that a constitution embodies the will of a majority of the people before we have the right in propriety to admit the State, is a new doctrine.

But, Mr. President, I have spoken already much longer than I intended to do. I rose for the purpose of confining myself to a very few points. I trust we are near the close of this angry debate. For one, I am free to say to the Senate and to the country that I am tired of this topic of Kansas. I am tired of it in every sense. Especially am I weary of it, because I can see in it an element of growing mischief to this great, peaceful, and happy country of ours. Why it is, I know not; but it is in the dispensation of Providence that we are to have a very plague among us in the shape of this slavery question, living and growing as the nation advances; spreading out yearly, overshadowing the whole country like some fatal upas, whose poisonous branches shade the very extremities and deal poison and death as the seasons roll by. I say, sir, that we are near the close of this debate, and with it, I trust this feud will be put to rest forever—this strife which is so certainly and so constantly poisoning the very channels of intercourse between great divisions of this Union, severing the relations of the people who ought to be fraternal and affectionate, and abiding in a common faith. Sir, while I have my own notions of this measure, I do not cherish them with the tenacity that some do. I desire, however, to make the admission of Kansas and Minnesota an exemplification of the truthfulness, of the equity and wisdom of the Democratic policy that Congress shall no longer deal with this vexed question; but that it shall be left to the people of the Territories to settle for themselves; and they shall quietly become States, with or without slavery, as their government may provide at the time of admission.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I had hoped that we could vote on this question without any further debate; and I shall not protract it to any considerable length. Like the Senator from Pennsylvania, I had hoped that we should have disposed of this question in a manner that would have given a complete triumph to those great Democratic principles to which my life has been devoted. I had hoped that the principle of self-government in the Territories, the great principle of popular sovereignty which we all profess to cherish, on which all our institutions are founded, would have been carried out in good faith in Kansas. I believe, sir, that if the amendment inserted by the House of Representatives be concurred in by the Senate to-day, and become the law of the land, the great principle of popular sovereignty, on which all our institutions rest, will receive a complete triumph, and there will be peace and quiet and fraternal feeling all over this country.

We are told that this vexed question ought to be settled; that the country is exhausted with strife and controversy; and that peace should be restored by the admission of Kansas. Sir, why not admit it? You can admit it in one hour, and restore peace to the country, if you will concur with the House of Representatives in what is called the Crittenden amendment. This amendment provides that Kansas is admitted into the Union on the fundamental condition precedent that the constitution be submitted to the people for ratification, and if assented to by them, it becomes their constitution; if not assented to, they are to proceed to make one to suit themselves, and the President is to declare the result, and Kansas is to be in the Union without further legislation. Concur with the House of Representatives, and your action is final; Kansas is in the Union, with the right to make her constitution to suit herself; and there is an end to the whole controversy.

Why not close the controversy here? Why distract the country further on the subject? Why not let the North and the South, the East and the West, men of all political parties, unite upon this great measure of justice and conciliation and fairness, which has been brought forward by the Senator from Kentucky, and indorsed by the House of Representatives? The Senator from Pennsylvania tells us that it violates the doctrine of non-intervention; the doctrine of popular sovereignty; the Democratic platform; and for that reason he cannot support it. How does it violate that doctrine? Because, as he says, it requires the constitution to be submitted to the vote of the people for ratification or rejection. That is supposed to be intervention! When we passed the Minnesota act last year, we required the constitution which her convention might form to be submitted to the people for ratification or rejection as a condition of presenting it here for admission; and it never occurred to us that by so doing we were intervening, that we were violating the platform, that we were repudiating the doctrine of popular sovereignty.

Besides, the President of the United States told us in his annual message that by the Kansas-Nebraska act the slavery question was required to be submitted to a vote of the people for their decision. The President, then, does not consider a requirement by Congress, that a constitution shall be submitted to the people, to be intervention; for he says that the organic act required the submission of the slavery question; and he thinks that all future enabling acts should require the submission of the whole constitution, in all cases whatsoever. He told us in his message that the provision in the Minnesota bill requiring the whole constitution to be submitted to the people was a wise example, and should become the general rule in all time to come, never to be departed from in any instance. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania consider the President as having abandoned the Democratic party, as having violated popular sovereignty, as having resorted to the doctrine of intervention when he made that recommendation in his message that this wise provision of the Minnesota bill should be the universal and invariable rule of action in all future time, so that no Territory should ever come with an application for admission as a State until her constitution had first been submitted to and ratified by the people?

Mr. BIGLER. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Certainly.

Mr. BIGLER. The Senate will remember that I made a distinction between a case where Congress takes the initiative and invites a State into the Union, and this case, where the people had gone on under their organic act, and made a constitution and State government, and sent it up here. It is intervention, because it proposes to set aside what they have done, or to remand it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The distinction is between your right to deal with a man who enters your house by invitation, and one who intrudes into it without being welcome. It is admitted that if Congress had taken the initiative, and invited Kansas to come into the Union, and authorized her to form a constitution and State government, it would be proper and right to require her constitution to be submitted to the people, in order to ascertain whether it was their act and deed; but, inasmuch as Kansas proceeded without the authority of Congress, having neither our assent nor our permission, Congress now should not examine the question whether the constitution presented is the act and deed of the people! What is the object of requiring a submission of the constitution to the people? Simply to ascertain whether it be their act and deed; and this amendment expressly declares that object: "Inasmuch as it is greatly disputed whether the constitution framed at Lecompton, on the 7th day of November last, and now pending before Congress, was fairly made, or expressed the will of the people," therefore it shall be submitted. Is it not your duty to know whether the people of Kansas have sent this constitution here as their will, before you put it in operation, and make it their fundamental law? The object of submission is to ascertain the fact whether it is the act and deed of the people of Kansas; whether it embodies their will. If it be their act and deed, I hold that you cannot change it or alter it; if it be not their act and deed, you have no right to give it the force of law binding upon that people. The object of this provision, therefore, is, to ascertain the fact whether this Lecompton constitution is the act of the people of Kansas; whether it embodies their will.

The Senator from Pennsylvania does not deem it a matter of any consequence whether a constitution be the act of the people, whether it embodies their will or not, when he votes to admit them into the Union; and he sustains that position by citing the case of Florida, which formed a constitution in 1838, sent it here in 1839, and was received into the Union on the 4th of March, 1845, according to my recollection of the dates. Because six years elapsed between the time of her making that constitution and the time of our accepting it, he draws the inference that it was not the will of the people at the time we acted upon it, and hence that it is proper in other cases to declare an instrument the fundamental law of a people which is known not to be their will, which is known to be repugnant to their wishes, because he infers that that was done in the Florida case.

Sir, if it was done in the Florida case, it should never be done over again. I am not willing to have Florida cited as a precedent to show that a constitution is not expected nor desired to be the embodiment of the popular sentiment, and then Kansas added as another precedent, founded on the Florida case, to establish the doctrine that a constitution is not to be the will of the people. The Florida case, as a precedent for Kansas, proves too much. It shows an attempt to introduce a new doctrine into our political system; that the organic law is not to be the embodiment of the popular will; that the wishes of the people have nothing to do with the provisions of their constitution; that Congress may put any instrument upon them it pleases, and require them to take it and submit to it until they can get rid of it either by revolution or according to the forms of the instrument.

Sir, I repudiate that doctrine. That is not the popular sovereignty to which I am committed. That is not the great principle of self-government which I desire to see carried out. I desire to see the people of a Territory left perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way. When that language is used in the Kansas-Nebraska act, "their own way," it refers to the kind, the character of the institutions that may be established by them, leaving Congress to fix the time when they may proceed to act, the number of population, the boundaries, and the other considerations. But, sir, I hold that unless a constitution be the act of the people to be governed by it, unless it be the embodiment of their will, you have no power, no right, under the Constitution of the United States, to force it on them. Citing the Florida case to sustain this attempt, only shows that there is an effort to ingraft upon the action of this Government as a principle, that hereafter Congress is not to inquire whether a constitution presented for our acceptance is the act and deed of the people or not. Sir, the illustration of the Senator's argument strikes at the basis of all free government; not only strikes the foundations from under the Democratic platform, but from under the American platform, and the Republican platform, and every other platform that was ever formed by any party in this country, with reference to controlling its political destinies. It is a great principle which underlies all our institutions—the principle of self-government—the right of a people to make their own organic law under which they are to live.

That is what is involved in this question. The House amendment sanctions and carries out that principle; it declares that Kansas is hereby admitted on the fundamental condition precedent, that this constitution shall be submitted to the people, and if ratified, the President shall declare Kansas to be in the Union without further action; if it be rejected, they shall proceed to make another constitution, and the President shall declare them in the Union, without further action, with the constitution they may make. This amendment, therefore, accomplishes two great objects. First, it settles the Kansas dispute forever by making the passage of this bill a finality, thus localizing the controversy; second, it secures the great fundamental principle of self-government, which authorizes the people to make their constitution to suit themselves, and change it whenever they please, in accordance with their own organic law. Why, then, should we not all unite on this proposition?

We are told that the country is tired of this controversy; that the country desires peace upon the slavery question; that the country desires Kansas to be taken out of politics, and out of Congress. Vote for this amendment, and Kansas is out of politics and out of Congress. Vote for this amendment, and there is an end of the controversy. Vote for this amendment, and the right of self-government is preserved. Vote for this amendment, and State rights and State sovereignty are maintained. Vote for this amendment, and there is peace in the country, founded on just, constitutional, sound political principles. I will not continue the discussion, because I know the Senate desires a vote.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President, the question before the Senate is not any longer on the passage of the Senate bill—it is on the passage of the House bill. A liberal construction of the resolutions of instruction which I have received from the General Assembly of Ohio, and by which my vote was governed on the former occasion, would as much require me to vote against the House bill as the Senate bill. But the emergency is evidently one which the General Assembly did not contemplate, and in which, therefore, I must consult my own judgment and their views, as far as I can gather them. According to my apprehension of what is due to this case, the House amendment is utterly inadmissible. It is a violation, as I understand it, of every principle on which Congress can admit a new State; of every safe precedent; and a violation of every principle heretofore professed by the Democratic party of the United States. It is an unfair bill. It cannot make peace. It can make nothing but disturbance in Kansas, and everywhere else. I shall endeavor to sustain these propositions as the reason why, certainly to my own entire and perfect satisfaction, I shall vote against that bill at every hazard.

The main idea of this proposition, or rather its pretension, is that the Congress of the United States remands the constitution of Kansas to a vote of the people; and what for? Who authorized us to remand that constitution to a vote of the people? Is it for us, the Congress of the United States, to dictate to the States how they shall form and ratify their constitutions? Where have we obtained any such power as that? If we can require it in the case of a new State, we can require it in the case of an old State. Our authority is the same over all of them. The new States are to be admitted on an equal footing with the original States. It is for the people of Kansas, acting through the forms of law, to say in what manner their constitution shall be formed and ratified. They have said it in every manner in which the people can speak. In the act of August, 1855, they instructed their Territorial Legislature to provide for calling a convention. That was the first act of the people. That Legislature, in obedience to a direct vote of the people, and its members being also elected by the people, proceeded to form a law and to enact it, providing for the assembling of a convention and the election of delegates. They expressly omitted any provision requiring the constitution to be submitted to a popular vote; and when the Governor returned the bill without his signature, on the express ground that it contained no such provision, the representatives of the people in the Territorial Legislature, speaking for the people, passed it over his veto, and declared by a two-thirds vote, in each House, that the constitution should be submitted to the people or not, as the convention itself might choose.

Under that charter, in full view of all these circumstances, with a full knowledge of the fact that the delegates about to be elected and about to be assembled in convention had perfect and full discretion whether they would or would not submit the constitution, the people chose those delegates. They confided to those delegates the discretion whether the constitution should or should not be submitted. Now, sir, we have had the act and deed of the people at every stage; instructing the Legislature to pass a law; speaking through the Legislature in the form of law; speaking through the Legislature again, when Governor Geary's veto was overruled; speaking by the direct voice of the people when the delegates were elected in June. This convention met. It is the impersonation of the people; it is the will of the people; it is the act and deed of the people; and it speaks the voice of the people. There is no other voice of the people; there can be no other, under our form of representative government. It seems to me a plain proposition; but that it may not stand on my authority, I shall quote again what was said by Mr. Webster, in his famous argument in the case of Luther vs. Borden:

"Let us all admit that the people are sovereign. Jay said that in this country there were many sovereigns and no subject. A portion of this sovereign power has been delegated to Government, which represents and speaks the will of the people, as far as they chose to delegate their power. Congress have not all; the State governments have not all. The Constitution of the United States does not speak of the Government; it says the United States. Nor does it speak of the State governments; it says the States; but it recognizes governments as existing. The people must have representatives. In England, the representative system originated, not as a matter of right, but because it was called by the King. The people complained sometimes that they had to send up burgesses. At last there grew up a constitutional representation of the people. In our system, it grew up differently. It was because the people could not act in mass, and the right to choose a representative is every man's portion of sovereign power."

That is a sentence worthy of Mr. Webster:

"The right to choose a representative is every man's portion of sovereign power. Suffrage is a delegation of political power to some individual."

Again:

"It has been said by the opposing counsel, that the people can get together, call themselves so many thousands, and establish whatever form of government they please. But others must have the same right. We have then a stormy South American liberty, supported by arms to-day, and crushed by arms to-morrow. Our theory places a beautiful face on liberty, and makes it powerful for good, producing no tumults. When it is necessary to ascertain the will of the people, the Legislature must provide the means of ascertaining it. The Constitution of the United States was established in this way. It was recommended to the States to send delegates to a convention. They did so. Then it was recommended that the States should ascertain the will of the people. Nobody suggested any other mode."—Howard's Reports, pp. 30-31.

Now, sir, I say that the act and deed of the people has been made in every form known to the law up to the assembling of the convention at Lecompton. Unless you are to have what Mr. Webster properly calls a South American liberty, the liberty of those who are the strongest, the liberty of those who choose to take arms in their hands instead of abiding a peaceful arbitration of their differences, there can be no other act and deed of the people than as expressed in the forms of law. I say this convention, when it was assembled, was the representative of the people of Kansas; nobody else was authorized to speak for the people of Kansas; and the convention was authorized to speak, and it was authorized as plainly as if it had been so written in the act providing for the election of the delegates, either to submit the constitution in whole, or in part, to popular ratification. Now, we, not elected by the people of Kansas, not responsible to the people of Kansas, but elected by, and responsible to the people of the other States, propose to take into our hands the formation and regulation of all the political affairs of this new State. We propose to say to this convention that we will define their powers; that we will prescribe for them different powers from those which the people conferred. It seems to me that on no sound principle, with no just regard to the doctrine of a representative Government, with no just regard to the reserved rights and sovereignty of the States, can Congress ever undertake to require the ratification of the constitution of a new State in a different manner from that which the people themselves have prescribed. I do not say it is merely intervention; for that has come to be a catch-word; I say it is trampling under foot the sovereignty and the rights of the States. If you admit Kansas into the Union at all, you must admit her on an equal footing with the original States, and you must do nothing with her, or to her, that you would not do to any State already in the Union.

But we are referred to the act of the last Congress preparatory to the admission of Minnesota, and we are told that is a precedent which elicited no dispute in Congress. It elicited no dispute, because it attracted no attention. I observe, by a reference to the Congressional Globe, that that bill, in its present shape, passed the other House under the operation of the previous question, without ever having been printed. It was brought into the House at the last hour, as an amendment to a former bill; and, having been offered and hastily read, by the dispensation of the previous question it was put through that House. I think we debated it a week on the provision for alien suffrage; but I did not hear a single Senator, either for the bill or against it, make the least allusion to the fact that it required the constitution of that State to be submitted to a vote of the people. I do not know how many Senators were aware of that provision. Perhaps the Senator from Illinois was; I was not. I did not know there was any such provision in the bill until long after the adjournment of Congress. If I had known it, and a motion had been made to strike it from the bill, I should have voted to strike it out of the bill, for I would have required of Minnesota nothing more than had been required in former times of other States. That is the only case to be found in all the legislation of Congress, from the earliest times, in which we have required the constitution of a State to be submitted to a vote of the people. It is a case that passed without discussion; it is a case where there was no debate in either House on the question; and I certainly need not tell an assembly of gentlemen, a majority of whom are lawyers, that no case is authority upon any question that was not argued at the time of the decision.

But, sir, even the Minnesota case is not a precedent for this amendment. In the Minnesota case we substituted ourselves for the Territorial Legislature; we called on the people to elect their delegates, subject to certain general provisions. In this case the people of Kansas have chosen their delegates under totally different provisions, under a direction to them to submit the constitution or not, as they pleased; those delegates have met; their work is complete; and now we are asked not to prescribe an original charter, but to violate the charter which those delegates received directly from the people. That case, therefore, does not warrant this amendment. Then, on what ground is it that we are asked to remand the constitution of Kansas to a vote of the people? Whence comes the suggestion that the convention which met in Kansas was not as legal as the convention which met in Ohio, or in Illinois, or in Missouri, or in any other of the States which have already been admitted into the Union, and none of which submitted their first constitutions to a vote of the people? On what pretext is founded the argument that we must not receive this constitution? It is said there was a vote taken on the 4th of January, 1858, in which ten thousand majority was given against the constitution. Very well, sir; but was that a legal or an illegal vote? I think it was an illegal vote; I think it has no legal consequence whatever; I think it was simply a signification of so many people, if they were duly qualified, that they wanted a change of the constitution, but they did not express it in the proper form, and those who were opposed to a change being under no obligation to speak on that day, we cannot even arrive at any moral result, much less a legal one, from that vote. But I will take gentlemen on their own ground; let us say that it was a legal vote, let us say that it was a full vote for the adoption or rejection of the constitution, then if the constitution was rejected, it is at an end; and by what right do you set it on its feet again, and send it back for another ratification? If there be any force in the pretext that the vote taken in January upon the adoption or rejection of the constitution, under the authority of the Territorial Legislature, was legal, it shows that the constitution is at an end, and so much of the House amendment as proposes to recognize the constitution or set it up again for any purpose, is a clear infraction of the will of the people of Kansas. It cannot stand on either leg, therefore.

But, sir, that is not the worst of it. This House amendment does not, in truth, refer the constitution of Kansas back to the people of Kansas. Who are the people of Kansas—I mean the people authorized to vote for or against this constitution? The constitution defines them. One part of the constitution was submitted to the people; one part was ratified by every argument which men can receive: I mean the seventh article. That not only passed the convention, but it passed the vote of the people; and who were they? The constitution tells us:

"At which election the constitution framed by this convention shall be submitted to all the white male inhabitants of the Territory of Kansas in the said Territory upon that day, and over the age of twenty-one years, for ratification or rejection."

They are the people of Kansas; they are the people defined by the constitution of Kansas; they are the body of electors to ratify or reject the constitution; and we have no right to substitute any other body of electors greater or less than that. Is the seventh article to be overturned by the vote of a larger or a smaller number than provided there? If so, we might as well unmake the whole constitution of Kansas. To whom does this amendment remit it? It provides:

"SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That in the election hereby authorized, all white male inhabitants of said Territory, over the age of twenty-one years, who are legal voters, under the laws of the Territory of Kansas, and none others, shall be allowed to vote."

What is the qualification for a voter under the territorial laws of Kansas? That he shall be a citizen of the United States, and have resided six months in the Territory.

Mr. GREEN. That is not all. It also says that he must never have interfered, or been convicted of having interfered, with the execution of the fugitive slave law. If so, he is disqualified.

Mr. PUGH. Better yet. There is a test law; and gentlemen who have been clamoring about test laws for two years are absolutely renegeing them by act of Congress. But my attention was directed to the other point—the voters under the territorial law are to be citizens of the United States who have resided six months in the Territory. When the people of Kansas came to provide for the election of delegates to the constitutional convention, they considered that too narrow a basis of suffrage, and they allowed any man to vote who was a citizen of the United States, and had resided three months in the Territory. You remit this constitution by the House amendment to a body of electors more contracted and less liberal, not only than the constitution itself provides, but less liberal and more narrow than the people of Kansas, through their Legislature, provided in the election of delegates that formed the constitution; and that is popular sovereignty, that is remitting the constitution back to ascertain if it be the act and deed of the people! You first define the people; you pick out certain men; you enfranchise some and disfranchise others; you pick your tribunal; you pack your jury; and then you talk about a true verdict! And that is done by Congress, and done in defiance of the constitution of Kansas, and in defiance of the will of the people of Kansas, as expressed in the act under which this convention was elected and assembled.

Is it to secure the rejection of the constitution? No man can pretend that it is to try the question over again; no man can pretend that it is remitting the constitution to the tribunal whence it originated. I say it is packing the jury for the purpose of having the constitution rejected; I do not say that is the purpose of those who voted for it, but I say it is the inevitable consequence of the amendment.

Again, sir, the people of Kansas, speaking through their delegates in this convention, thought it eminently proper that that great vexed question which had disturbed the Territory for four years, which had disturbed the whole Union for four years—that great question in reference to which the whole legislation of the organic act of May 30, 1854, was supposed to afford a complete settlement—should be separated out of the body of the constitution and put to a separate vote. How is it with this amendment? You require every anti-slavery man, per force, to vote against the constitution; and that, too, in defiance of the mode of submission provided in the constitution. Any man who is willing to vote for the whole of this constitution, except the seventh article, is compelled by the House amendment to vote against the whole of it. He does not have an opportunity to vote for or against the seventh article. He is compelled to vote against the whole constitution. This is the work of the gentlemen who complain of the vote on the 21st of December. They said no man could then vote for or against the seventh article unless he voted for the constitution. I say that, under this House amendment, no man can vote for or against the seventh article unless he votes against the whole constitution; the thing is impossible; and therefore I say the amendment is framed in such a manner, whatever the purposes of its authors, that it must inevitably secure the rejection of this constitution.

Then, why not reject it at once? Why travel around all this path? Why pursue this sinuous track? Come to the question. If you say it is not the will of the people; if you claim the right to go behind all the forms through which the people can speak, and reject the constitution, reject it; let us have an end of it, and let us see whether there is no other method by which we can bring Kansas into the Union; but do not let us play fast and loose. Do not let us profess to submit this constitution to the ordeal of a fair vote, when the vote itself is so arranged that it must inevitably be rejected. It would be rejected anyhow under the circumstances; because of the last alternative of this bill. If you had put the ten commandments to a vote under this bill, they would be rejected; and why? The alternative is given in the House bill that, if this constitution is rejected, then there shall be another convention; and every man in the Territory of Kansas, in all the counties, who is an aspirant for membership in the new convention—and we know that there are always about twenty candidates for every office to which one man can possibly be elected—all this body of candidates; all the outs, who are always more than the ins, are interested to defeat the constitution, in order to take the chances of being elected to a new convention, and in order to take the chances of being elected to the Legislature, and to the State offices, which may be elective under the new constitution.

I do not understand it to be pretended in this amendment, as the Senator from Illinois said, that the Lecompton constitution is not the act and deed of the people. That is not pretended; but it is said that:

"Inasmuch as it is greatly disputed whether the constitution framed at Lecompton, on the 7th day of November last, and now pending before Congress, was fairly made, or expressed the will of the people of Kansas."

It might be the act and deed of the people, and not express their will. If I grant a man a power of attorney to draw a check or a note for me, he may draw it, but it may not be my will; yet I have to pay it. He has a proper warrant of attorney to do the act, because I authorized him to act for me. It may not be my will; but it is my act and my deed.

Now, sir, as to the last provision of this amendment. Having submitted this constitution in such a form as inevitably to secure its rejection; having submitted it, not to the people, but to a packed jury, selected in defiance of the law of the convention, and in defiance of the law of the Legislature that called the convention; having selected out the body of electors to which we remand it; having, in addition, required every man who is against the institution of slavery in the new State to vote down the whole constitution; and having offered all the temptations to ambition which can be offered in the shape of new offices as an inducement to vote down the constitution: what is to come next? I take it as positively certain that under this bill any constitution would be rejected. None could pass such an ordeal; for even if these candidates approved it, they would say, "We will make it over again after we get the offices." What is to come next? Then it is said there is to be a new constitutional convention. I think we have had constitutional conventions enough in Kansas, a Territory of about fifty thousand people. She has had three constitutional conventions in three years. We have had Topeka and Lecompton, and this new one, Minneola, now in full blast. They are the hardest people to suit that I ever knew. No, sir; I am willing to take of these three constitutions that which is the most formal and the most regular. I am willing, if Congress requires it, that a new convention of delegates shall be assembled in Kansas to pass upon this constitution, for that is the form which they have provided, and that would be granting them a new trial. But if they fail, I am against any more constitutions from Kansas. Let her stay until she gets the proper population. I voted for the Toombs bill, with a proviso, on that ground. I only assented to it for the sake of peace. I did not believe it was a good precedent to bring a State into the Union with so small a population; and I say now, if this Lecompton constitution, which is the only regular and legal one, is to be rejected in every shape and form, let us dismiss the whole subject out of Congress, and let Kansas wait until she gets a population sufficient according to the ratio prescribed for one Representative.

But, sir, this amendment authorizes four gentlemen to exercise discretion unlimited in time as well as in manner, the Governor, the Secretary, the Speaker of the Council, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, although two of them are out of office. At an indefinite period in the future, at any time extending throughout the whole territorial life of Kansas, these four persons, two of whom, as I have said, have ceased, or will soon cease, to be officers, are to have the power of calling upon the people to elect delegates, of providing who shall be the officers to superintend the election, and when the delegates shall be elected, and when they shall be assembled in convention; and that convention is to make the constitution, and it is to be a perfect constitution from the start. If they should pass this railroad ordinance which has given some Senators so much trouble, we have no power over it provided they make it part of their constitution. It is never to come back to us; the President is to look at it, and to proclaim the State admitted.

I know there are cases, very good precedents too, in which a constitution has been submitted to Congress, and Congress has been sufficiently satisfied of its republican character, but has remanded it to a convention to alter some one or other of its provisions, perhaps its boundaries, perhaps some clause which was supposed to infringe the Constitution of the United States; but wherever Congress has remanded a constitution in that way, to be altered or amended in some particular, and afterwards, on compliance with that condition, to admit the State into the Union on proclamation, Congress has had some sight at the constitution. I never knew of their authorizing a constitution to be formed blindly as this bill does. It is for Congress to admit a State, not the President. We have the right to require that certain provisions shall be complied with, and upon that to trust the people; but I am not so willing to trust the people of Kansas in their present condition; and therefore that provision would be evidently objectionable. What will be the result of it? We shall have discharged ourselves from all connection with the subject, and if the constitution to be framed should be like this constitution, against which one party protests, which one party charges with frauds, with outrages, with perjuries of every description, what shall we be told then? We shall hear from the Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] again, that Congress has disclaimed its rightful jurisdiction over the Territories, and that, therefore, all these calamities have occurred. No, sir; let us meet the direct question. If you choose to admit Kansas under the Senate bill, admit her. If you choose to admit her, remanding her constitution to a new convention of delegates, that, as a last resort, would be infinitely better than the House bill. If you will do neither of these, then reject her; or, if you must have her in the Union now, pass the Toombs bill again, or some other bill like it.

For the reasons which I have stated, I am opposed to this hybrid. I am opposed to it in every shape and form. In my judgment it cannot make peace. It is so arranged that it will secure the inevitable rejection of this constitution without any reference to its merits, and, on the other hand, it precipitates the people of Kansas, who have now come to some condition of peace and order, into a new field of anarchy, where there will be no opportunity for us, by any subsequent measures of peace and conciliation, to rectify whatever may have been done amiss. As I said before, it is the most objectionable proposition to me, that has ever yet been submitted to Congress. Believing that it will secure no peace; believing that it will repeat tenfold the anarchy, and disturbance, and civil war which lately prevailed in that Territory; believing that it violates every principle of the party to which I belong; that it violates every principle of representative government; that it asserts and assumes for the Government of the United States a power which it clearly does not possess under the Constitution; that it is a fatal overthrow of the rights and the sovereignty of the States, I am prepared, for one, to vote against it, and to take whatever consequences there may be in store for that vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. BIGGS in the chair.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri, that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House of Representatives.

Mr. GREEN. I do not intend to detain the Senate. I have heard no argument on the motion that I have made, which affects the propriety of it. I call for the yeas and nays upon the question.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 32, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clay, Evans, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Slidell, Thompson of Kentucky, Thomson of New Jersey, Wright, and Yulee—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Polk, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—23.

So the House amendment was disagreed to.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. MASON, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day, it be to meet on Monday next.

ADMISSION OF MINNESOTA.

Mr. SLIDELL. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion. I think we can pass the Minnesota bill to-day without difficulty. ["No debate."]

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Brown, Clay, Evans, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Green, Hammond, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Pearce, Pugh, Sebastian, Slidell, Thompson of Kentucky, Thomson of New Jersey, Wright, and Yulee—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Bright, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, Jones, King, Polk, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Wade, and Wilson—27.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote stands—27 in the affirmative and 27 in the negative. The motion, therefore, is not agreed to.

Mr. MALLORY. To-day ought properly to have been devoted to private bills, and I move that the Senate now take up the Private Calendar.

Mr. DOUGLAS. As we voted against adjourning for the purpose of finishing the Minnesota bill, I hope we shall take that up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on proceeding to the consideration of the Private Calendar.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If that motion is insisted upon, I shall call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MALLORY. I insist upon my motion.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and, being taken, resulted—yeas 21, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Clay, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Green, Hammond, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Thompson of Kentucky, Wright, and Yulee—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Bigler, Bright, Broderick, Brown, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Fessenden, Fitch, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Pearce, Seward, Simmons, Slidell, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Wade, and Wilson—29.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill to admit Minnesota into the Union as a State.

Mr. YULEE. There is some unfinished business of yesterday morning which perhaps may be disposed of now. It is not possible that the Minnesota bill can be disposed of to-day. It is useless to take it up at this hour. It is now after three o'clock, very nearly the usual time of adjournment. I should be very glad if the Senate would be so kind as to take up the bill creating the office of Fourth Assistant Postmaster General; but, as gentlemen around me say they are unwilling now to take up any question which may occupy time, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion. I desire to see whether there is a disposition to pass Minnesota or not.

Mr. STUART. If the Senator from Florida will consent to take up the Minnesota bill, so that it may pass over as the unfinished business, I presume there will be no objection to his motion.

Mr. MASON. I call the Senator to order. He is out of order. The motion to adjourn is not debatable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to adjourn is pending. On that motion the yeas and nays are called for.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and, being taken, resulted—yeas 25, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Brown, Clay, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Green, Hammond, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Sebastian, Slidell, Thompson of Kentucky, Thomson of New Jersey, Wright, and Yulee—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Bright, Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Fessenden, Fitch, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, King, Pugh, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—26.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question pending is on the motion to take up the Minnesota bill.

Mr. SLIDELL. The Senator from Michigan made a suggestion just now, which, I think, will receive unanimous assent on this side of the Chamber—that that bill be taken up, and be left as the unfinished business for Monday. I have no sort of objection to that. We cannot get a vote on the bill to-day. With the understanding that it shall go over as the unfinished business, I am willing to take up the bill.

The motion to take up the bill was agreed to;

and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill for the admission of Minnesota into the Union.

Mr. SLIDELL. I presume now, the Senator from Michigan will make the motion to adjourn.

Mr. STUART. So far as I am concerned, unless the Senator from Illinois, who has charge of the bill objects, I am willing to carry out the suggestion I made, and agree to an adjournment.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If there is any good reason why we cannot vote to-night I shall be willing to adjourn; but I would prefer to have a vote to-night.

Mr. FITCH. I voted on the last motion against an adjournment, but I shall vote again promptly for it. I voted then against adjournment for the purpose of having an opportunity to say that I think my record in favor of Minnesota will compare with that of the Senator from Illinois, and I am not to be dragged into an appeal to the friends of Minnesota, such as he has made, to the support of any measure which I think like a refusal to adjourn is merely designed for factious purposes. We have received notice here, and we have no reason to believe that it was not well intended, that that bill cannot be passed to-night.

Mr. KING. Why not?

Mr. FITCH. Because Senators intend to debate it. When they have avowed that intention, I am not going to sit here all night. I am not only willing but anxious to vote if we could take the vote by remaining here any reasonable length of time. I should remain of course cheerfully, but having received notice that the vote cannot be had unless at a very unreasonable hour I see no reason for detaining members here.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have attempted to drag on nobody, sir; I have appealed to nobody. I have only done my duty in submitting the motion. I made no comment upon any man's vote. I do not intend to do so. Hence, I do not know how to understand the remark of the Senator from Indiana. He is only accountable for his vote, and I am for mine. I do not pretend to prescribe to any man how he shall vote.

It is said we have received notice that we cannot have the vote to-night. That is not satisfactory to me. I want to know why. I have not found that the Senate adjourned every time when I intimated here that I desired to speak, or thought we could not get a vote on a measure. We have been forced here into the night, the middle of the night, and even towards morning, when a question concerning the admission of a State, and where certainly the title was not as clear as the title of Minnesota to admission. When we have been forced to sit here in the dead hours of the night for the purpose of getting a vote, and cutting off a debate on a question at even six o'clock in the morning, I am to be told now that it is dragging on if I insist on taking up the Minnesota bill at only seventeen minutes past three o'clock. We are not within an hour, or two hours, of the regular time of adjournment.

Mr. FITCH. With the permission of the Senator I will say that it is not to the taking up of the bill that I object. I do not object to having the bill taken up. I do not deem that an attempt to drag on any one; but when the Senator resisted the motion to adjourn, he denies having made an appeal. The reporter, I presume, has taken it down. He did say that he called for the yeas and nays, for he wished to see who the friends of Minnesota were. Was not that an appeal?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Well, I will say frankly that I desire to see who the friends of Minnesota are. Minnesota has been here applying for admission from the beginning of the session. She comes under an enabling act, comes with a population that you acknowledge, by your vote, to be entitled to two members of Congress. She comes with a constitution ratified by her people almost unanimously, with only five hundred votes against it. Why is she kept out, and at the same time Kansas, with only forty or fifty thousand population, with a constitution which is denied to be the act and deed of her people, forced through by night sessions? Even after Kansas has gone from us, we cannot, within the reasonable Senate hours, have a vote upon Minnesota; and when I ask why, the only reason is, "You cannot have the vote to-night!" That is not satisfactory. If there was a Senator sick, who desired to make a speech, it would be a different question. If there was an act that addressed itself to the courtesy of the Senate why we should not proceed with the bill, that is a question I should be very willing to see submitted to the Senate; but when no reason is given why we should not proceed now, when the usual hour of adjournment has not arrived, I could not understand this tenacity to get rid of Minnesota, and keep it back. I do not know why it is done; and I say to gentlemen, in all fairness and frankness, that as chairman of the Committee on Territories, who reported the Minnesota bill months ago, I feel that it is my duty to ask the Senate to take it up, and proceed, at least, with it until the usual hour of adjournment. I do not wish to force night sessions. I would not ask it; but let us go on to the usual hour of adjournment, and I think before that hour arrives we can dispose of the bill.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move an adjournment.

Mr. FITCH. Will the Senator be kind enough to withdraw the motion?

Mr. BENJAMIN. There is nobody I would indulge more willingly than my friend from Indiana, but I do not think this discussion is of any use at all, and I insist on my motion to adjourn.

Mr. HALE called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and, being taken, resulted—yeas 25, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Clay, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Green, Hammond, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Sebastian, Slidell, Thompson of Kentucky, Thomson of New Jersey, Wright, and Yulee—25.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bright, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Fessenden, Fitch, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, Jones, King, Pugh, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—27.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill for the admission of the State of Minnesota into the Union is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FITCH. I have a very few remarks to make—none on the bill, but a word in answer to what fell from the Senator from Illinois. He is at a loss to understand the purport or motive of my language and claims to be the special friend of Minnesota. I have no objection to that; I believe he is so; but it would have been better to have evinced his friendship on other occasions when there was a probability perhaps of an early passage of the bill. We have now received notice that we cannot pass it to-day, and I think Senators are in earnest when they say it. I am willing to take them at their word. Where was the Senator's peculiar anxiety for Minnesota yesterday morning, when the Senate agreed to adjourn over until Monday, and when of course there could have been no action until that day? Where was his anxiety, when as chairman of the Committee on Territories, having it specially in charge, he assented in the Senate that Kansas should be made a special order, and thereby placed in advance of Minnesota? It is too late now to come forward and urge Senators to sit all night, after notice that perhaps even that will not avail the passage of this bill, after having permitted opportunities to place it in advance of everything else to pass by. I do not yield to him in devotion to Minnesota and its early admission.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I rise to a question of order. Is there any motion pending before the Senate?

Mr. DOUGLAS. The bill is pending. I trust the Senator will not interfere.

Mr. FITCH. It was simply to compare notes with the honorable Senator from Illinois, in relation to action on the bill for the admission of Minnesota, that I rose; and I am only sorry that my desire to make this brief reply has found me on the record, in the company with which I am, voting against an adjournment.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have no notes to compare with the Senator from Indiana, or any other Senator, on this question. I have claimed no special devotion to Minnesota. My action has been governed by an entirely different consideration. I happen to be the chairman of the Committee on Territories, and, as the organ of that committee, the Minnesota bill was under my charge, and it was my duty to see that it had a fair chance. I have acted in that capacity, and in that alone. I do not pretend that I am any better friend of Minnesota than other Senators. I neither arrogate to myself nor detract from them. Each Senator must act for himself upon this question.

Now, sir, one word about my having been dilatory about the Minnesota bill. I could appeal to my friend from Missouri, [Mr. GREEN,] and to every other member of the Committee on Territories, that I was not responsible for one hour's delay in that committee, about Minnesota. I blame no one. I do not complain of the delay; but each member of the committee will testify that I pushed it, as far and as fast as respect for colleagues would permit me to do. On every occasion, when there was an opportunity, I have insisted upon it here. I have had to antagonize with measures of which I was the warm advocate—the Pacific railroad bill, for instance—on more than one occasion, in order to get up Minnesota. I did not agree that Kansas should be made a special order, to override Minnesota. As the Senator from Missouri knows, I refused to agree to it, and said I could not assent to it. I have never agreed to the postponement of Minnesota, for any other question whatever. I have been overridden by the Senate; and submitted, of course, as I must submit. If I am overruled again to-night, I shall submit with a good grace; but I have never consented to have Minnesota overridden by Kansas, or any other question, and I do not intend to allow it to be done, if I can prevent it—not that I am the special friend of Minnesota, more than any other Senator. I am discharging my duty as the organ of the committee that reported this bill, who is expected to bring it up on all proper occasions. The Senator does not want to be driven into a night session. I expressly disclaimed any desire for a night session. I said if you took it up and proceeded with it until the usual hour of adjournment, I would not object to an adjournment; but I object to overriding Minnesota, first with one bill, and then another, and then another, until you even come down to a motion to override it with the private bills; and then by motions and cross-motions to adjourn, over and over again. It was to that that I objected, if I could stop it. Each Senator votes according to his own judgment, and I have no condemnation of any one. I only discharge my duty, and leave each Senator to act on his.

Mr. GREEN. I think it due to the Senator from Illinois that I should bear testimony to the fact that in the Committee on Territories I thought he pressed Minnesota with a great deal of what seemed to me to be hot haste. He was far from being negligent in relation to that measure in committee. I really thought I had a right to complain that he was too eager in pressing the matter. I make that statement in justice to him. Since the matter has been before the Senate, other Senators know as much about his course of conduct as I do, and I have no testimony to bear. On the question of representation, I felt it my duty to make some remarks; whether he did or not I am not prepared to say; but enough of that. The reason why I do not desire this bill brought up to-night is not to prevent Minnesota from being admitted in the Union. I think my acts will show that I am as sincere a friend of Minnesota as any other Senator; but I am advised, and I so informed the Senator from Illinois, that it would be impossible to reach a vote on account of some amendments that certain Senators intend to propose, which amendments, from the reflection I have given to the subject, I intend to go against; but I think, by a conference with them, we can prevent that delay, and it was as a friend to the bill, not as an enemy, that I desired time to confer with them privately. Concerted action, action prepared and matured, generally has a tendency to expedite business in the Senate; and it was with that view, not as an obstacle to the admission of the State, but as a means to prevent unnecessary controversy when the subject does come up for consideration, that I favored an adjournment. Besides, it will be remembered that when, yesterday, I moved to reconsider the order by which the Senate had resolved to adjourn over until Monday, when it was known that my view was to act on the Kansas bill, and that that consideration alone moved me, every Senator on the opposite side, and some on this, voted against me. We still carried it, and thus we appropriated this day to the consideration of Kansas. Having disposed of that, which I think is a very good day's work, and this being Good Friday, I thought we ought to adjourn. I therefore renew the motion to adjourn.

Mr. CAMERON. Will the Senator from Missouri withdraw that motion for a moment?

Mr. GREEN. I will, if the Senator from Pennsylvania will renew it.

Mr. CAMERON. I will do so. I was exceedingly anxious to adjourn over yesterday, because I could have attended to some private business at home without doing any injury to the public service. To-day I do not care about it; but if the Senator from Missouri will agree to bring up this question—

Mr. GREEN. If we now adjourn it remains as unfinished business.

Mr. CAMERON. I am not certain about that.

Mr. GREEN. It will come up when the Senate next meets as a matter of course.

Mr. CAMERON. Then I shall vote to adjourn. The Senator from Missouri will permit me to ask him if there are any amendments to be moved? We shall adjourn as a matter of course if there are none to be moved; but if there are, they had better be offered now, so that we can think them over until Monday. I think one of the most pleasant features of this body is that kindness and courtesy which always characterize it, and although, not having adjourned over from yesterday, I am compelled to stay here to-morrow, I move to adjourn to accommodate gentlemen on the other side. I am exceedingly anxious that the question of the admission of Minnesota shall be decided as soon as possible; yet, if gentlemen on the other side will say that the question shall come up immediately, when we meet on Monday, without any difficulty, I, for one, will move to adjourn.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Allow me to make a suggestion. If there are amendments to be offered, it would be right that they should be offered now, so that we may consider them in the mean time, and be ready to vote upon them when we meet again. While we are debating the time is wearing away; and therefore I suggest that the amendments be offered; that the bill shall then be left as unfinished business, and I will not interpose any further objection to an adjournment. If this course is pursued, we can take up the bill on Monday and vote, the amendments being before us in the mean time.

Mr. MASON. The office of peacemaker is a very dangerous one, and I do not mean to undertake it; but it is manifest that some collateral questions have arisen in a certain section of the country on the great matter of admitting Minnesota instantly; and, to avoid further strife, and because the usual hour of adjournment has arrived, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 2, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved. The SPEAKER announced the business first in order to be the presentation of reports by the Committee of Claims in reference to the business of the Court of Claims.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill for reference.

Mr. HARLAN. I call for the regular order of business.

WASHINGTON AQUEDUCT.

Mr. GOODE. I rise to a privileged question. I am instructed by the Committee for the District of Columbia to report back, without amendment, Senate bill (No. 176) to acquire certain lands needed for the Washington aqueduct in the District of Columbia, and to ask that the same be put upon its passage.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I merely wish to say that we have had this deficiency bill before the House for the last two or three weeks, and the debate has been entirely on another subject. The debate on that bill closes with the rising of the committee to-day; and unless it is taken up for consideration in the committee to-day, there will be nothing said about it, and no discussion had upon it.

Mr. GOODE. I am persuaded that this bill might have been passed through the House while the gentleman has been making his speech.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Yes; but I would say to my friend that he has another bill of the same sort.

Mr. GOODE. Well, let us get through with this, at all events.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GOODE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to present a resolution for reference only.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I object.

Mr. LETCHER. As this is the last day on which this deficiency bill—involving a considerable amount of money, and many items of interest to the country—can be debated, I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. LETCHER. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts whether his purpose is to cut off all debate on the deficiency bill?

Mr. CHAFFEE. Not at all.

Mr. LETCHER. It cannot be debated at all after to-day, for the debate closes upon the rising of the committee to-day.

Mr. CHAFFEE. Then I withdraw my motion.

The motion of Mr. LETCHER was then agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BOGGS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the deficiency bill.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, from the organization of this Government, in 1789, down to 1842, the calendar year was the fiscal year of this Government, commencing on the 1st of January, and terminating on the 31st of December, in each year. Congress was always in session two months, or more, at the commencement of the year for which the annual appropriations were made. Congress met in December, 1841, and continued in session, I believe, until September, 1842. From the 1st of January, 1842, until August, there were no annual appropriations passed for that year, and the Government was without appropriations to pay its current expenses. That, sir, was a Congress which had under consideration various important and highly interesting subjects to be disposed of, and hence the delay and failure in making the appropriations. And it was during that session that the fiscal year was changed, and made by law to commence on the 1st of July, and consequently to terminate on the 30th of June, in each year. Under this arrangement, and this provision of law, the estimates have to be made some seven or eight months before the commencement of the fiscal year for which the appropriations are needed. For the present fiscal year, which commenced on the 1st of July, 1857, and which will expire on the 30th of June next, the estimates were all made by the executive branch of the Government, and submitted to the last Congress, on the first Monday of December, 1856—full seven months before this fiscal year commenced; and such is the case every year.

Now, sir, we are called upon at this session of Congress to make appropriations for the services of the fiscal year, which will terminate upon the 30th of June, 1859. The estimates upon which those appropriations are to be based were submitted here at the first of this session, and were made eight months before the fiscal year will commence. And consequently, it is to be expected, it cannot be avoided, that there will be in some instances deficiencies in these appropriations. I think that it is almost impossible for the various officers charged with preparing the estimates to make them anything like exact in all particulars. And hence we may expect, as has been the case since the change of the fiscal year, that there will be annual estimates and recommendations for deficiencies in the appropriations. To this I see no objection. I know that many gentlemen are opposed to all deficiency bills. I, sir, have no objection to deficiency bills if the deficiencies estimated and asked for are in themselves right and proper. It is not because they are deficiencies that I would object to them, or oppose the passage of a law appropriating for them. But when I come to examine the items, I will determine, to the best of my judgment, however much it may be at fault, whether they are right or whether they are wrong. If they are right, I will vote for them as freely and as cheerfully in a deficiency bill as I would in any other bill.

Sir, what is the character of the bill which we have now before us? It is called a "deficiency bill." Its caption is, "a bill to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the services of the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1858." I desire now to call the attention of the committee to the various provisions of the bill, and to see if those provisions correspond with the title.

I think, sir, on examination, it will be found not only that this is a deficiency bill, but a bill for extras and appropriations in anticipation of the regular appropriation bill—a bill for the past, and a bill for the future.

The first item is as follows:

"For furniture for Speaker's room, and committee-rooms, Clerk's offices, Sergeant-at-Arms' office, Doorkeeper's room, and carpenters' work, $39,000; for newspapers, $3,000."

These come in as deficiencies of appropriations for the House of Representatives. How was the furniture in this Hall purchased? Out of the contingent fund? I suppose not. The late Clerk, when he retired from office and made his report to this Congress, said that there was $447,000 of an unexpended balance of appropriation for contingencies and other expenses of the House of Representatives. Another item is for laborers under resolution of this House of the present session; and another item which comes under the head of contingent expenses is to enable John C. Rives to pay to the reporters of this House, for reporting the debates of the present session of Congress, the usual additional compensation of $800 each, or $4,000 in all. Is this a deficiency? If a deficiency, under what law is it a deficiency? On what contract is it based? Your contract for reporting for this House is with the reporter, at $7 50 per column. He employs the persons who make the reports of our debates, and their compensation is between them and him.

The next item commences with the Army—amounting to $7,912,000, if I have made the estimate correctly—nearly eight million dollars in a bill the caption of which is to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the present fiscal year. Here is the document upon which this item, or these items, for the Army, are asked for in this bill:

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON CITY, January 12, 1858.

SIR: I have the honor to submit, in papers marked A, B, and C, the details of the calculations upon which the estimate for deficiencies for the present year, and for the additional force ordered to Utah, is based.

At the close of the fiscal year, on the 30th of June last, there was, in consequence of the greatly extended operations in that year, a deficiency in the appropriations for the quartermaster's department of the following amounts, viz:

On account of regular supplies, consisting of fuel, forage, straw, and stationery, of.....	$279,377 57
On account of incidental expenses, of.....	129,860 20
On account of barracks and quarters, of.....	67,954 39
On account of Army transportation, of.....	751,487 15

Amounting to.....$1,238,679 31

And it was ascertained that for the Army, as it was on the 24th of December, 1857, the deficiency for the present year, in addition to that of last year, would be as follows, viz:

For regular supplies.....	$300,000 00
For incidental expenses.....	60,000 00
For barracks and quarters.....	30,000 00
For mounts and remounts.....	100,000 00
For transportation of troops and supplies, about.....	2,000,000 00
	2,490,000 00

Making the whole deficiency.....$3,718,679 31
See paper marked A.

To which it is now necessary to add for the increased force ordered to Utah, and to supply supposed losses under the various heads of expenditure as explained in paper marked B, of.....$1,400,632 04

And of the several heads of expenditure explained in paper marked C.....1,606,580 00
3,007,232 04

Making together.....$6,725,911 35

A large portion of the items on papers B and C are for necessary outfits which, though they must be provided in the present fiscal year, will be used principally in, and therefore properly belong to, the next fiscal year.

For several years past our Army, though called a "peace establishment," has been, in fact, an Army on a war establishment, and necessarily incurring the expenditures of war. The means for the movement of the army already ordered for service in Utah, if brought together and formed in solid column, would extend from this city to Baltimore.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

TH. S. JESUP,
Quartermaster General.

Hon. J. GLANCY JONES, Chairman of Committee of Ways and Means.

Here, sir, is the report of the estimate asking for this extraordinary appropriation of $6,725,000, coming from a bureau officer of the Government to one of the committees of this House, without the indorsement of the head of the Department, without the indorsement of the Executive, and without passing through the Treasury Department, that that Department might know how to propose the ways and means to meet the demands under it. Much, of late, has been said about large contracts; and, sir, the articles which are written, published, and sent to the members here, may be based upon these very amounts. If this appropriation pass, it will pass without the least evidence that the executive department ever recommended or asked for such an appropriation at the hands of Congress.

But, sir, this document shows that $3,718,679 of this appropriation is for deficiencies for the last and the current fiscal year; that over $3,000,000 is for the future, a great portion of which may be used before the expiration of this fiscal year, but which properly belongs to the next. Then, until I can see some better reason for making this $3,000,000 appropriation beyond the present fiscal year, I cannot vote for it in this shape. We have the estimates, and we have a bill here to make appropriations for the Army for the next fiscal year; and that bill, I hope, will pass before the expiration of the present fiscal year, for I hope that this session will come to a close before the 1st of July next. Then we can place this appropriation in the regular appropriation bill for the next fiscal year; and, in my opinion, it would be much more properly placed there than in this.

At any rate, I want the reasons of the Secretary himself, if of no higher authority, why the appropriation should be made. Is it for the purposes of war? And is there war existing with the people of Utah? They may be in a state of anarchy, or of opposition to this Government. What should be done if they are? Perhaps my opinions are not worth much upon this subject; but if I could counsel those who have the control of these affairs, I would say, send your officers there properly appointed to take charge of and administer that government without an army accompanying them to enforce their authority.

Mr. KEITT. The resolution on that subject declared that war existed.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I voted for a resolution referring that subject to a committee. That committee has not reported, and I take it for granted, therefore, that they have not found the evidence that they were in a state of rebellion.

Well, sir, send these officers there, and if that people will not receive them, if they will not cooperate in administering the government, let us have the fact known, and then repeal the organic law establishing a territorial government, and give notice to Brigham Young and his hosts, that if they will not conform to the provisions of law and the Constitution of the United States, they must leave our soil and go somewhere else. I believe you have not yet disposed of the land upon which they are.

Mr. BURROUGHS. I desire to know when the debate terminates upon this bill.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If the gentleman will read the resolution he will see.

The CHAIRMAN. It terminates at the close of the session to-day.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Then, I say that if the people of Utah will not live as American citizens, under the Constitution and laws of the country, repeal your territorial law, and give them fair notice to leave your soil, and, upon their failure to do so, send your Army there and drive them off. But so long as they behave themselves, and demean themselves as citizens, I have nothing to do with their religion; nor should this Government have anything to do with them further than they have with every other religious sect in this country—give them protection to worship under their own vine and fig-tree, unmolested by any one.

Mr. KEITT. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I do not want to get into a controversy with the gentleman in regard to that resolution.

Mr. KEITT. The preamble of that resolution is in this language:

"Whereas, it appears, from the proclamation of Brigham Young, late Governor of the Territory of Utah, from the President's message, and from later developments, that the said Territory is now in open rebellion against the Government of the United States."

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I refer the gentleman to my friend from Arkansas, [Mr. WARREN,] who wrote that resolution.

Mr. KEITT. The gentleman voted for it.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I say, then, that the appropriation for the future, in my opinion, should not be retained in this bill.

There is another item in this bill, under the head of the Army, "for subsistence in kind, $1,220,000," and this is in a deficiency bill. It does not say in the item itself when and how this $1,220,000 is to be expended, and to what particular period of service it is to apply. There is no document, which I have seen, or been able to find, showing that there is any deficiency in the appropriation for subsistence in kind for the current fiscal year. The document upon which this item is incorporated in the bill tells us when and how it is to be appropriated. It is in a letter of the Secretary of War, which is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, January 15, 1858.

SIR: I have the honor herewith to transmit, for the consideration and action of the House of Representatives, an estimate of funds required for subsistence of troops for the Utah expedition, based upon the requirements of a circular issued by the commanding general, dated January 11, 1858.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN B. FLOYD, Secretary of War.

Hon. J. L. ORR, Speaker House of Representatives.

Estimate of funds required for subsistence of Utah expedition, as directed by circular dated Headquarters of the Army, January 11, 1858.

Aggregate force, as per circular.....	5,606
Women to companies.....	200
Servants.....	300
Employés.....	1,894
	<hr/> 8,000

One year's supply for 8,000—365 days...	2,920,000	rations.
Eight months' supply for depot—245 days.....	1,960,000	"

Total number of rations.....	4,880,000	"
------------------------------	-----------	---

At 25 cents per ration.....	$1,220,000	00
-----------------------------	-------------	----

Note.—This estimate is necessary to purchase, in advance for twenty months, subsistence for the troops composing the army for Utah, that quantity being required to go forward with the troops.

It is not an additional estimate, as the stores are to supply that portion of the army during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1859, and for part of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1860.

GEO. GIBSON,
Commissary General of Subsistence.

OFFICE COMMISSARY GENERAL OF SUBSISTENCE,
WASHINGTON, January 13, 1858.

Here we are told that this item of $1,220,000, so far from being a deficiency for the current year, is to supply subsistence in kind for the Utah expedition, for the years 1859–60. Here we are, in the year 1858; and what is the necessity for making this appropriation in a deficiency bill, when it is all estimated for in the regular Army appropriations for 1859, which will, I hope, be passed before the 1st of July? Will not that give them time enough to buy supplies and to send them out there for the next year? The appropriations for the year 1860 will be made at the next session of Congress, which will terminate on the 4th of March, 1859, four months before the commencement of the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1860, which will give them ample time and opportunity to get the subsistence and forward it.

Sir, the Constitution of the United States provides that Congress shall have power to raise and support armies, and that no appropriations to that use shall be for a longer term than two years. Now, sir, it will be said, in defense of this item, that it is only for the year 1859, and for the eight months of the year 1860. Which eight months is it—the first, the middle, or the latter part of the year? I think, at least, it is straining the Constitution to make appropriations for the Army so long in advance. Therefore I think that this item ought to be stricken out.

There is one item, however, to which I wish to call the attention of the House, under the head of quartermaster's department. There are a great many matters under this head, including horses, mules, and oxen, the purchase and repair of wagons, carts, drays, &c., lumping up the whole at $5,400,000—a larger amount of money, by nearly one million dollars, than your whole Army establishment proper cost the Government less than fifteen years ago. Where are we, sir? Is the Army of the United States subordinate to the civil department? And if it is, at this time, how long will it continue so while your Army appropriations now are more than your whole Government cost you per annum, fourteen years since?

Then, sir, here is another item for payment of clerks temporarily employed in the Post Office Department. This item the Postmaster General tells us is for clerks whose employment was made necessary by the large amount of business in the letting of the mails.

Another item is the sum of $1,469,173, for a deficiency in the Post Office service. Now, let us look for a moment at that branch of the public service. The whole expenditure for the Post Office service for the year ending June 30, 1845, was $4,320,731.99. What is it this year, under the system of cheap postage that has been established in this country, for the establishment of which certain gentlemen have taken great credit to themselves? In my opinion, no man is entitled to credit for reducing the postage rates, unless he had, at the same time, devised some way by which the mail would have been carried without taxing the country for it. The Post Office establishment is one that renders private and individual service to the citizens of the United States, and I believe that every man who receives such service ought to pay for it in exact proportion to the extent of service he receives. At the last session of Congress you appropriated for this service $14,474,000, and at this session you are asked for $1,469,473, making together $15,944,000. You also, at the last session of Congress, appropriated $1,120,350 for ocean mail service, making the aggregate expense for the Post Office service for this year $17,065,160. And what are the receipts from that branch? Seven million seven hundred and ninety-five thousand dollars, or, in round numbers, seven and three quarter millions, leaving between nine and ten millions to be drawn from the people.

It will be necessary to make this appropriation as you have incurred the liability; but you should change your postage laws, and fix the rates of postage so as to make the receipts defray the expenses, and not have that service a burden on the country, and tax those who receive no benefit from it.

Then, sir, the third and last section of the bill is as follows:

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the accounting officers of the Treasury be authorized and directed to allow credit to the Clerk of the House of Representatives for such payments out of its contingent fund as have been, or may be, made under allowances authorized by the House of Representatives during the last Congress: Provided, That said allowances shall have been duly approved by the Committee of Accounts: And be it further provided, That the said allowances be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Now, sir, I take the ground that this is not a deficiency. It is based upon no law of Congress. As I understand it, it repeals an existing law and makes an appropriation giving this extra and increased compensation to persons in the employment of this House, who have received every dollar of compensation which the law authorized them to receive when they accepted the positions which they occupy. And without this, your resolutions, passed during a former session of Congress in violation of law, have no force and no virtue. There is no amount specified in this section of the bill. It is an indefinite amount. It is to meet such payments as have been made, or may be made, under allowances authorized by the House. I believe the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] stated, in the remarks which he made upon this bill, that, when the committee came to this section, he would move to strike out "allowances," and substitute "resolutions" of the House. Now, let us see what those resolutions are. Here is one of them:

"To John M. Barclay, its Journal clerk, what will make his regular annual compensation for his past services, and until otherwise ordered, equal to that now paid to the chief clerk under the Secretary of the Senate."

Now, sir, what is that resolution? The present Journal clerk—the gentleman for whose benefit this resolution was intended—commenced his service here some ten years ago, at an annual compensation of $1,500, if I mistake not. He has received, I take it, every year twenty per cent. upon this amount in the shape of extra compensation or permanent increase of pay. And now his compensation is $2,160. But what does this resolution do? It proposes to go back to the time when that gentleman's service commenced here, and to give him the compensation, not that the chief clerk under the Secretary of the Senate received at that time—no, sir; but it is to give him as his regular annual compensation from the period of the commencement of his service here, and until otherwise ordered, the same compensation that the chief clerk under the Secretary of the Senate received at the time of the adoption of the resolution. Now, what did the chief clerk of the Senate receive at the time that the Journal clerk commenced his service here? Eighteen hundred dollars; and his salary now, and at the time that this resolution was adopted at the close of the last session of Congress, was $2,500. Thus you go back, and, by this resolution, you give him $2,500 from 1847 up to this time, being $600 a year more than the chief clerk of the Senate received at the time the service of the Journal clerk commenced here. Now, I ask if there is any gentleman here who, upon the plain presentation of that proposition, would vote for it?

But this same section is intended to cover another resolution of the last House, which provided that each of the employes of this House should have twenty per cent. extra compensation upon his salary. Then, sir, if you put this salary up to $2,500, twenty per cent. upon that will make the compensation of this officer $3,000, including his regular annual compensation, and twenty per cent. extra compensation under the other resolution which was adopted at the last session.

Now, sir, there was another resolution passed for the benefit of James C. Walker, the reading clerk. It provided that his compensation, from the time he commenced his service here until otherwise ordered, should be the same as that of the reading clerk of the Senate. What was the salary of the reading clerk of the Senate when Mr. Walker commenced his service here? It was $1,500. The chief clerk did the reading then, and he received $1,500 at the time this gentleman's service commenced. And this resolution was to go back some ten years, and give this officer $2,160, the compensation of the reading clerk of the Senate at the time the resolution passed; and adding twenty per cent. to that, you have somewhere in the neighborhood of two thousand five hundred dollars as the compensation of that officer.

Well, Mr. Chairman, there is another resolution which is also covered by this third section; and that is, to give to another employe of the House $360 per annum for every year that he has made a statement of the appropriations made, officers created, &c. This gentleman, Mr. Buck, is one of the clerks under the Clerk of this House. The Clerk himself is required to have this duty performed. He has had it done at each session, after the adjournment of Congress. And now this gentleman who has done the work, and who has a salary of $1,800, must have $360 a year more, (amounting in all to $4,000,) and in addition to that, the extra compensation of twenty per cent. upon that.

It seems to be disputed whether the amounts voted under these resolutions were paid or not. These gentlemen would not come up here squarely, and say out and out that they have got the money, and that Mr. Cullom can look to the Government for it. The Secretary of the Treasury and the accounting officer have refused to recognize these accounts. Here they are:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, June 30, 1857.

Sir: The Clerk of the House of Representatives submits in settlement of his accounts at your office the following vouchers:

House of Representatives, United States,

To WILLIAM CULLOM, DR.

For additional compensation for settling and adjusting the outstanding bills under the book resolution, found on file in the office, which belonged to my predecessor, $750.

March 7, 1857, received of William Cullom, Clerk of the House of Representatives, United States, $750 in full of the above account.

WILLIAM CULLOM.

Indorsed: Allowed.

B. B. THURSTON,
Chairman Committee of Accounts.

House of Representatives, United States,

To JOHN M. BARCLAY, DR.

For amount of compensation allowed by the resolution of the House of Representatives of March 3, 1857, $5,706 97.

March 30, 1857, received of William Cullom, Clerk of the House of Representatives, United States, $5,706 97, in full of the above account.

JOHN M. BARCLAY.

Indorsed: Allowed.

B. B. THURSTON,
Chairman Committee of Accounts.

House of Representatives, United States,

To JOHN M. BARCLAY, DR.

For clerical services on alphabetical index, during the Thirty-Third Congress, $250.

February 19, 1857, received of William Cullom, Clerk of the House of Representatives, United States, $250, in full of the above account.

JOHN M. BARCLAY.

Indorsed: Allowed.

B. B. THURSTON,
Chairman Committee of Accounts.

House of Representatives, United States,

To DANIEL BUCK, DR.

For collating, correcting, and preparing for publication the list of appropriations made, new offices created, &c., as required by the act of July 4, 1836, for the second session Twenty-Eighth Congress, first and second sessions Twenty-Ninth Congress, first and second sessions Thirtieth Congress, first and second sessions Thirty-First Congress, first and second sessions Thirty-Second Congress, first and second sessions Thirty-Third Congress, and third session Thirty-Fourth Congress, as authorized by the resolution of the House of Representatives of March 3, 1857, at $360 per session, $4,320.

March 31, 1857, received of William Cullom, Clerk of the House of Representatives, United States, $4,320, in full of the above account.

DANIEL BUCK.

Indorsed: Allowed.

B. B. THURSTON,
Chairman Committee of Accounts.

House of Representatives, United States,

To W. P. INGRAM, DR.

For services as clerk to Committee of Accounts of Thirty-Fourth Congress, $650.

March 31, 1857, received of William Cullom, Clerk of the House of Representatives, United States, $650 in full of the above account.

W. P. INGRAM.

Indorsed: Allowed.

B. B. THURSTON,
Chairman Committee of Accounts.

House of Representatives, United States,

To JOHN BAILEY, DR.

For compensation for additional services as clerk in the office of the House of Representatives, United States, twenty-five dollars a month from the 1st day of May, 1850, to June 30, 1853, being thirty-eight months, $950.

March 31, 1857, received of William Cullom, Clerk of the House of Representatives, United States, $950 in full of the above account.

JOHN BAILEY.

Indorsed: Allowed.

B. B. THURSTON,
Chairman Committee of Accounts.

House of Representatives, United States,

To J. C. WALKER, DR.

For this amount allowed as reading clerk, by resolution of the House of March 3, 1857, directing a sufficient sum to be paid out of the contingent fund to make regular annual salary for past services equal to the annual amount now received by the reading clerk of the Senate, (see statement annexed,) $1,748 67.

March 31, 1857, received of William Cullom, Clerk of the House of Representatives, United States, $1,748 67, in full of the above account.

J. C. WALKER.

Indorsed: Allowed.

B. B. THURSTON,
Chairman Committee of Accounts.

Then there is one to Mr. Galt for a balance of $609, and one to Mr. Tompkins for $378 46.

This one to Mr. Ingram does not come under these resolutions, but is based upon an allowance by the Committee of Accounts for services rendered as clerk of that committee. He was the chief clerk under the Clerk of this House, at a salary of $2,160, and this receipt is for $650, for services as clerk to the Committee of Accounts.

How do these papers come here in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury? They were presented at the First Auditor's office as vouchers, and registered there in order to enable the Clerk to make requisitions for the money; and I learn at the First Auditor's office that these accounts or receipts are not always indorsed as allowed by the Committee of Accounts, but that the receipts are always audited and signed before they are presented there. How it was with these particular receipts I cannot say.

Mr. LETCHER. If the gentleman will allow me, I will furnish him with the papers, so that he can say.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I do not want them now. I understand that the Clerk presents them at the First Auditor's office, they are registered, and then other requisitions are allowed at the First Comptroller's office; but they are frequently presented there with the receipt allowed before they are indorsed by the chairman of the Committee of Accounts. But here are some of these accounts, Mr. Chairman, which are re-ceipted on the 31st day of March, 1857. The indorsement of the chairman of the Committee of Accounts, Mr. Thurston, is below that date, and nearly one month after his term of office as a member of the House had expired, and of course after the committee ceased to exist.

Mr. LETCHER. Just at this point will the gentleman allow me to say how this indorsement is made and the receipt prepared?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I have only two or three minutes left and my friend from Virginia will have an hour when this debate is closed, in which to reply to what is said in this debate. One thing I will say to him, and to this House, that if every other item in this bill met with my approbation I would not vote for the bill while the provision to which I refer is in it. When gentlemen put a bill in such shape that I cannot vote for the good without voting for the bad too, it may appear a small matter to others, but so far as I am concerned I cannot vote for the good if I must take with it something which I cannot vote for, unless with a violation of principle held by me to be sacred. The good must go with the bad, and the responsibility must be with those who present such an obnoxious measure to the House. This is the principle on which I legislate. If the House will establish these salaries, although I will not vote for any higher pay, yet I will vote for an appropriation under that law, when it is made. Until there is a law for it, of course I will vote against it. I say that this section based upon the resolutions which I have read is in violation of law, without authority or sanction from the statute-book. I should like to speak, Mr. Chairman, of the other resolutions intended to be covered, and which will be covered, by this third section, if it passes Congress. It will give back pay; it will give extra pay, and not only under one resolution, and to one individual, but to many individuals, under various resolutions, giving them gratuities of thousands, and then the general resolutions will come in to give them twenty per cent. additional upon their regular compensation.

This resolution will give to your clerk $720, I believe, being twenty per cent. upon his salary of $3,600. Under that resolution, sir, however, I do not understand that there has been one cent paid. Under that compensation resolution, up to a very recent date, there had certainly been no vouchers presented at the Treasury for extra compensation paid under it. Then, if there had been none paid, why should we, by a law, enact to give this extra compensation to the persons who are specified?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, with the appropriations contained in this bill, I propose to have very little to do, nor shall I examine so minutely as has the gentleman from Tennessee the question as to whether the various items embraced in it are deficiencies, or whether they are appropriations for the ordinary expenses of the current year. If they be necessary, Mr. Chairman, I am prepared to vote for them. If they be in discharge of liabilities contracted by the Government, under the authority of officers, having in charge the particular duties assigned to them, I certainly shall feel disposed to vote for them. Nor is it necessary, in the few remarks I shall make upon the question, that I shall enter into a discussion as to whether war exists in Utah; its kind, its character, or otherwise. I purpose to speak mainly upon a different branch of the question; and I have felt it incumbent upon me to take this peculiar line of policy from my connection with some of the accounts alluded to by the gentleman from Tennessee, and which are objected to so strenuously by him.

I find in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, on page 26, this language:

"In the settlement of the accounts of the Clerk of the House of Representatives by the accounting officers of the Treasury, a question arose as to the power of the two Houses of Congress over their respective contingent funds. Under resolutions passed by the House of Representatives, the Clerk had paid certain sums to different employes of the House for extra services rendered by them, and the question was presented to me whether he could be allowed credit for such payments in view of the provisions of the act of March 3, 1845, which was evidently intended to prevent the application of the contingent fund of the two Houses to such purposes. My opinion was, that the act of March 3, 1845, was still in force in this respect, and I accordingly held that the credits could not be allowed. The reasons for that opinion are so fully stated in my letter of June 30, 1857, to the First Auditor of the Treasury—a copy of which accompanies this report, marked eleven—that it is unnecessary again to discuss the question. In conformity to the suggestions of that letter, and for the reasons therein given, I recommend the passage of a law for the relief of the parties who have acted under the different construction placed upon the law by this Department."

Now, I wish gentlemen of this House to observe that these accounts, distinctly specified by the gentleman from Tennessee, are just as distinctly recommended to the favorable consideration of this House by the Secretary of the Treasury, as any other items contained in this deficiency bill; and he recommends that they be paid on the ground that the Clerk has paid certain of these amounts; and yet in the discussion of this question, constant assertions are made that no payments have been made whatever.

Mr. Chairman, the first account is an allowance by the Committee of Accounts to the former Clerk of this House. The second is an allowance to Mr. Barclay, the Journal clerk, under a resolution adopted by the House. The third is an allowance to Daniel Buck, founded upon a resolution of the House. The next is to W. P. Ingram, for services as clerk to the Committee of Accounts of the Thirty-Fourth Congress, $620. The next is to John Bailey, for compensation for additional services as clerk in the office of the House of Representatives. Next to J. C. Walker, an allowance by the resolution of the House. The next is an allowance to P. B. Tompkins, under a resolution of the House. Next an allowance to Thomas J. Galt, by the Committee of Accounts.

Now, sir, we are told that the Committee of Accounts has no authority to make any such allowance. I take issue with the gentleman from Tennessee as to their power. I contend, whatever the policy or expediency of any such step may be, that they have the power, and that it is given to them by the law of this House, to make these allowances; and I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that it is not an unusual thing at all to make these allowances; and I wish to call the attention of the gentleman having this bill in charge, to precedents in the past which prove that allowances, identical with these, have been uniformly made; and I wish to call the attention of the gentlemen who opposed those accounts, and who are now opposing this bill, to many precedents, in which they have also concurred. I find an allowance to A. J. Glossbrenner, of $500 extra, by the Committee of Accounts, when he was the disbursing and pay clerk under the Clerk of the House of Representatives, for services precisely similar to those for which Mr. Ingram was allowed extra pay by the late Committee of Accounts. This was, I believe, for the Twenty-Ninth Congress.

I find an allowance by the same committee to John Robb, resting on no other authority than the allowance of that committee; and I believe that, at that time, the present Secretary of the Treasury was a member of the Committee of Accounts, and was present and an acting member of that committee when the allowance was made. Here is another allowance in the Thirty-Second Congress to P. Barry Hays, and a similar allowance in the Thirty-Third Congress to William P. McKean, disbursing clerk under Colonel Forney.

I wish to direct the attention of gentlemen to the particular Congresses when these allowances were made, and then let gentlemen answer me this question: are these allowances, cited by the gentleman from Tennessee, so extraordinary in their character as he would have us believe?

Again, Mr. Chairman, in some remarks submitted by me on this question a few weeks ago, I said that the last House of Representatives had voted additional pay to persons where no question had been made upon it at the Treasury Department. The fact was admitted at the time. I alluded then, as I allude now, to the reporters for the Globe, our official paper, to whom additional pay was voted by this body, and paid. It was extra pay, as these are extras, though afterward included in an appropriation bill. But, Mr. Chairman, I believe that the Senate also voted additional compensation and pay to its employes; and when this question came up for discussion, I had the curiosity to address a note to the Secretary of the Senate to know what had been the fate of the allowances there, and I was informed by the chief clerk in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, that no question had been made as to the payment of additional pay to the employes, and that no notice of a disallowance of such claims had been received from the Treasury Department.

But now, Mr. Chairman, as to the power of the Committee of Accounts to make these allowances. I ask if it had not the power to do it? In your appropriation bills, and even in this deficiency bill, you have a head of "contingencies" for the House of Representatives. True, you point out what some of these contingencies are—so much for the binding department, so much for furniture for the Hall, and so forth; and then you have a miscellaneous item for each House. Your bill is passed, and signed by the President; and then here is a contingent fund placed absolutely at the disposal of each House of Congress. Now, I ask, how shall this contingent fund be distributed—under whose power and authority? The fund is placed by law within your control, and I ask where is the power for its disbursement, its regulation, and its control? Let any man turn to the 102d rule of the House, and he will find that it is the duty of the Committee of Accounts to superintend and control the expenditures of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives. And again, you will find by rule 152, that, in reference to articles furnished under this miscellaneous head, or under the other regular heads of appropriation, the Clerk of the House disburses this fund for this House, under the control and direction of the Committee of Accounts. Now, you have appropriated the money by law; and you placed it—where? In the hands of the Clerk of the House and under the control of the Committee of Accounts.

I think I have shown that these allowances by the committee were not a new idea. I think I have shown that gentlemen who are opposing them here have, in the past, been somewhat identified therewith. Let me ask them if they have only just now discovered that the accounts are all illegal and cannot be allowed; and if so, why have they slept so long over these abuses? Why did they not find them out before?

Let me take another view of this question. I said some time ago that I believed I had voted for some of these extra twenty per cent. resolutions, and against some. I have been investigating that fact, and I do not know how the matter stands; for I believe it has been almost impossible at any time to get the yeas and nays on most of these propositions. But, sir, what is shown by this very fact that there is no record by which the vote of members can be traced on these questions? Is it not the natural and almost irresistible conclusion that, while men may have prejudices against these propositions, when they are brought up they are willing to sit here dumb and see them pass.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. NICHOLS. I will do the gentleman justice, for I think I anticipate his question.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. My question is this: whether there is an occasion on record when one of these resolutions passed the House which was not resisted, and when the yeas and nays were not called for?

Mr. NICHOLS. I would have done the gentleman justice without his question. I would have said that, as for himself, I believe he has always resisted them, and has always demanded to have the vote upon them put on the record. I believe that to have been the case in respect to this twenty per cent. resolution. But how many times have these propositions passed this body? In the Twenty-Ninth Congress extra compensation was provided for in the general appropriation act which passed August 10, 1846. It was provided for in the second session of that Congress in the appropriation act of 3d March, 1847. So also in the Thirty-First, the Thirty-Second, and the Thirty-Fourth Congresses. But now, Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of the Treasury has discovered an obstacle and barrier against the payment of the allowances made by the last House of Representatives, in the law of 1845. That is the strong point made in the Secretary's argument against the allowance of these claims. He says in reference to this, in one portion of this document, that, if he could have been satisfied that this question had undergone a full, complete, and thorough investigation in his Department, he would have been disposed to have deliberated much longer on the conclusion at which he had arrived. The Secretary of the Treasury could not have been ignorant of the fact that that very identical question made by him was made in the Treasury Department before that. I hold in my hand an argument of Mr. Whittlesey, the First Comptroller of the Treasury, on that question. We see by the report which he made to this House, February 2, 1857, and which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, that that precise question was raised; and he says that the law of 1845, a limitation in an appropriation bill, must be, and so it was construed by him, to have expired with the bill, because Congress and the Department had never regarded it after the expiration of the fiscal year.

But there are some other things which I wish to bring to the attention of the House, for I think we ought to have fair play about these matters. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] especially to this case. I understand his objection to the resolutions for the benefit of Messrs. Barclay and Walker, to apply to their uncertainty, to their not stating the aggregate amounts to be given to these gentlemen. I understand that to be one of his objections, and the other is that these officers had pay enough before the resolutions were adopted. Now, I will take the last objection first. If the House had the power to vote these sums to these gentlemen out of its contingent fund, then it is res adjudicata; for a former House has judged as to the propriety of the amount they should receive, and has voted it to them while they were its employes. If they had the power to do so, the action of the members of that House was final.

I come now to the other objection. I wish to give the gentleman a case that occurred here in the last Congress, and I do not allude to it because in the particular case I believe or mean to contend that any injustice was done; but I allude to it for the purpose of showing the gentleman that all of us sometimes commit these solecisms in legislation which any one can object to and cavil at who sees fit to do so. If gentlemen will turn to the Congressional Globe, first session Thirty-Fourth Congress, page 2153, they will find in the proceedings of the Senate that this amendment was offered to the miscellaneous appropriation bill:

"Mr. BROWN. I have an amendment which does not come from a committee, but as it concerns one of the employes of the two Houses of Congress, and relates to a subject of great importance, I suppose it is admissible.

"And be it further enacted, That there shall be paid to John C. Rives by the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, out of the contingent funds of the two Houses, according to the number of copies of the Congressional Globe and Appendix taken by each, one cent for every five pages of the work whenever it shall exceed three thousand pages for the long session or one thousand five hundred pages for a short one, including the indexes and the laws of the United States, commencing with this session."

That amendment was agreed to in the Senate. The bill came back here at a very late hour; all the amendments were disagreed to in gross, without being read, and referred to a committee of conference. Well, the amendment came back into this House; it was referred to simply by its number, and was agreed to. I never saw it in the original bill. I do not know how many members of this House saw it or heard of it, until at the next session the Committee of Ways and Means recommended an appropriation to satisfy the demand created under it. I will admit that that provision was included in a bill, and that it did not rest upon a simple resolution of the House. I allude to it simply for the purpose of showing the character of this kind of appropriation, and of showing, also, that the provisions contained in the resolutions for Barclay, and Walker, and Buck, are not so extraordinary in their character as might be supposed from the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee. When this amendment was introduced into the Senate, the distinguished Senator from Illinois thought that the Senator from Mississippi had made a slight mistake, and meant to give five cents for each page, instead of one cent for every five pages; but the Senator from Mississippi understood the effect of his amendment. The amount of money which has been paid under that amendment was at the first session of the Thirty-Fourth Congress, for the House, $11,174 69, and for the Senate $10,263 48; and for the third session, for the House $1,488 87, and for the Senate $1,476 10, making an aggregate of $24,394 97.

Mr. LETCHER. How comes it that there is a difference in amount between the Senate and the House?

Mr. NICHOLS. Perhaps it was caused by the discrepancy in the number of copies taken by the two Houses. But, Mr. Chairman, at the next session of Congress, we were called upon to vote money to pay that bill, and then the attention of gentlemen was drawn to the amendment. I do not say that the amount of money was erroneously granted, but I object to the principle of the amendment. I read from the Congressional Globe, page 800:

"The next amendment was read as follows:

"To enable the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay to John C. Rives the additional compensation for the Congressional Globe and Appendix, provided for in the sixteenth section of the act making appropriations for certain civil expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1857, $11,174 69.

"Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I believe, sir, the original price of this work was three dollars for the Globe for the long session, and three dollars for the Appendix, and a less price for the short session. At the time that that price was fixed, it was usual for the Congressional Globe to make, at the long session, some three thousand pages; and at the price then paid the cost was about one cent for five pages. Of late years, more speeches have been made, the proceedings have been augmented, fuller reports have been made, and the volumes have been largely increased. The provision which the gentleman from Ohio has read—the sixteenth section of that act—is to give the publisher of this work the same proportional allowance for the excess of three thousand pages for the long session, and of fifteen hundred pages for the short session.

"I believe those are the facts of the case. A provision for this allowance was made by Congress at the close of last session, and I suppose there was no appropriation made to pay what would become due under it at this session. It is to pay one cent for each five pages of the Congressional Globe and Appendix exceeding three thousand pages at the last session, and the same for each five pages this session, over and above fifteen hundred pages.

"The question was then taken, and the amendment agreed to."

It will be seen, sir, that the reason assigned by the gentleman from Tennessee for this appropriation would extend to the claims or accounts of the gentlemen who have been designated in the resolution of the House. If you look to the Journal of the House, you will find that the duties of the Journal clerk have been increasing, and that the size of the volume is growing larger year by year. The duties of those who fill these positions in this House increase, and must increase, with the legislation and the growth of the country; and, sir, the argument of the gentleman from Tennessee in support of this appropriation is support sufficient for the money voted under these resolutions.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Do I understand the gentleman to say that that provision, allowing one cent for every five pages beyond fifteen hundred for a short and three thousand for a long session, went back and proposed this addition for Congressional Globes and Appendixes delivered and paid for, before it was passed into law?

Mr. NICHOLS. I do not mean to be understood as saying any such thing.*

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I can say that I do not know of any such thing; and all I said in what the gentleman quotes from my speech, was in the way of explanation of an appropriation.

Mr. NICHOLS. I allude to this, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of elucidating a principle. I have not said, nor do I intend to, in this discussion, that there was anything wrong in the money voted to the proprietor of the Globe, that he got a cent more than he ought to; but I say that the argument which bases a claim—ay, sir, a claim for additional compensation in this case, may well apply to that of any other employé who is brought within the rule laid down, an increase of service performed.

Mr. Chairman, let me direct the gentleman's attention to another case which occurred in the Thirty-Third Congress. I find that at the first session of that Congress a Mr. Witte introduced a resolution in these terms: that the Clerk of the House be directed to pay Thomas J. Galt, superintendent of the folding-room, the same compensation that is now paid to the librarian of the House; to commence on the first day of July, 1853. On the same day I find that an additional resolution was passed in favor of S. H. Lamborn. Both of them were retrospective in their operation. This was a matter of discussion by the gentlemen of the last House of Representatives. The gentleman from Tennessee participated in the discussion, and so did the member from Georgia, [Mr. Cobb,] who is now Secretary of the Treasury. These resolutions were retrospective in their operation; and Mr. Cobb, in debate, justified some resolution as standing upon the same ground, and referring to these as precedents. The gentleman from Tennessee said that these resolutions did not provide for the usual extra compensation, but made a permanent increase of salary to these two superintendents, nor had either of them received the twenty per cent. provided by the joint resolution of July 30, 1854, and therefore did not conflict with its provisions. Now, the fact is, that these parties did receive the twenty per cent. Resolutions to increase their salaries, retrospective in their action, were passed by the House, and the gentleman from Tennessee, in the discussion of this subject at the last session, placed his justification of them upon the precise ground that they made a permanent increase of salary. Upon what other ground do the resolutions for Mr. Barclay and Mr. Buck stand? There is precedent for them, at all events, and precedent against the gentleman's position that payment ought not to be made.

Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand the Journal of the last House. These resolutions were passed by the House, and gentlemen who were then present recollect that they were fairly introduced, voted on, and passed. I am informed by parties interested in these resolutions, that they have been paid. If they have not even yet, I regard that the action of the House establishes a claim in their favor for the money which the previous House adjudged then due. I trust that if we are to get rid of a bad precedent, if we are to get rid of a bad system, we will do it by some mode of legislation which shall be understood in advance, and that one rule will not be applied at one time for a certain state of things, and another rule at another time in the same state of things, only when political changes have taken place.

I hold in my hand several resolutions granting this extra compensation to the employés of past Congresses, and I will read them, with the names of their authors.

"On motion of Mr. COBB, [the present Secretary of the Treasury,]

"Resolved, That the Committee of Accounts be directed to settle the accounts of the late acting pay clerk, J. E. Millard, by allowing him compensation for so much time as he was actually in the service of the House in that capacity."—House Journal, second session Twenty-Ninth Congress, p. 518.

Under this resolution, back pay to the amount of $990 was paid to Mr. Millard, that being the difference between what he had received and what he was allowed by the resolution. (See Mis. Doc. 6, p. 77—1, 30.) This, it will be observed, was at the very next Congress to that at which the act of 1845 was passed.

Now, as the Secretary of the Treasury makes his strongest point against the payment of these claims under the law of 1845, and he, in his own Department, has been the officer who has adjudicated these cases, and referred them back to the House for relief to the parties interested, I beg leave to say that this resolution offered by him was at the first session of Congress after the act of 1845 was passed.

Again, here is another resolution:

"On motion of Mr. JACOB THOMPSON, [Secretary of the Interior,]

"Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the House, to James C. Walker, the same compensation annually which is paid to the assistant clerks of the House of Representatives."—House Journal, second session Thirty-First Congress, p. 430.

That resolution, too, was offered after the act of 1845 was passed.

The following resolution was adopted:

"On motion of Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, [Vice President,] "Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, to the Sergeant-at-Arms, Doorkeeper, and Postmaster, such sum, in addition to their present salary, as will make their compensations, respectively, equal to that of the chief clerk under the Clerk of the House, which is $1,800 per annum, commencing with the present Congress."—House Journal, first session Thirty-Second Congress, p. 1141.

This is another retrospective resolution resting upon the precise ground on which the claims suspended at the Treasury Department rest.

Mr. Chairman, my only object in desiring to say a word upon this section, was simply that, as a former member of the Committee of Accounts, I felt it incumbent on me to show first, that the action complained of at the Treasury Department was consistently followed under different political organizations, under differently constituted Houses from the last, consistently followed up to the time when my action became connected with this system.

I now say that I believe another thing in reference to these accounts. I believe that when a law places the contingent fund of the House under the control of the officers of the House, or within the disposal of each House rather, any order of this House relative to that contingent fund, directing its officers to do anything with reference to it, makes it incumbent upon that officer to execute the order, and he would be in contempt of the authority of the House should he not do so. Now, what has been done? Some of these payments have been undoubtedly made, and made by an officer who was executing your order. He asks protection for his action in the execution of your orders; and the Secretary of the Treasury recommends that he shall have that protection—the sanction of law for what has been done. That I believe to be right and proper under the circumstances. I believe the allowances of this committee, under the rule of the House, under the law of the House, constitute just as valid a claim against this Government as any other which I have cited from the past. And I claim for the acts of the last House—and I claim it from just and fair men upon all sides—that degree of favor and sanction which has been extended to the action of past Houses, and in reference to which no complaint has been made. This is all I have to say upon this subject.

[Addenda: Manual, page 82: A resolution for an allowance of money to the clerks being moved, it was objected to as not in order, and so ruled by the Chair; but in an appeal to the Senate (i. e., a call for their sense by the President, on account of doubt on his mind, according to rule 16,) the decision was overruled.—Sen. Journal, June 1, 1796. The compiler of the Manual says: "I presume the doubt was, whether an allowance of money could be made otherwise than by bill." So these practices are very ancient.]

Mr. LOVEJOY. For reasons which were satisfactory to them, but which were inexplicable to me, when I introduced a resolution the other day to inquire of the Secretary of War in reference to certain contracts, objections were made all around upon the part of the friends of the Administration, on the ground that it would prove prejudicial to the public service to have such an inquiry made, and to have it answered by an official statement. And, sir, it struck me as something very peculiar that a Democratic President had the power of ordering the Army and Navy anywhere he pleased, into Kansas or into Utah, and involve the nation in expenses to the amount of millions upon millions, and yet objection is made to an inquiry to know what is done with this money. I have witnessed, with a sense of humiliation and shame, the disposition upon the part of many, not only to defer with proper respect, but with apparent abject servitude, to an intimation of the Executive will, as though this House were acting the part of Caesar's or Napoleon's Senate, to register the decrees of a dictator.

I wish to call the attention of the House and of the country to the fact that the expenses of our Government in its War and Navy Departments are increasing with a rapidity that to me is appalling. Our expenses have, within a few years, gone up in magnitude from $3,000,000 to $19,000,000. Our expenses in 1850 and 1851 were $9,000,000, and in the years following, up to the present time, in round numbers, they were respectively, twelve, eight, nine, eleven, fourteen, sixteen, and nineteen million dollars. Thus our expenses are rolling up in geometrical progression, and where it is going to end no one can tell. What has been done with the money? Oh, that is none of our business. We have only to vote the appropriation, and let the Executive expend the money. And it is thought to be unpopular to say a word against anything asked for the Army. We must vote blindly upon everything connected with the military expenses of the Government. For one, if I understood the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] as I believe I did, I am much obliged to him for taking the position, and uttering the sentiments he did in regard to the Utah expedition. I believe his remarks were true, and I hope they will lose none of their influence by my approving of them. The expenses of the Army and Navy combined are more than all our other expenses; and yet it will be said that if they are necessary, we must submit. Well, I grant you that.

But there is a suggestion or two which I wish to make, and which the American people may, if they choose, reflect upon. I suppose that the Army is not good of itself; but it is good simply as a means to attain a desirable end—the protection of the citizen in his person and property. Whatever expenses are necessary to attain that end I am willing to vote always; for I believe that it is the paramount duty of the Government to protect its citizens anywhere and everywhere on the globe where they are called in their lawful pursuits. But I am not willing to vote money blindly for the Army, simply on the pretense of its being for the protection of the citizen. I am not satisfied that responsible parties cannot be found in this country to undertake to protect our transportation from here to Utah, over the mountains, at one tithe of the expenditure which we make for the Army. If that be so, it is certainly a more desirable way of doing it. And I undertake, also, to say that, for one tithe of what we have to pay for our Army for protecting us against the invasions and massacres of the savages, responsible parties will undertake to guaranty the citizens against all of these invasions.

Mr. LETCHER. Does the gentleman propose to let out the fighting by contract?

Mr. LOVEJOY. Yes, at so much a scalp. If you want so many Mormons butchered, why, let it out. In that way, however, the regular Army would get but very little pay. They never killed a brave yet, I believe; and the squaws whom they have scalped, they have caught around the seething cauldrons preparing their dinner. Yes, sir, I propose to give out the job to responsible parties as the best means of securing the end, and a much cheaper way than the one we now adopt. At any rate, I suggest it. I do not know that, because we have heretofore protected our frontiers in one particular mode, we are bound to protect them always in that way. I do not know that we are bound to go to the mill with the wheat in one end of the bag and a stone in the other, simply because our grandfathers did so; and if I found that the cheapest way of protecting our citizens against the inroads of the savages was by contract, I am content to adopt that mode. I do not know certainly that we could do so; but gentlemen in the other end of the Capitol, who perfectly understand the habits of the savages, have declared that for one tithe the expenses of the Army in the protection of our frontiers against the savages, they could be protected in other modes—and I believe it.

I want now, for a single moment to call the attention of the House and of the country to a fact which I find here in these estimates; and that is, that according to Mr. Holt, we pay for agriculture $69,650; and that I find in another place, we pay the Indian agents and superintendents $89,000. Now, how many of these agents are honorable men, I do not know. How many of them cheat the Indians out of their annuities, and teach them to get drunk, I do not know. I do not doubt there are some of both classes. But I know this: that we pay more for these agents and sub-agents to take care of Indians than we do for the immense interests of agriculture throughout this agricultural country.

But, sir, the chief object that I had in addressing the committee this morning, was to draw the attention of the committee to these contracts that are made. And here, we have to take what we can glean from newspapers and statements of individuals, as objection was made to the resolution of inquiry which was introduced. Now I have it from one of the contractors, that he receives ninety-eight cents a bushel for corn, to be delivered in St. Louis; that he had contracted to deliver fifty thousand bushels, and all required during the war, at that rate. I had a paper here the other day—the St. Louis Republican—where the quotations of corn were made at from thirty to thirty-three cents per bushel; and any one that can subtract thirty to thirty-three cents from ninety-eight cents, can tell the profit this contractor will have without his advancing a single dollar. I want the farmers of Illinois to know that while it is difficult for them to sell their corn at from twenty to twenty-five cents per bushel, the Government is paying its favorite pet contractors ninety-eight cents per bushel in St. Louis, who buy it for thirty or forty cents; and I want them to understand that it is shrewdly suspected that all these contracts have an intimate relation with party politics.

Mr. PHELPS. Will the gentleman from Illinois inform this committee the name of that contractor; where he is to deliver that corn, and what kind of corn it is?

Mr. LOVEJOY. I will inform the gentleman all about it if he will let the resolution of inquiry pass, and let us get the official statement.

Mr. PHELPS. Will the gentleman give me the name of the contractor?

Mr. LOVEJOY. Does the gentleman deny that what I stated is the fact?

Mr. PHELPS. I do not deny anything. I desire to have the same means of information that the gentleman from Illinois has.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I stated that which I understand to be the fact. I cannot state positively that such is the fact, because I had no official means of knowing.

Mr. PHELPS. I desire the gentleman from Illinois, as he says it is shrewdly suspected that these contracts have some intimate connection with political affairs, to be so good as to tell me the politics of this contractor who gave him this information, and whether he does not cooperate with himself and his party?

Mr. GILMAN. I should like to ask the gentleman from Missouri whether or not the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois is true?

Mr. PHELPS. I cannot say. I desire to know who this contractor is, in order that I may ascertain something in respect to it. The gentleman from Illinois has done something more than cite rumor here; for, if I understood him correctly, he stated that this gentleman had informed him that he had a contract for the delivery of corn at ninety-eight cents per bushel. Now, I desire to know the name of that contractor, and his politics.

Mr. LOVEJOY. When we can get the information, then we can tell; but till then we have to rely upon these other sources.

Mr. PHELPS. Did I misunderstand the gentleman from Illinois? I understood him to state that a gentleman had informed him that he himself had a contract for the delivery of corn, at ninety-eight cents a bushel. Now, I desire to know who is that informant, and then I shall be able to ascertain something about it.

Mr. LOVEJOY. The gentleman does not deny the fact.

Mr. PHELPS. I neither deny nor admit it, because I know nothing about it.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Well, I affirm it. Now, if the gentleman wants to disprove it, let him do so. [Laughter.]

Mr. FAULKNER. Will the gentleman allow me to say a word?

Mr. LOVEJOY. Well, what about?

Mr. FAULKNER. If the gentleman desires to have any information upon this subject, perhaps I can give him some.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Ah! well, I tried to get information once.

Mr. FAULKNER. I pronounce the whole statement without any foundation, and untrue.

Mr. STANTON. I would like to inquire why objection was made on that side of the House to the resolution calling for information?

Mr. FAULKNER. There was no objection certainly from this side of the House.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Yes, there was.

Mr. FAULKNER. I believe the objection was made by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD.]

Mr. LOVEJOY. Well, was not that on that side of the House?

Mr. FAULKNER. No, sir.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Literally speaking, it was not; but politically, it was.

Mr. FAULKNER. I assure the gentleman that there is no objection on this side to any call which he may make.

Mr. PHELPS. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Well, what is it?

Mr. PHELPS. I desire to make a little further inquiry of the gentleman in relation to the statement which he has made. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] denies the truth of the assertion. Now, let us have the name of the witness.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Missouri, what the politics of General Reed, of his own State, are?

Mr. PHELPS. General Reed, of Missouri, if the gentleman refers to him, is a Democrat, and has no contract for the delivery of corn with any officer of the Government.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I am coming to horses pretty soon.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I propose to ask the gentleman further, if he is aware that General Reed has a large contract for the delivery of horses at an exorbitant price?

Mr. PHELPS. No, sir; on the contrary, I am informed that he has no such contract.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I wish also to know if he is aware of the fact that General Reed is the man who headed a large body of border-ruffians from Missouri in a foray into Kansas?

A MEMBER. "Bleeding Kansas" again!

Mr. PHELPS. In reply to the inquiry of the gentleman, I have to state that I am not aware that General Reed, of Missouri, has a contract for the delivery of horses or of corn; but on the contrary, I am informed he has no contract of either description.

So far as relates to the politics of General Reed, I will state that he is a Democrat and a gentleman, and possibly during the disturbances which took place in Kansas, he was in the Territory; and if the gentleman means by leading border-ruffians that he headed gentlemen of respectability residing in the Territory of Kansas or in Missouri, I am ready to admit that he did. [Laughter on the Republican side of the House.]

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I would like the gentleman from Missouri, if he can do so, to name a man who has got a Government contract who is not a Democrat?

Mr. PHELPS. Oh! I know nothing about the contracts which have been made. I know nothing about any contract which may have been made for the delivery of corn. If the gentleman refers to the contractors who are engaged in the transportation of Government stores—though that matter has not been brought up here—I can state that one of the members of the firm of Russell, Majors, & Waddell, is, I believe, an American, and another is an old line Whig.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What is the other? There are three of them.

Mr. PHELPS. I believe he is a Democrat.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I would like to ask the gentleman what the politics of this American and old line Whig are connected with Kansas? How are they on Lecompton?

Mr. PHELPS. I presume the gentleman who represents them upon this floor has given a vote in accordance with their wishes on that question.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I return to the point that, upon information which I had no doubt was reliable, I stated that corn was to be delivered in St. Louis at ninety-eight cents a bushel. Some say that it is to be delivered in Leavenworth at that rate. I am not apprised exactly how much it will cost to transport corn from St. Louis to Leavenworth. But if the corn is to be delivered at Leavenworth, there is a clear margin of half a dollar on every bushel of corn, and that, too, while the whole country is suffering, and while we are running in debt and borrowing money to pay our expenses.

If I am correctly informed, as I believe I am, that these contractors are to have ninety-eight cents a bushel for corn delivered at St. Louis or Leavenworth, they make a clear fifty cents on every bushel, and that, on fifty thousand bushels, is $25,000. Horses—small horses, fifteen hands high—are to be delivered for $159 50 apiece. The contract for horses, I am told, has been made with a stage proprietor, and a very fine opportunity it will be to take all the spavined and ring-boned horses from the line and get $159 50 apiece for them; when good, sound horses of that size, at present prices, would not cost more than half, or three fourths of that sum. I do not know how many horses there are to be. Some say fifteen hundred and some fifteen thousand.

Mr. FAULKNER. I know the gentleman does not wish to misrepresent this matter, and I will state to him, upon information of a reliable character, that there was a proposition made to deliver corn at Fort Leavenworth at ninety cents a bushel, which was rejected; and that whatever corn has been purchased at St. Louis, has not cost the Government more than from fifty-one to fifty-five cents. If deliverable at Fort Leavenworth, it might cost seventy or eighty cents a bushel. The gentleman will bear this in mind, that the corn wanted for the Utah expedition is the corn of 1856. They have to make that distinction in the corn to be transported such an immense distance, because the corn of 1856 is sound, and the corn of 1857 has been affected by the frost. And the price of the corn of 1856 may be somewhat higher than that of the corn of 1857. But in every instance they have purchased it for the lowest price for which it could be obtained in the market.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Whether that has been rejected or not I do not know. I think the gentleman is mistaken. I understand from General Jesup that this contract for horses has been completed. I know that it is written back that these parties have obtained this contract, and that the next best thing you can do is to get them out of it. The supposition about a bad bargain, and all that sort of thing, is understood. They get nearly double what they ought in the first place, they then say that they are ruined, and ask for a deficiency bill to make up their losses. The gentleman does not deny, as I understand, that this is the contract for horses: $159 each for horses fifteen hands high, a class of horses which can be bought for seventy-five or a hundred dollars. How many are there? Whether fifteen hundred or fifteen thousand I cannot say.

Mr. Chairman, the beef is in proportion, at a price of six and a half and eleven and a half cents in gross, which amounts to thirteen and twenty-three cents in the quarter.

In regard to the transportation item, I will not detain the committee long. I wish only to get out the facts. The contractors get so much for transporting beef, flour, &c., to be delivered in Utah. The contract is, as I understand it, that if, in doing so, a descent is made upon the trains by the Indians or Mormons, and the teams, &c., are destroyed, then the Government insures that the loss will be made good, as if the army stores had been transported to their destination. Suppose they agreed to pay ten or twenty dollars for the transportation of a barrel of flour from St. Louis to Utah, and that, one hundred miles outside of the former place, the Indians came down upon them, and destroyed the teams and flour, then the contractors would get compensation for their teams, &c., and also pay for transportation as if it had been carried through. How much it would take to get up a band of Indians to do that I do not know—perhaps not half the profits of the contractors. This is an imputation on the contractors. I do not know anything about them, but I do not suppose that they are without some human nature. I know that if they get a contract under this Administration, it is presumptive evidence against them. I know that this is a loose way in which to make a contract—to agree absolutely to pay for carrying a barrel of flour to Utah when it is not carried there; and, besides that, to insure payment for wagons, horses, &c., which may be destroyed by the Indians or Mormons on the route. This, I am told, is the condition of these contracts, and I wish this to go to the country as a part of the history of this Administration.

By the way, Mr. Chairman, it occurs to me that, when history comes to trace the record of this Administration and of the Utah war, it will be put down as the war of the plunderers and contractors, instead of the Utah war. I have yet to learn the point of collision between the Mormons and the United States. As I understand it, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] is correct. Say to the Mormons, do so and so; pass a law that they shall not practice polygamy; but do not enforce a thing which has not been enacted into law. This same Brigham Young has been the Governor of Utah during two or three Administrations, and it is not fair to butcher the masses of the people there, because they are polygamists, when you have winked at it so long. Pass a law; tell them what you wish; do this distinctly; and, if they refuse to obey, then if you want men and money to enforce the law, I will vote for them. But I will not vote money into the hands of these contractors and jobbers, who, perhaps, send us these horrid accounts of the Mormons, that the war may go on and they secure more fat jobs; for fat jobs may be let out when votes are valuable.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I rise for the purpose of propounding an interrogatory. I want to know whether the gentleman has any evidence on which to predicate the statement he has made against the War Department? Are there such cases as he describes? If there are, I should like to know them. If he has specific information on the subject, I should be glad to hear it. I am willing to vote to put down any atrocities that may exist. I would be glad to know whether the gentleman has accurate information for these grave accusations against the Government. I do not think that a member will make grave charges against officers of the Government, unless there is some foundation for them. Is there any foundation for these charges, or are they only the rehash of some newspaper editorials? If impositions on the Government can be shown, then I will be as ready as anybody to oppose them. Is it belief with the gentleman, or is it founded on fact?

Mr. LOVEJOY. It may be that I have obtained it in conversation, and that I do not feel at liberty to make it public. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. With the gentleman's permission, I will put a question.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I have but little more to say. If there are any incorrect charges, let the official statement from the War Department come to the House, and show their incorrectness. I confess that I am not familiar with these things. The usual way I understand is, to make the contracts through the quartermaster; and that now, for what reason I cannot say, they are made without advertisements for proposals, made by the Secretary of War, and not by the quartermaster. Perhaps, because there is too much of the old Roman about him.

Mr. PHELPS. I understand the gentleman from Illinois to declare that contracts have been made, and not let, after public advertisement, to the lowest bidder. I have nothing now to say about the contracts for corn and horses, for upon them I am not advised; but if the gentleman includes in that description of contracts made between the Government and individuals, the contract for the transportation of supplies from Fort Leavenworth to Utah, I will inform him that the quartermaster did invite proposals for that service, to be made to the quartermaster at Fort Leavenworth in the month of September last, and the only bids submitted were by the gentlemen who now have the contract; and furthermore, with reference to those gentlemen, I remark that they were the contractors—two, if not all of them—for the transportation of supplies for the Army during a portion of Mr. Fillmore's administration, and Mr. Pierce's administration, and to every administration and to every Secretary of War we have had, and to the Quartermaster General also; they have given universal satisfaction, and no more faithful and honest contractors can be found.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. With the permission of the gentleman from Illinois, for the purpose of relieving the distinguished head of the quartermaster's department, I desire to say a word in explanation. I have not turned my attention to the general merits of this case, but I know something in regard to the mode of supplying horses for the service. I believe there is no general public contract for furnishing horses. I inquired into that matter, and was informed that for some years past it has been the practice of the Government, so far as the quartermaster's department is concerned under its present head, to assign to competent cavalry officers the duty of going to points where they can best accomplish that object and purchase such horses as the service requires, and that that particular supply for the Army is not obtained by contract given to the lowest or any other bidder. And I am informed that the supply of horses is thus more cheaply obtained, and a better article is purchased, than by any system of contract that has ever been devised.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Do I understand the gentleman to say that is the course which has been pursued in this instance?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is the mode pursued, I understand, to supply the present demand for that description of supplies.

Mr. LOVEJOY. How, then, is the price fixed at $159 50?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Because that is found to be the average price the Government has been compelled to give.

Mr. LOVEJOY. That was the usual mode pursued by the quartermaster, but I tell gentlemen this matter has been taken out of the hands of the quartermaster, and that he has nothing to do with it. It was done upon the ground that there was no present cash to pay with. When there is money, the quartermaster takes the money and proceeds in the mode indicated by the gentleman from Kentucky; but when there is no money, the Secretary of War makes the contract, and gets the supply by bids. That is the way this thing has been done, and the gentleman will find it to be so. They have been contracted for at $159 50 a head.

Mr. LETCHER. I would like to make an inquiry of the gentleman.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Certainly.

Mr. LETCHER. Did I understand the gentleman to say that he obtained his information from General Jesup?

Mr. LOVEJOY. I understood him to say so. I do not know that I can add anything more to the remarks I have made. I had thought of saying something about voting deficiencies, and of voting future deficiencies in advance—which is but a mode of inviting deficiencies—but I believe that has been discussed upon the other side of the House, and I will leave it where it is. I wished these facts to go to the country, as I understand them to be facts.

Mr. STANTON. I wish to direct the attention of the gentleman who represents the Committee of Ways and Means on this bill, to one item in it, in reference to transportation.

Mr. HOUSTON. With the permission of the gentleman from Ohio, I desire to know of the committee whether this debate cannot be extended until to-morrow evening? It is a matter of interest and importance, and ought to be discussed.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee has not control of that matter.

Mr. HOUSTON. By general consent, it could be extended until to-morrow evening.

Mr. STANTON. I agree with the gentleman, but I do not see the occasion of raising the question at this moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state to the gentleman and to the committee, that, in his opinion, the committee could not extend the debate.

Mr. HOUSTON. Except by general consent.

The CHAIRMAN. Not even by general consent.

Mr. STANTON. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman who represents the Ways and Means, to one item in the bill. It is such an unheard-of deficiency in an appropriation bill that I think it demands careful scrutiny and investigation. It is contained in the following clause of the bill:

"For transportation of the Army, including the baggage of the troops when moving either by land or water; of clothing, camp, and garrison equipage from the depot at Philadelphia to the several posts and Army depots; horse equipments and of subsistence from the places of purchase and from the places of delivery under contract, to such places as the circumstances of the service may require it to be sent; of ordnance, ordnance stores, and small arms from the foundries and armories, to the arsenals, fortifications, frontier posts, and Army depots; freights, wharfage, tolls, and ferriages; for the purchase and hire of horses, mules, and oxen, and the purchase and repair of wagons, carts, drays, ships, and other sea-going vessels and boats for the transportation of supplies and for garrison purposes; for drayage and cartage at the several posts; hire of teamsters; transportation of funds for the pay and other disbursing departments; the expense of sailing public transports on the various rivers, the Gulf of Mexico, and the Atlantic and Pacific; and for procuring water at such posts as from their situation require that it be brought from a distance; and for clearing roads, and removing obstructions from roads, harbors, and rivers, to the extent which may be required for the actual operation of the troops on the frontier, $5,400,000.²²

Here is a deficiency for the current fiscal year of $5,400,000. Will the gentleman from Virginia be good enough to inform me which was the original appropriation for that item of expenditure?

Mr. LETCHER. I will inform the gentleman where he can get the whole information without inquiry. He will find that this transportation is anticipated twenty months ahead, and a portion of this amount will be deducted from the regular appropriation in the annual appropriation bill.

Mr. STANTON. That unquestionably is a sufficient reason for rejecting the item as a deficiency. Now, sir, I hold that this running the appropriations of one year into another, lapping them over backwards and forwards, results in a total destruction of all accountability. Here, as I remarked, is a deficiency of almost five and a half million dollars in the single item of Army transportation. Now I submit that this enormous amount is not the aggregate of that item of expense, but in addition to what was estimated for a year ago; and the estimate for that service falls short of the actual necessities of the Department five and a half millions of dollars. I say, the very enormity of the deficiency ought to call for the most rigid investigation on the part of the House, to see that there has not been fraud. We ought to know the details of the expenditure. We ought to have the vouchers for it, so far as it has been made. We ought to have the contracts on which these estimates of deficiency are based. And when rumors of fraud are floating about in newspapers and among individuals, and when a resolution cannot be got through here to inquire into them, we ought to know what are the foundations for these things.

I must be permitted to say, sir, that when I am told that such a sum as $100,000, or $50,000 is wanted for this, that, or the other matter, and the expenditure seems to be enormous, it is the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means to ascertain what the nature of the contract is, what prices are paid, what amounts are required, and all about them. We ought not to rest with the general statement that so much is wanted for such a purpose, and so much for another. We ought to know whether the appropriation is necessary or not, and we cannot ascertain whether there is fraud, or whether there are two prices paid for everything, whether the expenditure is fair and honest, and legitimate, unless the committee inform us.

Expenditures of an ordinary character, deficiencies of a small amount, it may be safe enough to pass in this way, with the general information that so much is needed; but in regard to a deficiency of so much magnitude as this, we ought not to rest satisfied with that general information. We ought to know what it is for, and how it is to be expended, and I submit that the Committee of Ways and Means ought to tell us this. If corn, that can be had at thirty-five cents a bushel, is purchased at ninety-eight cents a bushel, the Committee of Ways and Means ought to know and to inform us of it. If horses are purchased at $159 a head, we ought to know it, and to know whether this appropriation is required for the payment of these prices.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is not enough for a gentleman to get up here and say that, according to his information, extravagant prices are paid; it is not enough for the gentleman from Virginia to say that that is not sufficient, and that men ought not to make such charges here without foundation. My point is this, that we have a right to look to the Committee of Ways and Means, which asks us to make this appropriation, for information as to whether these charges are true or not, whether this expenditure is legitimate and reasonable and economical or not. It is the duty of the organs of the House that represent the Executive Departments here, to give us the information asked for, instead of arraigning members for making charges without sufficient foundation. I do not know whether those charges made in the newspapers, and referred to by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOVEJOY], are true or not; but I say that it is the duty of the committee having the matter in charge to give us the information, and tell us whether they are true or not; and when a resolution calling for that information cannot be got through the House, I will not vote for the bill till I know the truth of the facts alleged.

Mr. PHELPS. I understood the gentleman from Illinois to assert that the expenditures for the Army had been increased, in four or five years, from $9,000,000 to $19,000,000, and that that was about the case with the expenditures for the Navy Department. I desire to call his attention to the public documents to show that all of these expenditures, made under the direction of the Secretary of War, are not for the support and maintenance of the Army. A portion of them—nearly two million dollars—have been expended in the erection of fortifications for the military defense of the country. And a portion of them are connected with the construction of the very building that we now occupy, of the public buildings of the city of Washington, and of the aqueduct that is being constructed for the purpose of supplying the people of this District with water—the expenditure for these works being under the direction of the Secretary of War, and amounting to more than $2,000,000.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I made the assertion on the authority of the statement of receipts, expenditures, and appropriations of the United States, which is a printed document of the Thirty-Fifth Congress.

Mr. PHELPS. That only exhibits the amount expended under the direction of the War Department; not the amount expended for the support and maintenance of the Army.

Mr. LOVEJOY. It is for the military service.

Mr. PHELPS. So far as fortifications are concerned, the expenditures for them are made under the direction of the Secretary of War; yet they cannot be said to be for the maintenance and support of the Army. So with the heavy expenditures for ordnance supplies. Therefore, this statement must be received with a discount of four or five millions; so that the amount of money expended during the last year for the support and maintenance of the Army, was not more than $15,000,000. I merely desired to call the attention of the committee to this misstatement on the part of the gentleman from Illinois.

But that gentleman has also, on the ground of rumors, made some statements in regard to contracts said to have been made by the Secretary of War, or by the Quartermaster General, for supplies to be furnished to the Army during the residue of this fiscal year, and for the next fiscal year ending June 30, 1859.

I wish to correct the gentleman from Illinois about one contract only, because with regard to the other alleged contracts I am not advised on the subject. I had been aware of the existence of a contract with that firm in Missouri, which has been for years past engaged in transporting supplies for the Army. I know that that same firm had been employed in this manner under the administration of Mr. Fillmore, under the administration of General Pierce, and under this Administration, and it was expected that it would continue to be employed under this Administration during the continuance of this difficulty in Utah. And for this reason—that those gentlemen happen to perform the service cheaper than any other person would perform it—that they have the means to execute their contract, and because, for the last several years, every military officer who has come in contact with them, has borne testimony to the faithful and energetic manner in which they have discharged the duties devolved upon them, and because, when they are required, almost at a moment's notice, to fit out a heavy expedition of cattle and wagons and teamsters across the plains, they have fitted it out, regardless of the expense to themselves, in an incredibly short space of time.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD] was correct in his statement of the manner in which supplies for the quartermaster's department had been purchased. The wagons and animals necessary for transportation, and the horses for the mounted troops, have been procured by the quartermaster himself, purchased in open market when he could make the purchases, and when he could not make the purchases at the points where the supplies were needed for the public service, then he has sent men through the country who have purchased, on the best terms possible, the horses, mules, and cattle, needed in the quartermaster's department. That has been the practice of the Government for many years past.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STANTON] has remarked that he desires information upon this subject. If the gentleman had bestowed his attention upon some of the miscellaneous documents, he would have found there minute estimates of the expenditures which it was supposed would be incurred for the Utah expedition, and also for any additional troops that may have to be sent out to aid in suppressing any disturbance which may exist in that Territory.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOVEJOY] commented, as did the gentleman from Ohio, upon the prices alleged to be paid for horses. So far as I am informed in relation to the value of horses which would be serviceable for the dragoon and cavalry service of our country, I doubt very much whether any gentleman can make any money by the delivery of horses fitted for the service at Fort Leavenworth for the price alleged to have been paid—$159 50. I am not advised as to the price of horses in the States of Ohio and Illinois, but I know the price of horses in the section of country where I reside, and throughout the State of Missouri, where many of the horses for the use of the Government have been procured; and if the price of horses is the same now that it was last fall, then I am satisfied that if any person has made a contract for the delivery of horses to the quartermaster at Fort Leavenworth for $159 50, he must procure the horses elsewhere than in the State of Missouri, if he expects to make much money by his contract. I do not speak now of broken down horses, but of horses fit for the service; for all the horses delivered for the service of the Army have to be inspected by the quartermaster, and if, upon examination, they are not deemed serviceable, they are not accepted, nor does the Government pay for them. That has been the practice for years at all the military posts where animals are purchased for transportation, for the use of the mounted troops.

I am aware, Mr. Chairman, that the appropriations which are contained in this bill, for the support and maintenance of the Army, are very large. There has been no desire, on the part of the Committee of Ways and Means, to conceal from the House the magnitude of the sum which is required to be voted by the House, if they expect the military service of our country to be kept up and maintained, and if they expect that the troops now in Utah shall receive the supplies, and the men and munitions of war, necessary to enable them to maintain the honor of the country. A portion of these deficiencies are not for the present fiscal year; they are for the last preceding fiscal year; and this Congress could not have been called upon to vote for such heavy appropriations had it not been for the fitting out, and sending to the Territory of Utah, of a military expedition. Every member of the committee is aware of the circumstances under which that expedition was sent to Utah. It was not sent as a warlike expedition. You found that the civil officers of the Government, with the exception of Brigham Young, who is the head of the Mormon Church, and was acting as Governor until some time last fall, had been compelled to flee from the Territory, in consequence of the hostility manifested towards them by the Mormons. A quiet, unassuming gentleman, who may be seen any day upon the avenue in this city—a gentleman who had long been employed as draftsman to one of the committees of the Senate—had received the appointment of surveyor general of the Territory; he was a gentleman fully qualified to discharge the duties of that office. He went to Utah; and, in the discharge of his duty, made contracts with persons to survey the public lands in the Territory. His deputy surveyors, when they went into the field, were subjected to all kinds of annoyances at the hands of the Mormons; in some instances they were driven off; and it is believed that the Mormons incited the Indians to attack them; and, in those attacks, gentlemen attached to the small surveying parties were wounded, and, in some instances, one or two were killed. This gentleman, (the surveyor general,) who had nothing to do with political affairs; was compelled to leave the Territory, and to leave it precipitately. Mr. Hurt, an Indian agent, who had faithfully discharged the duties of his office, was pursued by a portion of the Danite band for the purpose of endeavoring to seize him, and, as it is believed, of killing him. He was a quiet, inoffensive man—not sympathizing, it is true, with the Mormons in their polygamous institutions, but abstaining from any expression of opinion calculated to excite their animosity towards him. Whilst attending to his duties, having collected a band of Indians about him who were engaged in the work of farming and endeavoring to sustain themselves, a portion of the Danite band came in pursuit of him; but, in consequence of the attachment of the Indians towards him, they warned him of the approach of danger, and accompanied him in his flight, providing him with the means of subsistence on the way, until he could reach the military force approaching Salt Lake City from the east. Every intention was manifested by the Mormons to defy the power of the United States, and drive from the Territory the civil officers of the Government. They declared their determination not to permit emigrants to pass through their Territory; and here it must be recollected that the great mass of the overland emigration to California and Oregon passes through Salt Lake valley. It is to be recollected that, for several years past, the bands of emigrants traveling through the Territory during the summer season have been subjected to a great deal of annoyance from the Mormons. In some instances their property has been forcibly taken from them, and they themselves have been seized upon and incarcerated, for no offense whatever, and without process of law. With all these acts of hostility manifested towards the citizens of the United States, I ask you whether it was not the bounden duty of the President of the United States to send a military force into the Territory of Utah, not for the purpose of making war upon the Mormons, but for the purpose of preventing them from perpetrating these outrageous acts upon peaceful and unoffending citizens who saw fit to travel through the Territory, and to prevent them from inciting the Indians to acts of hostility against the overland emigrants?

Mr. BURROUGHS. I would like to ask the gentleman whether the President, with all his army in Utah and in Kansas, ever brought a single murderer to justice?

Mr. PHELPS. I am not speaking of the operation of the army in Kansas. I know that when Colonel Steptoe, with his command, was in the Territory of Utah, men charged with the crime of murder were arrested, and handed over to the civil authorities, but where there is a grand jury composed of Mormons, and a petit jury composed of Mormons, and a gentile is to be tried, that gentile is bound to be convicted, and on the contrary, if a Mormon is to be tried, that Mormon is to be acquitted. For instance, take those who were indicted for the murder of Gunnison and his party. There are those who believe that Gunnison and his party were murdered by the Mormons, but I do not entertain that opinion, but believe they were murdered by the Indians. When the Indians were arrested and indicted for that murder, they were released by Brigham Young.

Mr. Chairman, these troops were sent to Utah not with a view to make war upon the people of that Territory, but to prevent the Indians from annoying the overland emigrants to California and Oregon. They were sent to establish a military post, to be occupied by the troops for the purpose of affording protection to the overland emigrants from the attacks of either the Indians or the Mormons themselves. They were sent there for still another purpose. They were sent there that the laws of the United States might be enforced.

In the annual report of the Secretary of War, the reasons which induced the Administration to send the expedition to Utah are stated. The Secretary says:

"This subject has very recently assumed so extraordinary and important an attitude, that I deem it proper to dwell upon it somewhat more at length than, under other circumstances, would have been required.

"The Territory of Utah is peopled almost exclusively by the religious sect known as Mormons. From the time their numbers reached a point sufficient to constitute a community capable of anything like independent action, this people have claimed the right to detach themselves from the binding obligations of the laws which governed the communities where they chanced to live. They have substituted for the laws of the land a theocracy, having for its head an individual whom they profess to believe a prophet of God. This prophet demands obedience, and receives it implicitly from his people, in virtue of what he assures them to be authority derived from revelations received by him from Heaven. Whenever he finds it convenient to exercise any special command, these opportune revelations of a higher law come to his aid. From his decrees there is no appeal; against his will there is no resistance. The general plan by which this system is perpetuated consists in calling into active play the very worst traits of the human character. Religious fanaticism, supported by imposture and fraud, is relied on to enslave the dull and ignorant; whilst the more crafty and less honest are held together by stimulating their selfishness and licensing their appetites and lusts. Running counter, as their tenets and practices do, to the cherished truths of Christian morality, it is not to be wondered at that, wherever these people have resided, discord and conflict with the legal authorities have steadily characterized their history.

"From the first hour they fixed themselves in that remote and almost inaccessible region of our territory, from which they are now sending defiance to the sovereign power, their whole plan has been to prepare for a successful secession from the authority of the United States and a permanent establishment of their own. They have practiced an exclusiveness unlike anything ever before known in a Christian country, and have inculcated a jealous distrust of all whose religious faith differed from their own; whom they characterize under the general denomination of Gentiles. They have filled their ranks and harems chiefly from the lowest classes of foreigners, although some parts of the United States have likewise contributed to their numbers. They are now formidable from their strength, and much more so from the remoteness of their position and the difficulty of traversing the country between their frontiers and Great Salt Lake. This Mormon brotherhood has scarcely preserved the semblance of obedience to the authority of the United States for some years past; not at all, indeed, except as it might confer some direct benefit upon themselves, or contribute to circulate public money in their community. Whenever it suited their temper or caprice, they have set the United States authority at defiance. Of late years, a well-grounded belief has prevailed that the Mormons were instigating the Indians to hostilities against our citizens, and were exciting amongst the Indian tribes a feeling of insubordination and discontent.

"I need not recite here the many instances in their conduct and history on which these general allegations are founded, especially the conduct they have adopted within the last twelve months towards the civil authorities of the United States.

"It has, nevertheless, always been the policy and desire of the Federal Government to avoid collision with this Mormon community. It has borne with the insubordination they have exhibited under circumstances when respect for their own authority has frequently counseled harsh measures of discipline. And this forbearance might still be prolonged, and the evils rise amongst them be allowed to work out their own cure, if this community occupied any other theater, isolated and remote from the seats of civilization, than the one they now possess. But, unfortunately for these views, their settlements lie in the great pathway which leads from our Atlantic States to the new and flourishing communities growing up upon our Pacific sea-board. They stand a lion in the path; not only themselves defying the military and civil authorities of the Government, but encouraging, if not exciting, the nomad savages who roam over the vast unoccupied regions of the continent to the pillage and massacre of peaceful and helpless emigrant families traversing the solitudes of the wilderness. The rapid settlement of our Pacific possessions; the rights in those regions of emigrants unable to afford the heavy expenses of transit by water and the isthmus; the facility and safety of military, commercial, political, and social intercommunication between our eastern and western populations and States, all depend upon the prompt, absolute, and thorough removal of a hostile power besetting this path midway of its route, at a point where succor and provisions should always be found, rather than obstruction, privation, and outrage. However anxiously the Government might desire to avoid a collision with this or any other community of people under its jurisdiction, yet it is not possible for it to postpone the duty of reducing to subordination a rebellious fraternity besetting one of the most important avenues of communication traversing its domain, and not only themselves defying its authority, but stimulating the irresponsible savages hovering along the highway to acts of violence indiscriminately upon all ages, sexes, and conditions of wayfarers.

"From all the circumstances surrounding this subject at the time, it was thought expedient during the past summer to send a body of troops to Utah with the civil officers recently appointed to that Territory. As the intention then was merely to establish these functionaries in the offices to which they had been commissioned, and to erect Utah into a geographical military department, the force then dispatched and now en route to the Territory was thought to be amply sufficient for those purposes. Supplies were abundant there, and the position was favorable for holding the Indians in check throughout the whole circumjacent region of country. It was hardly within the line of reasonable probability that these people would put themselves beyond the pale of reconciliation with the Government by acts of unprovoked, open, and wanton rebellion. It will be seen, however, from the documents accompanying this report, that flagrant acts of rebellion have been committed by them, in the face of positive assurances given them that the intention of the Government in sending troops into the military department of Utah was entirely pacific.

"Great care had been taken, in preparing for the march to Utah, that nothing should seem to excite apprehension of any action on the part of the army in the least conflicting with the fixed principles of our institutions, by which the military is strictly subordinate to the civil authority. The instructions to the commanding officer were deliberately considered and carefully drawn; and he was charged not to allow any conflict to take place between the troops and the people of the Territory, except only in case he should be called on by the Governor for soldiers to act as a posse comitatus in enforcing obedience to the laws.

"In conformity with this sentiment, and to assure these people of the real intention of the movement, an active discreet officer was sent in advance of the army to Utah, for the purpose of purchasing provisions for it, and of assuring the people of the Territory of the peaceful intentions of the Government. This duty was faithfully performed; the chief men of the fraternity were assured that no violence was intended towards them or any one, and that nothing could be further from the intention of the Government or the army than to molest any one for their religious opinions, however abhorrent they might be to the principles of Christian morality. This officer found, upon entering the Territory, that these deluded people had already, in advance of his arrival, or of any information, except as to the march of the column, determined to resist their approach, and prevent, if possible, and by force, the entrance of the army into the valley of Salt Lake. Supplies of every sort were refused him. The day after his departure from the city, on his way back, Brigham Young issued his proclamation, substantially declaring war against the United States, and, at the same time, putting the Territory under martial law. The facts connected with this mission of Captain Van Vliet will appear more in detail from his reports, herewith transmitted.

"In view of the menacing attitude of affairs in Utah, and of the importance of a prompt and thorough suppression of the spirit of rebellion reigning there, I must repeat my recommendation of five new regiments, which I am persuaded is the very smallest addition to the Army which the exigencies of the service will allow."

The expedition was a pacific, and not a hostile one.

Let me remark to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. STANTON,] and the other gentlemen who have referred to the magnitude of these proposed appropriations, that it was not anticipated, when the appropriations for the support of the Army were made at the last session of Congress, that this expedition would be fitted out against Utah. Let them examine the estimates which were submitted to the last Congress by the Secretary of War. Let them examine the executive documents, and they will not find any estimate submitted by which it was anticipated that this force would be sent to Utah during the past or present fiscal year. Hence the estimates which were submitted to Congress at its last session by the War Department, were submitted in the expectation that the Army would be stationed at the various military posts then occupied, and employed during the year in the manner they were then employed. Under such circumstances the appropriation made at the last Congress would have been ample and sufficient to satisfy every claim, excepting that arising from the transportation of the Army. That item was increased by the Indian disturbances in the two Territories of Washington and Oregon. Many of the troops were employed in suppressing these hostilities, and in this way the expenditures were increased beyond the amount appropriated.

Mr. Chairman, it must be recollected that the estimates for the appropriations for the Army are made at least eight months in advance of the expenditures. When this Congress assembled on the first Monday in December, the annual estimates of appropriations were printed, and laid upon the table of members; and of course they had been prepared by the Departments some time prior to that date. It must also be recollected that the estimates for the support of the Army are regulated much by the place and manner in which the Army shall be employed; and, by the casualties incident to the service, there can be no great accuracy in them. When the estimates for this fiscal year were made, who could foresee that a large part of our Army would be employed in Utah? And how could any one, unless gifted with prophecy, venture to submit estimates for service which it was not expected would be required?

Mr. LOVEJOY. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the expenses in the erection of the public buildings were included in that of the military service?

Mr. PHELPS. I stated this, that under the head of expenditures for the War Department you will find $2,100,000 for certain public buildings and public works in the District of Columbia.

Mr. LOVEJOY. The table from which I quoted said that the expenditures have run up from $9,000,000 to $19,000,000. As I understand, it does not include the expenditures in the erection of public buildings.

Mr. PHELPS. From what does the gentleman read?

Mr. LOVEJOY. It is a statement made to the Senate on the 4th of March, in answer to a resolution of the Senate. It is a general statement of the expenditures of the Government from 1789 up to the present time. In that table the miscellaneous expenditures, as the gentleman will observe, have ran up in equal proportion; that those for military services have increased from $9,000,000 to $19,000,000; and in the miscellaneous items are included the expenditures on the public buildings, (the Capitol and others,) the erection of which are under the direction of the War Department; still the appropriations are not made for the Army.

Mr. PHELPS. The actual cost of the Army is about fifteen million dollars. In this I do not embrace the appropriations for fortifications, for ordnance, or any of the appropriations for the erection of public buildings and other public works besides fortifications. The gentleman may put it down as $15,000,000 instead of $19,000,000, but if you add the expenditures on account of the Utah expedition; if you add the expenditures on account of the militia called into the service of the United States in the Territories of Washington and Oregon; then, of course, the amount will be largely beyond $15,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, when interrupted I was stating the manner in which estimates for appropriations for the Army were submitted. I showed they were submitted long in advance of the time when the money was required to be expended, and the estimates might be fully sufficient to answer all public purposes if there was no sudden emergency like that in the case of the Utah expedition. The order to fit out this expedition was given in the last fiscal year, and preparations were being made at Fort Leavenworth in June last in execution of that order. Many of the expenses of the expedition were incurred in the last fiscal year.

Now when we come to scrutinize and examine these estimates, we find that there was a deficiency for the regular supplies of the Army, amounting to $279,377 for the last fiscal year; for incidental expenses, $129,860; and for the transportation of troops and supplies, $750,000. So also for the erection of barracks and quarters, there was a deficiency of nearly seventy thousand dollars, which had accrued the last fiscal year.

Now these expenditures, in part—and I allude more particularly to those for the transportation of troops and supplies, and those for incidental expenses and the regular supply of the Army—belong to the expedition fitted out for Utah. From the time of commencing to fit out that expedition, the expenses have been great in sending forward supplies, and in providing the means of transporting the troops to the point of destination. You find that in the month of May last, the fifth regiment of infantry were, in a very short period of time, transported from Florida, where they were stationed, to St. Louis, and from St. Louis to Leavenworth city, where the proper outfit of mules and wagons, &c., were furnished for them, and they were started upon their line of march across the prairies.

The gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. Jones,] when commenting upon the expenditures of the Government, seemed to proceed upon the hypothesis that the scenes of operation of troops of the United States are where they readily procure the supplies necessary for them. He is not willing to take into consideration that these men have to be marched twelve hundred miles across a wilderness. They have to take their provisions for that long distance, and they take, not only the provisions necessary to support them on their march, but the provisions necessary for their support and maintenance during the past winter, and until they can be relieved in the spring by supplies from across the plains. Does the gentleman expect that those supplies are to be made with the same facility, and at the same rate of expense, that they could be transported over good wagon roads within the limits of the State of Tennessee or Missouri?

The gentleman from Tennessee finds fault with the expenditures of the War Department; and it seems he must arrive at one of several conclusions: first, that the Secretary of War has acted in violation of the law, or that he has acted indiscreetly, or that the gentleman is unwilling to intrust him with the expenditures necessary for the support of the Army. The gentleman took occasion to remark in reference to the course he thought should be pursued towards Utah. He said that he would send an officer there, and if the people did not obey the laws, he would repeal the organic act, and then send the troops there and drive the Mormons out of the country. Does the gentleman proceed upon the hypothesis that every person in that Territory is a rebel and a traitor to the Government? You must discriminate between those who are disloyal and rebellious, and those who are peaceable.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the appropriations for the Army, including the fortifications and the Military Academy, for the present year, were about twenty million dollars?

Mr. PHELPS. I did not speak of the expenditure of this fiscal year. I said I was replying to the assertion made by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOVEJOY,] that for the support and maintenance of the Army—using his own language—the expenditures were $19,000,000. But $2,100,000 of that was for constructing public buildings.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. But the cost of those public buildings was included in the $19,000,000. The amount was for erecting fortifications and for the Military Academy.

Mr. PHELPS. I remarked that the expenditure for fortifications was not chargeable to the Army; for though you might not appropriate a single dime for fortifications, still the Army is upon your hands, and you must maintain it. For fortifications annual appropriations may or may not be made, as it suits the pleasure of Congress. You might as well charge the cost of this Capitol to the support of the Army, as to charge the fortifications which the Government may see fit to erect upon the sea-board; because in this Capitol we make laws for the government and regulation of the Army.

Mr. LOVEJOY. It is under the head of military services.

Mr. PHELPS. It is among the money expended by the Secretary of War; but because Congress sees fit, under existing laws, to delegate to the War Department the construction of an aqueduct in the District of Columbia, costing $2,500,000, would you charge that to the expenses of the Army? Because Congress sees fit to delegate to the War Department the construction of the additions to this Capitol, will you charge that to the support and maintenance of the Army?

I was remarking that the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] in opposing these appropriations, must proceed upon one of three positions: that the Secretary of War, in making the expenditures for which this money is needed, is acting in violation of law, or that he is acting indiscreetly, or that the gentleman is not willing to intrust him with the expenditure of the public money. As far as has come under my observation, the Secretary of War has neither acted in violation of law nor indiscreetly, and I am willing to intrust him with the expenditure of the money for the support of our military establishment.

Now, the gentleman from Tennessee voted, as I did, for the preamble which was prefixed to the resolution of the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. WARREN,] asserting, in our opinion, that Utah was in a state of rebellion. If it is, does it not become us to suppress that rebellion? Is it not our duty to place in the hands of the executive department of this Government the means of putting down rebellion in our midst? I am in favor of doing that. I admit that Congress only can declare war. But I refer to the report of the Secretary of War, to show that the expedition which went to Utah went there as a peaceable expedition, with no expectation of prosecuting a war against that people; and, furthermore, that a trusted officer of the Army of the United States preceded that army, to apprise Brigham Young that a new military department had been organized, and that troops were on their way to winter in that Territory.

It was understood that the Mormons had a surplus of supplies, such as might be needed for the army; and this officer, Major Van Vliet, was authorized to make contracts with the people of the Territory of Utah for such supplies as they could furnish. But in reply to the request made by that officer to purchase provisions, he was met by denunciations, was told that none would be sold, and that the troops would not be allowed to winter in the Territory of Utah. Since that time you have had the proclamation of Brigham Young. It has been read on the floor of this House. It is the language of one who has in his own person sole authority over that Church; who rules over the people of the Territory of Utah belonging to the Mormon religion, with as despotic hands as the autocrat of the Russians rules over his subjects. The will of that people is only known by the revelations made by the prophet Brigham Young; and we have from him the declaration that this people will resist the march of the troops into the Territory of Utah.

Now, then, if heavy expenditures are incurred in consequence of sending this expedition to Utah, in consequence of this attempt to suppress this rebellion, and to maintain these troops for such time as it may be the will and pleasure of Congress to keep them there, I ask you whether patriotism does not prompt us to come forward and vote the necessary supplies? I ask you whether you would withhold appropriations thus necessary for the maintenance and support of the Army, on these idle rumors aspersing the character of the Secretary of War, wrongfully and unjustly, as I believe?

Mr. LETCHER. If my friend from Missouri will give me a moment, I desire to call his attention to some items that swell up the expenditures of the War Department, and which are now sought to be charged to the military service of the country.

If you will look at the statement, you will find that it includes private claims, appropriations for the Indian department, appropriations for arsenals and fortifications, the construction of military roads in several of the Territories, and acts of various kinds passed for the relief of military officers—all of which go to swell up the amount of $19,000,000.

Mr. LOVEJOY. That is the official statement, under the head of "military service."

Mr. PHELPS. Well, that embraces all the expenditures made under the direction of the Secretary of War for the fiscal year, whether in the nature of private claims or for the military service of the country.

Mr. STANTON. The gentleman from Missouri is slightly mistaken about that. The expenditures for the aqueduct, the Capitol building, &c., come under the head of miscellaneous expenses; and those to which the gentleman from Illinois refers are those strictly of a military character.

Mr. PHELPS. I have no time at this moment to turn to that; but I am satisfied of the correctness of the statement I have made.

Mr. CURTIS. The gentleman from Illinois undoubtedly includes more than is properly chargeable to the Army.

Mr. PHELPS. That is what I contend.

Mr. CURTIS. If he excludes the expenditures relating to arsenals, fortifications, public buildings, and many other things that come under the direction of the War Department, he will find that the Army expenses proper do not exceed, in round numbers, $15,000,000.

Mr. PHELPS. The gentleman from Iowa only affirms the position I have taken. I thank him for that, because it is a matter which comes under the cognizance of his committee.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Do I understand the gentleman from Iowa to state that the expenses of the Capitol and public buildings here are included in the total of $19,000,000?

Mr. CURTIS. No.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Well, what did he mean?

Mr. CURTIS. Fortifications and other works of a stationary character.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Why, then, did the gentleman refer to public buildings, when he did not mean public buildings?

Mr. CURTIS. I did not say public buildings.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Yes, sir; you used the words "public buildings."

Mr. CURTIS. You misunderstood me.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Here is a miscellaneous item of $19,000,000. I do not mean that the appropriation for the Army is for powder and balls merely, but for military service. It is so put down. The appropriations for these public buildings are not included in the amount of $19,000,000.

Mr. PHELPS. I am satisfied still of the correctness of the position which I have taken in

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, APRIL 6, 1858.

NEW SERIES... No. 92

regard to this matter; but, conceding all that the gentleman from Illinois claims, what does it prove with reference to this expenditure? The question before the committee is this: is it proper, is it right, to appropriate this money for the purposes specified in this bill? Are we willing to appropriate the money, and place it at the disposal of the Executive for the purposes therein specified? The other questions we can settle at some other time.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] has remarked that a portion of the money proposed to be appropriated in this bill will not be expended till the year 1860. I think the gentleman does not draw the distinction between the time of the purchase of these supplies and the time they may be issued to the troops. The Commissary General tells you that a portion of these supplies will be needed during this fiscal year, and a portion will be needed in the next fiscal year, and probably a portion will be needed in the following fiscal year—1860. Why does he seek, and why does the Secretary of War recommend, that this amount of money shall be placed at the disposal of the Executive at this time? It is for the reason that if the troops in Utah are to remain there next winter, the commissariat supplies must be purchased and transported there during the ensuing summer; and if troops are to be kept there to garrison some forts during the year 1860, the supplies must be sent the year preceding. It is a difficult matter to tell what portion of these supplies may reach these troops. They have to be transported long distances through the Indian country, where your trains may be cut off, and your provisions destroyed or taken by the Indians.

In view of such contingencies, if the Quartermaster General has not considered them in his estimate, I think he has not acted perhaps with his usual prudence and caution in submitting estimates. We know very well that lately the party having in charge a herd of cattle—a portion of the supplies for the troops—were attacked while they were crossing the plains, and the cattle were all driven off by the Indians. The same thing may occur during this summer. The cattle being driven to Utah for the use of the troops may be stampeded and scattered to the four winds of heaven; and the horses and mules that are being taken there, may be also stampeded when turned out on the prairie to graze. Sometimes the animals are driven away, and sometimes a panic seizes upon them and they all stampede from their pasturage.

But if gentlemen are desirous of knowing the details of the estimates upon which these appropriations are based, they will find them in Miscellaneous Document No. 22. They will find there the estimates for transporting the subsistence of the Army, the clothing and camp equipment, the transportation of quartermaster's stores, and hospital stores, and ordnance stores, all placed under their different heads, but aggregated in the bill which we have before us. We have now in Utah the fifth and tenth regiments of infantry, eight companies of the second dragoons, two companies of the sixth infantry, and two companies of the light artillery, and it is expected that additional regiments will be ordered there. Troops have been withdrawn from the frontier of Texas, and have been under orders to march to Utah for some time. Some of them are now on their way up the Missouri river to Fort Leavenworth, to start for that Territory as soon as the grass is sufficiently high to sustain their animals. You find that in consequence of Congress being unwilling to add to the regular Army, and in consequence of the dilatoriness of Congress in making provision for the calling out of volunteers to suppress the disturbances in Utah, the Secretary of War has been forced to the alternative of endeavoring to supply a reinforcement of the army in Utah out of the regular Army, and in consequence of that, early in January, orders were sent to the troops in Texas to prepare for service in Utah, and, as soon as possible, to leave the posts at which they were then garrisoned, and repair, by the Mississippi and Missouri rivers, to Fort Leavenworth. The expenditure necessary for the transportation of these troops was not anticipated at the time the regular estimates were submitted to us last year, for it was supposed that they would remain in Texas as long as the exigencies of the public service should require them. It was not supposed at that time that you would have to transport troops from Texas, more than seventeen hundred miles, by way of Galveston or Matagorda, up the Mississippi river, and then six hundred miles up the Missouri river.

We learn that Captain Marcy, in consequence of the destruction of the horses and mules belonging to the army in Utah, was ordered to leave the camp at Fort Bridger and proceed over the mountains to New Mexico to procure mules and horses in that Territory to supply the places of those lost. The greater part of the dragoons, under the command of Colonel Cooke, are now performing duty on foot. Horses must be procured for the dragoons. Mules must be procured to enable the army to move from its position. A portion of the army in Utah must be mounted. The Mormons are well mounted, and they will seriously annoy our army in its march to Salt Lake.

Under these circumstances, instead of higgling whether the Quartermaster General ought to give $159 50 for cavalry horses, or a less sum, I should think the better way would be to vote the money and hold the Secretary of War responsible for its proper and faithful expenditure.

I have no desire to stifle information or to conceal anything in relation to this matter. I have no information, other than that which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOVEJOY] has given the committee, or which I have heard in the way of rumors, about any contracts being made by the Secretary of War. But even if he has made any contracts, he had authority so to do. The act of Congress authorizes the Secretary of War to make contracts, either publicly or privately, for supplies for the quartermaster's department, and does not require him to obtain them at the lowest bid by public advertisement. Proposals for the transportation of the supplies for the Army were invited by advertisement, because it was expected there would be some competition. I did advise the late Secretary of War, General Davis, and I did advise General Jesup, the Quartermaster General, during the last session of Congress, to extend the contract he had made with Russell, Majors, & Waddell, for another year, because I did not believe there was then sufficient time to advertise for proposals and make a contract with other parties who would be able to commence the service in proper time, and also because the price paid them was reasonable, and they would faithfully perform the service. But I then urged upon the Secretary of War and upon the Quartermaster General, that, for the transportation for this calendar year, they should invite proposals by public advertisement, at Fort Leavenworth, during last fall. Proposals of that kind were invited and received, but these gentlemen were the only bidders. A contract was subsequently made by the Quartermaster General with these gentlemen, on terms satisfactory to them and to the Government. The supplies are to be furnished them on the Missouri river, at Fort Leavenworth, and at suitable points above that fort.

The delivery of the supplies for the Army at different points on the Missouri river is mutually advantageous to the Government and to the contractors. Those gentlemen will have several hundred wagons upon the plains at the same time, with twelve cattle to each wagon—a number of animals which will consume all the grass upon the plains on the line of their march, and hence it is necessary that the supplies should be landed at different points in order that the trains may travel different routes and find grass for the cattle. I am not speaking of the trains which have already started. Those trains must carry with them forage, for the grass is not sufficiently grown to support the animals. The Quartermaster General tells you, that for each infantry regiment, it will require eighty-five wagons, with six mules to each; and for each mounted regiment one hundred and five wagons, with six mules to each of them. Now, these animals are to feed on the grass, and they will sweep the prairie clean on the line of their march. There is, therefore, a necessity for making another depot on the Missouri river; but the transportation will not cost any more, in consequence of having a depot above Fort Leavenworth.

I doubt, myself, if there are any gentlemen in the country who would be willing to take the contract, which these transporters now have, upon the terms on which they have taken it. They were the former contractors, and that was one reason why the Secretary of War and the Quartermaster General desired to continue them in the service; but no injustice has resulted therefrom, either to the public or to any individual.

If gentlemen also desire to see the estimates upon which the appropriations for wagons and mules and horses are based, they will find them in this same document. The estimate for such mules as the Government desires, is $170 a piece; and for each wagon, $190. Examine the purchases which the Government has made heretofore, and you will find that these estimates are the prices which the Government has been in the habit of paying for these articles, except in the case of mules. In consequence of the large demand for mules for Government transportation, some fifteen hundred or two thousand having been purchased last year in Louisiana, Kentucky, Missouri, and Illinois, it is doubtful whether such as are needed by the Government for the transportation of baggage and Army supplies, could be procured at a less sum. In the estimates, I have yet to see anything which I can call unreasonable. I think they are all put at the market price, so far as I have a knowledge of the market price.

Gentlemen may say that $20 75 a hundred for transportation is too much. Merchants themselves were paying last year eighteen dollars a hundred for their transportation from Leavenworth to Salt Lake, and they made contracts at that price before it was expected there would be any troops sent to Utah. The risks of transportation will be greater this year than they were last year; and therefore we must pay a greater price. And the cost of transportation varies with the season of the year in which it is to be performed. I believe the prices stipulated to be paid are reasonable, and I am convinced the Government cannot, at this time, perform the transportation as cheap as these gentlemen have contracted to perform it.

There is another matter, Mr. Chairman, to which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] has adverted, and that is the usual extra compensation proposed to be paid to the official reporters for this House. He says that there is no law authorizing it. For several years last past Congress has appropriated the same amount of money as compensation to these gentlemen. We have made the Globe the official organ for the publication of the report of our debates. As a member of the Committee of Ways and Means I was and am willing to recognize the obligation of the Congress of the United States to make the appropriation. These gentlemen who sit before us have been faithful and efficient in the discharge of their duties. We know that the proprietor of the Globe has adopted a new rule, which makes the labors of these gentlemen more onerous than ever. The remarks of gentlemen of the House must appear the next day after they are delivered, and the manuscript must be put into the hands of the proprietor, not to be altered or amended after that time. In consequence of this, I repeat the labors of the reporters have become greater than they were heretofore, and I am willing to continue this appropriation.

I recollect when this appropriation was first introduced. It was introduced by the gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. Woodward, who is no longer a member of this House, during the session, I think, of 1850. Although at that time it met with some opposition, I have not been aware that it was serious at any time. The Committee of Ways and Means, in the discretion which they believed was intrusted to them, and in continuance of the former action of Congress, recommend that this appropriation should be made. I believe that these gentlemen are justly entitled to it; and if this were the only objection in gentlemen's minds to this bill, I am astonished to hear them say that they will vote against it.

Mr. RITCHIE. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. LETCHER. Perhaps the gentleman does not understand that, when the committee rises, all further debate on this bill is at an end, and the gentleman getting the floor will not entitle him to it in the morning.

Mr. HOUSTON. I suppose that, by unanimous consent, this debate can be extended through to-morrow. I am aware that the committee has no power to control an order of the House; but I suppose, by universal consent, we can, in the House, agree to extend the time of this debate. There are several gentlemen who wish to say something on this subject, and I do not know but what I would say something myself.

Mr. RITCHIE. This can be done in the House.

Mr. LETCHER. What is the understanding?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already stated that, unless the House shall give its consent to an extension of the time for this debate, he will hold, when the committee resume its session, that debate on this bill has terminated.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Will it be in order for the committee to direct the Chairman, on the rising of the committee, to recommend to the House that the time for this debate shall be extended until four o'clock to-morrow afternoon?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will take it upon himself, on the rising of the committee, to state to the House what has occurred on the subject.

Mr. LETCHER. If the debate is to run on until to-morrow at four o'clock, when are we to act on the bill? It is a matter of importance that this bill should be passed as soon as possible.

Mr. GARNETT. Does my colleague consider it unreasonable to give one day for the debate on a bill which appropriates $10,000,000 more than the law authorizes to be expended?

Mr. LETCHER. If I am allowed to reply—

Mr. RITCHIE. I have moved that the committee rise. This matter can be fixed in the House.

Mr. MORGAN. I object to further debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The remarks which have been made since then have been by unanimous consent. As the gentleman from New York objects, they must now terminate.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BOCOCK reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the deficiency bill, and had come to no resolution thereon; he also stated, that when it was proposed before the rising of the committee to extend the debate on that bill, there was no objection, but the Chair intimated that it was not within the power of the committee to change an order of the House.

The SPEAKER, in receiving the report of the chairman of the committee said: The Chair cannot receive as a report, the latter portion of the chairman's remarks, though the Chair will feel himself called upon to propound the question to the House, in pursuance of the recommendation of the committee, whether or not unanimous consent will be given to extend the general debate upon House bill No. 306, until to-morrow evening.

Mr. FLORENCE. I object.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania objects to the extension of time.

Mr. FLORENCE. For a very good reason.

[Mr. PIKE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as duly enrolled, a resolution, authorizing William N. Jeffers to accept a sword of honor from her Majesty the Queen of Spain; when the Speaker signed the same.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. I move that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. LETCHER. I hope not. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were refused.

The yeas and nays were refused.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I call for tellers on the motion.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WALDRON and Cox were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 87, noes 45.

So the motion to adjourn over was agreed to.

Mr. RITCHIE moved that the House adjourn.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, their Chief Clerk, informing the House that the Senate had passed the bill of the House for raising additional regiments, with amendments; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

Mr. WARD. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion for a moment.

Mr. QUITMAN. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion, to enable me to move to take up the Senate amendments to the Army bill which has just come from the Senate. I should like very much to have the action of the House upon it to-day. It will take but a few moments, I think, to dispose of it.

Mr. RITCHIE. For what purpose does the gentleman want to take up that bill?

Mr. QUITMAN. My object is to have the House concur in the amendments with one exception.

Mr. FLORENCE. I rise to a privileged motion. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House determined to adjourn over.

Mr. RITCHIE. I will yield to the gentleman from Mississippi, to take up that bill for reference only.

Mr. STANTON. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the Committee on Military Affairs have considered that bill. They have had the amendments before them, informally, and have agreed to what ought to be done.

Mr. WARD. I rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. RITCHIE. I insist upon my motion.

Mr. WARD. I rise to a question of privilege. I desire to occupy a few moments in a matter personal to myself.

The SPEAKER. There can be no higher question of privilege than a motion to adjourn.

Mr. FLORENCE. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House agreed to adjourn over.

Mr. RITCHIE. The gentleman cannot take the floor from me for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The question is first upon the motion to adjourn.

Mr. FLORENCE. Is it debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. WARD. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his motion. I do not desire to occupy but a moment. It is a matter personal to myself. I desire to make a personal explanation.

Mr. RITCHIE. I insist upon having my motion put to the House.

Mr. WARD. I desire to occupy one moment.

The SPEAKER. When gentlemen come to order the Chair will put the question to the House whether they will adjourn, but the Chair will not put it until order is restored.

Mr. WARD. I hope it will be voted down until I can make a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. GARNETT. I call the yeas and nays upon the motion to adjourn.

Mr. KEITT. I ask my friend from Pennsylvania to withdraw his motion, and allow the gentleman from New York to make his explanation. I do not know what it is about, but it is a courtesy often extended.

Mr. RITCHIE. I insist upon my motion being put.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The privilege of making a personal explanation was refused to me some time ago, and I thought it cruel and oppressive; but, nevertheless, I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will yield to the gentleman from New York for a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania refuses to yield.

The question recurring on the motion to adjourn,

Mr. KEITT called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were refused.

The yeas and nays were refused.

The motion to adjourn was agreed to.

The House accordingly (at fifteen minutes past four o'clock) adjourned until Monday next.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, April 5, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. H. N. Sipes.

The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announcing that the Speaker had signed an enrolled joint resolution (S. No. 24) authorizing Lieutenant William N. Jeffers to accept a sword of honor from her Majesty the Queen of Spain; and a bill (S. No. 176) to acquire certain lands needed for the Washington aqueduct, in the District of Columbia; which thereupon received the signature of the President pro tempore.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SEWARD presented a petition of citizens of New York, praying for the enactment of a general relief law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York, remonstrating against the repeal of the law establishing the Light-House Board; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of New York, in favor of the enactment of a law to provide for the final settlement and payment of the half pay for life which was promised by the Continental Congress to the officers of the revolutionary army; which were referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STUART presented a petition of citizens of Ionia county, Michigan, praying for the establishment of a mail route from Pawamo to Portland, and a mail route from Pawamo to Mather-ton; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

He also presented the memorial of Giles G. Isham, praying for a grant of land in the proposed Territory of Arizona, for the purpose of establishing a colony of industrious farmers, mechanics, and artisans; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

He also presented two petitions of citizens of Michigan, praying for the improvement of the harbors of Mackinaw city, and the erection of a fort, a light-house, and a custom-house, at that point; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HARLAN presented the petition of Henry King, Frederick W. De Kantzow, and Robert McCabe, praying a patent for manufacturing Russia sheet-iron; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Iowa, praying for the enactment of a general relief law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WRIGHT presented resolutions of the Legislature of New Jersey, in favor of restoring to that State the ports of Camden and Jersey City, and of making them, if necessary, ports of entry; also, of establishing ports of entry at Tom's River and Atlantic City, and a modification of the laws regulating the coasting trade; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of New Jersey, in favor of appropriations for the better preservation of life and property in case of shipwreck, and for the more effective working of the Government apparatus on the coast of New Jersey; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of New Jersey, in favor of a donation of public lands to that State, in common with the other States of the Union, for establishing and maintaining agricultural colleges therein; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of New Jersey, in favor of the advancement of Lieutenant M. F. Maury to that position in the Navy to which his distinguished services entitle him; which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am requested to present the memorial of certain persons claiming to be preëmptors on the island of Rock Island in the State of Illinois. The memorial is signed by Charles Lindsay, the attorney of seven persons, who represent themselves as preëmptors. They claim to have certain rights of preëmption to the island of Rock Island, which has heretofore been set apart as a military reservation. I have not investigated the merits of the question at all, but present the memorial, and move its reference to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SEWARD. I have received a petition, signed by Samuel Gardner, jr., of Brooklyn, in the State of New York, in which he states that he has made a valuable discovery by which he is enabled to turn on and light gas instantaneously by the use of a galvanic current through the manipulations of telegraphic lines placed at any distance from the chandelier or other apparatus used for conveying gas to the burners. For this discovery he has obtained letters patent. In view of the improvements of the Capitol, and of the public buildings at the seat of Government, he is of opinion that it would be very important to the Government of the United States to have control over his patent. He therefore submits a statement to the Senate, and asks that a law may be passed directing the purchase of his patent for public use. I move that this petition be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds; and, in view of the importance of the subject, I move that the petition be printed.

The motion to print was agreed to; and the petition was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. KENNEDY, it was Ordered, That the petition of the legal representatives of John G. Mackall, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. FOSTER, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Sarah W. Halsey, and that she have leave to withdraw her petition and papers.

On motion of Mr. FOSTER, it was Ordered, That Thomas R. Carman have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

On motion of Mr. BELL, it was Ordered, That the petition of Major Thomas B. Eastland, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Court of Claims.

PACIFIC RAILROAD BILL.

On motion of Mr. GWIN, it was Ordered, That the bill (S. No. 65) to authorize the President of the United States to contract for the transportation of the mails, troops, seamen, munitions of war, Army and Navy supplies, and all other Government service, by railroad from the Missouri river to San Francisco, in the State of California, be printed with the several amendments intended to be proposed thereto.

PEALE'S EQUESTRIAN WASHINGTON.

Mr. BIGLER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be instructed to inquire into the propriety of purchasing the equestrian portrait of Washington, by Rembrandt Peale, now on exhibition in the Rotunda of the Capitol.

MR. REED'S INSTRUCTIONS.

Mr. BRIGHT submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to the Senate a copy of the instructions which have been given to William B. Reed, the Commissioner of the United States in China.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. STUART asked, and by unanimous consent obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 236) granting public lands to the Territory of Kansas, for the purpose of constructing certain railroads therein; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. YULEE, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the memorial of John M. Hinton, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of Arnold Harris and S. F. Butterworth, sureties of Charles E. Kendall, late postmaster at New Orleans, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 237) for the relief of Arnold Harris and Samuel F. Butterworth. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Lucretia Bell, heir of Jane Van Deen, widow of Abraham Van Buskirk, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Thomas R. Carman, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. STUART, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the petition of Martin Layman, reported a bill (S. No. 235) for the relief of Martin Layman; which was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. KENNEDY, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 212) for the relief of N. C. Weems, of Louisiana, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRIGHT, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported a bill (S. No. 238) to authorize the United States to take lands in the District of Columbia for a public purpose; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. BIGGS. I rise for the purpose of asking the consent of the Senate to make an explanation as due to the character of North Carolina.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can only be done by the unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. WILSON. I rise for the purpose of making an explanation in regard to the same subject to which the Senator refers, as he called my attention to it on Friday.

Mr. BIGGS. It is that and another matter on which I desire to be heard.

Mr. WILSON. During the debate the other day, if the Senator will permit me—

Mr. BIGGS. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection to the explanation.

Mr. WILSON. During the debate the other day, I referred, in the course of a speech made by the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE,] to some remarks made in the House of Representatives in regard to the power of the States to abolish slavery. I stated that I heard the power denied by a member from the State of North Carolina. I happened to be present when the remark was made by Mr. BRANCH, then and now a member of the House of Representatives from that State, that he thought the State Legislatures had not the constitutional power to abolish slavery. It was a subject of remark, at the time, by others and myself; but I find on looking to the matter, my attention having been called to it afterwards by the Senator from North Carolina, that Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania, and I think some other members, made some inquiries in regard to the meaning of the expression. Mr. BRANCH explained it in this way: that he did not think the Legislatures have the constitutional power to abolish slavery; but that the people, when they frame their constitutions, could make their constitutions so as to abolish slavery. The explanation then made was that the States had the constitutional power to abolish slavery, and that the member did not wish to be understood as saying that it was any violation of the Constitution of the United States, as some of us understood at the time the remark was made. I had my attention called to the matter by the Senator from North Carolina; but, owing to the pressure of business, I was not able to examine it until Friday of last week. This is the earliest opportunity I have had, and I wish to put the matter right; for I have no desire or wish, certainly, to misrepresent any member of either House. When I listened to the remark, I understood it as I stated it the other day; other members did so understand it; but on the explanation of Mr. BRANCH, it was made very plain and very clear.

Mr. BIGGS. I am very much gratified that the Senator from Massachusetts has made this explanation; but to make it full, it is proper that I should state, in addition to what he has already stated, that Mr. BRANCH expressly recognized the power of a Legislature to abolish slavery, provided that power was expressly given by the constitution. I rose for that purpose, but more especially for another purpose, to set the character of North Carolina right. I notify the Senator from Massachusetts that this is in reference to a speech delivered by him in this body on the evening of the 20th of March.

It will be recollected that during the Kansas debate we had several evening sessions, at one of which, that of the 20th March, I was not present in consequence of indisposition. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] on that occasion delivered a speech, which, in consequence of the great press of business upon the Globe, was not published until Friday last, and my attention to it was not called until Saturday. Among other points made by the Senator, he seeks to give a faithful account of southern society—slaveholders and non-slaveholders; and as I presume he could not testify from personal observation and knowledge, and as I suppose he preferred it, he introduces as reliable testimony extracts from a book, entitled "The Impending Crisis of the South," said to be written by a "Mr. Helper, of North Carolina."

Being informed as to this author, I am unwilling that such testimony shall go upon the permanent legislative history of the country as coming from North Carolina, without placing in the same form the character of the witness. It is due to North Carolina, it is due to the Senator from Massachusetts, it is due to the Senate and the country, particularly the people of the non-slaveholding States, to expose to public contempt the author of a work whose position, whatever it is, probably greatly depends upon his representing himself as "of North Carolina." I feel a becoming pride that the word of a North Carolinian is so generally considered reliable; and, therefore, the more imperative is the duty to mark emphatically, as I propose to do on this occasion, any one that hails from that State who slanders her society and writes it in a book to deceive and delude others. The Senator from Massachusetts is a striking example of the dupes thus made by this catch-penny book; and the delusion is so strong that, without inquiry as to the character of the witness, it is placed in permanent form as evidence from North Carolina as to the state of southern society.

I want to disabuse the mind of the Senator from Massachusetts, and those who read this book, as to the reliability of the authority on which he relies. Who, then, is this Mr. Helper, of North Carolina, relied upon in the Senate of the United States as evidence from the South of the state of southern society? I speak from authority that cannot be doubted.

Hinton Rowan Helper, the author of the "Impending Crisis," is a native of Davie county, North Carolina. His first appearance in active life was as a clerk of Michael Brown, a merchant in Salisbury, North Carolina. Mr. Brown is an elder of the Presbyterian church; and after Helper removed to Salisbury he also joined the Presbyterian church, and, so far as was publicly known, conducted himself with propriety. After living with Mr. Brown several years as clerk, it was understood at Salisbury that he formed a copartnership with Mr. Coffman in the book business, and left for the North to buy in a stock of books. He did not return as expected, but shortly thereafter went to California, and there, or shortly after his return, wrote a book called "Land of Gold."

He returned to Salisbury about 1854, where he remained some time without any apparent business. In the summer of 1856, as is reported and believed, he procured surety for, and obtained money. He, however, about that time, left for the North, where he now resides, never since having returned to North Carolina. After leaving North Carolina, he changed his name from Helfer to Helper; and it was disclosed last year that while a clerk for Mr. Brown he purloined from him three hundred dollars, and after an exposure by Mr. Brown, Helfer, making a merit of necessity, himself publicly confesses, in a handbill which I have before me, this thieving on his part, and excuses it upon the ground that he was enticed to the act by some ambiguous expression of a friend of his that it was allowable for clerks so to do; and the further excuse that it was an indiscretion of youth, although, at the time, he was in full standing in the Presbyterian church, and, as he says himself, was seventeen years of age. It is due to the Presbyterian church to say that this man is not now a member of that church.

Now, sir, when and why he altered his name I know not, except he defines Helper—one who helps himself from the purses of others without their consent; and therefore concluded the change of name appropriate to his character. He is a dishonest, degraded, and disgraced man, and although—much to be regretted—a native of the State, yet he is an apostate son, ruined in fortune and character, and catering to a diseased appetite at the North, to obtain a miserable living, by slanders upon the land of his birth; and I deeply regret that the Senator from Massachusetts has, by a reference, so dignified the creature as to render necessary this exposure. Such is Mr. Helfer, of North Carolina, author of the "Impending Crisis of the South," alias Mr. Helfer, once of North Carolina, but who has left the land of his birth for the good of the State.

Now, sir, I would respectfully suggest to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts to append a note to the edition of his speech, giving the true character of the author of this book upon which he has relied, so that the readers of his speech may not be, as he has been, so unwittingly misled by authority so degraded and unreliable.

WASHINGTON POLICE.

On motion of Mr. BROWN, the bill (S. No. 232) to establish an auxiliary guard for the protection of public and private property in the city of Washington, and repealing all acts heretofore passed in relation to that subject, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill is as follows:

That there be established an auxiliary guard or watch for the protection of public and private property, for the enforcement of the police regulations of the city of Washington, to consist of a chief at an annual salary of $2,000, [one] captain at an annual salary of $1,200, four lieutenants at an annual salary of $800 each, and one hundred men at an annual salary of $600 each, to be paid monthly. The chief of the auxiliary guard shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and the captains, lieutenants, and men, shall be appointed by the chief, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and may be dismissed by the chief at his pleasure, or upon the order of the said Secretary.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the guard hereby established shall be divided by the chief into squads of convenient size, and the said chief is also authorized and empowered to establish guard-houses at such points in the city of Washington as he may designate, subject, however, to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the mayor of Washington, the district attorney for the District of Columbia, the marshal of said District, and the chief of the auxiliary guard, are hereby authorized and required to make and establish rules and regulations for the government of said guard, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the sum of $5,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated annually as a contingent fund, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, to carry out the purposes of this act in the suppression of crime and detection of criminals in the city of Washington.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That whenever, in the judgment of the President of the United States, the same may be required, he be, and is hereby, authorized to order such temporary increase of the guard as, in his opinion, may be expedient; not to exceed two hundred men, who shall be paid at the rate of two dollars per day while in service, and be dismissed so soon as, in the opinion of the President, their services may no longer be required.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That each member of the guard shall be required to wear a uniform dress at all hours when on duty, and on his hat, or cap, or breast, such number as may be assigned him. The captains and lieutenants, at all times, day and night, shall wear an official badge; and said uniforms, badges, and numbers, hereby required to be worn, shall also be prescribed by the chief, and shall be made public in the newspapers in Washington for one month after first prescribed, and shall not thereafter be changed.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts heretofore passed, authorizing or relating to the employment of an auxiliary watch, or guard, be, and the same are hereby, repealed. This section to take effect so soon as the chief shall report to the Secretary of the Interior that he has thirty men enrolled and ready for duty.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the sum of money necessary to carry this act into effect, not to exceed — dollars, be, and the same hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. BROWN. There is a printed report accompanying the bill. I do not know, however, that anybody desires to hear it read.

Mr. MASON. I should like to hear it read.
The Clerk read the following report made by Mr. BROWN on the 1st of April:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a resolution of the Senate, instructing them to "inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the establishment, under the authority and control of the Government of the United States, of an efficient police in the city of Washington," have carefully considered the subject, and report:

That the police force of the city consists of twenty-seven day police officers, and one chief; and of an auxiliary guard of thirty men, and one captain, who is to act as high policeman. The day police is appointed by the Mayor, with the consent of the city councils, and is paid out of the city treasury; the cost being $18,000 per annum. The auxiliary guard is appointed by the Mayor, under an act of Congress, and is paid out of the national Treasury; the cost being $19,000 per annum, and $400 for contingencies.

The police force is both feeble and inefficient. Riot and bloodshed are of daily occurrence. Innocent and unoffending persons are shot, stabbed, and otherwise shamefully maltreated, and not unfrequently the offender is not even arrested. It is hardly necessary to add, that such acts are a disgrace to civilized society, and, if not put down, must result in disastrous consequences to society, and bring a lasting reproach upon this Federal city.

It is the duty of the local authorities to keep order; but they either cannot or will not do it. The obligation is thus thrown upon Congress to take the matter in hand. Congress cannot throw off the responsibility of taking care of the public property, and of defending the persons and property of Ministers accredited to this Government by foreign Powers; and Senators and Representatives may very well assume that when riot, bloodshed, burglary, and arson, are of almost nightly occurrence, they and their families are not free from danger.

The feebleness of the police is shown by a single glance at its numbers. Fifty-seven men cannot, when the spirit of disorder is rife as it now is, keep order in a city like Washington. This city has, in round numbers, a population of sixty thousand souls; but it covers an area larger than Baltimore, with a population of two hundred and sixty thousand. Baltimore has a police force of four hundred, and Washington has only fifty-seven.

The inefficiency of the police grows out of a number of causes. First and foremost is its feebleness; next, the want of proper responsibility. A police appointed by one power, and paid by another, is very likely to be inefficient. But that which, perhaps, imparts its greatest inefficiency is the fact that it is composed, to a great degree, of active political partisans; and being appointed by the local authorities alone, its efficiency in carrying elections is looked to with as much, or more anxiety, than its efficiency in keeping down disorder.

Without elaborating the subject, your committee have felt justified, from the state of facts now existing, in assuming that the obligation is upon the Government to provide a more efficient police for the city of Washington, and therefore report a bill.

SENATE COMMITTEE D. C. ROOM, March 3, 1858.

DEAR SIR: The following resolution has been referred, by order of the Senate, to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the establishment, under the authority and control of the Government of the United States, of an efficient police in the city of Washington.

To enable the committee to act intelligently, I am instructed to address to you the following inquiries:

First. What is the present police force in the city of Washington, and by whom is it appointed?

Second. What is the annual cost of the police, and by whom is it paid?

Third. What suggestions, if any, have you to make looking to an increased efficiency in the police?

Fourth. Has the police been inefficient? and if so, state the reasons why, and suggest a remedy.

I am further directed to call upon you for a copy of your police rules or regulations, to be laid before the committee, and, if they think it proper, to be submitted by them to the Senate.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant.

MAYOR'S OFFICE, WASHINGTON,

March 17, 1858.

SIR: In reply to the several questions submitted to me in a communication received from the committee over which you preside, to the first I respectfully answer, that the police of the city of Washington now consists of twenty-seven day police officers, and one chief of police; of thirty members of an auxiliary guard, and one captain thereof, who act as night policemen, and are liable to do day duty whenever any emergency may occur; that during the last year it has been found necessary to appoint, temporarily, twenty-five night police officers in aid of the guard, and that the day police has been permanently increased to nearly double its previous number; that all the police are appointed by the Mayor—those of the day police by and with the advice and consent of the board of aldermen.

The annual cost of the day police is eighteen thousand three hundred and seventy dollars, and some contingencies, which expense is paid by the city of Washington. The corporation has already paid during the current year, three thousand dollars for special police service.

The auxiliary guard are paid by the Government of the United States, each receiving six hundred dollars per annum, and the captain one thousand dollars; making in all nineteen thousand dollars, and four hundred dollars for contingencies.

I suggest that the night police (auxiliary guard) is much too small. The greatest length of the city, on an east and west line, is 4,572 miles, and, on a north and south line, is 3,779 miles. It has many crooked and narrow alleys in it, which serve as hiding and lurking places for evil disposed and disorderly persons. None of these alleys are lighted at night, and but few of the streets and avenues. It would, therefore, take at least one hundred men to effectually watch the city at night, and to meet any emergency that is likely to occur; and they ought to have one captain, and not less than four lieutenants. The day police, for the present, is large enough.

The police is not inefficient; but, on the contrary, is, and has been, as efficient as it is possible for so small a body of men to be. They have made a very large number of arrests, many of them under circumstances of great danger. They are all strong, able-bodied men, of tried courage; and a large proportion of them have received painful, and, in some instances, dangerous wounds, in the discharge of their duty, and have captured an almost incredible number of fire-arms and other offensive weapons; the return this day alone being four six-shooting revolvers of various patents, one single-barrel pistol, besides other more silent, but hardly less deadly weapons.

There is a spirit of lawlessness pervading the whole land. Deeds of violence and bloodshed are perpetrated even in villages and hamlets; and all the cities of the country are suffering to a greater extent than ever heretofore from the prevalence of this spirit in their midst.

The county constables, who are appointed by the circuit court, hold their office for an indefinite term, and are held to no responsibility for any omissions to enforce law or punish its violations; and as a recent law of Congress takes from them all fees and emoluments for services rendered in this behalf, they generally avoid them; I therefore suggest that the tenure of their office be well defined by law, that the term be limited, and that they be made responsible to the marshal of the United States for the District of Columbia, and required to obey his orders and those of his deputies, in the suppression of riots and the maintenance of the public peace; and also that some method of compensating them may be adopted, either by returning to the old fee system, or such other as Congress in its wisdom may devise.

The District of Columbia has now to rely on the city police for the discharge of duties which, in the States, belong to the sheriff of the county, or the officer representing him—a condition of things which ought not to exist, and which will be, at least partially, remedied by carrying out the above suggestions in relation to the marshal and the county constables.

Very respectfully,

W. B. MAGRUDER, Mayor.
Hon. A. G. BROWN, Chairman of the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia.

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF POLICE, WASHINGTON, March 5, 1858.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a communication, by order of the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia, making certain inquiries in relation to the police organization of this city, and briefly reply:

In answer to your first inquiry: "What is the present police force in the city of Washington, and by whom is it appointed?" I respectfully reply:

The present force of the police of this city consists of twenty-seven persons, with a chief or captain of police, the members of which are nominated by the Mayor to the board of aldermen for confirmation, in the same manner as all the other officers of the corporation. Previous to the 7th of January last (1858) the entire police force of the city numbered seventeen, at which date the two boards of the city council passed an act "to organize a police system for the city of Washington, and to reduce the several acts in relation thereto into one," which act increased the force from sixteen to the present number—twenty-seven persons.

The second inquiry, "What is the annual cost of the police, and by whom is it paid?" is answered:
Twenty-seven men, at $630 per annum each...$17,010 00
Pay of chief.....1,000 00

$18,010 00

Which salaries are paid monthly by the corporation. In addition to the corporation police, there are thirty-one persons attached to the night-guard; which organization, by law, are auxiliary to the police established by the corporation. Their head is called "Captain Auxiliary Guard." They are paid by the Government. The contingent expenses of the several guard-houses are defrayed by the corporation. Their duties are confined exclusively to night service in patrolling the city—at the present time, from 8 p. m. until morning.

There are, in addition to the above, a number of officers called "county constables," who are entirely inefficient, for the reason that they never act except there is an almost certain prospect of pecuniary reward for their services, and are, therefore, entirely useless.

The suggestions I have to offer, looking to an increased efficiency of the police, are, hurriedly:

1. A greatly augmented force.
2. A marshal or head of police, with an adequate number of captains or lieutenants of police, who shall be assigned to duty generally in a particular locality or district; who shall be directly responsible for the proper discharge of the duties of the men apportioned to the district in which such captains, &c., respectively, shall be assigned.
3. A sufficient number of station-houses for the accommodation of the men, which will serve as headquarters in the several districts; at which a sufficient force will always be found, at all hours of the day or night, for the protection of public and private property, &c., &c.
4. Stringent rules for the government of the body, without which any police organization must necessarily be inefficient.

I have hastily thrown together the above suggestions as a kind of basis by which to form a starting point, and upon which to enlarge.

I inclose "Rules and Regulations for Government of Auxiliary Guard," and also a copy of police act.
Very respectfully, &c.,
F. A. KLOPPER,
Chief of Police.

Hon. A. G. BROWN, Chairman, &c., United States Senate.

Mr. HUNTER. In the third section I think an amendment ought to be made. As the section now stands it provides,

"That the Mayor of Washington, the district attorney for the District of Columbia, the marshal of the said District, and the chief of the auxiliary guard, are hereby authorized and required to make and establish rules and regulations for the government of said guard, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior."

I think that the Mayor of Washington ought not to be connected with this matter, as the guard is to be kept and maintained at the expense of the General Government; and I move to strike out, in the first and second lines, the words, "the Mayor of Washington," and also to strike out "the district attorney for the District of Columbia." I do not know why he should be associated either. Then the section will read:

"That the marshal of said District and the chief of the auxiliary guard are hereby authorized and required to make and establish rules and regulations for the government of said guard, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior."

I see no reason why we should connect the Mayor and district attorney with this matter.

Mr. BROWN. These words were not inserted carelessly, but for a reason. The Mayor of Washington is the chief conservator of the public peace of the city; at least he ought to be so. He has nothing to do with the execution of this law if it passes; but he has, by this section, a voice in establishing the rules and regulations which are to control this body of men, the execution of the rules themselves being left to a different power. There is a day police here which is exclusively under the control of the Mayor, and must always remain so. Congress neither pays them nor appoints them, nor has anything to do with them.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Allow me to ask, is this, by the bill, a night police?

Mr. BROWN. That is all.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The bill makes it so?

Mr. BROWN. The law, as it now stands, makes it so.

Mr. FESSENDEN. How is it with this bill?

Mr. BROWN. This bill does not so specifically declare it, but that is the character of this police. I was about to say that the Mayor makes rules and regulations for the day police; and if the rules for the government of the night police should be essentially different, you would have two sets of rules for the government of the police of the city. It was for that reason that the Mayor was taken in. The district attorney was named, for the reason that he had performed such services heretofore, and for the reason that the rules ought not to conflict with the law; and he being the law officer of the Government here, would be likely to solve any law point that might arise in making these rules. I do not want to detain the Senate in discussing the question. If the Senate chooses to strike out these words, very well; but I think it ought not to be done.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If this bill could be made more specific, so that this auxiliary guard should be entirely and solely a night guard, having nothing to do with the police of the city during the day, then the remark which has been made by the Senator from Mississippi would be a correct one necessarily; and the Mayor, the head of the day police, would have to be consulted in order to make a perfect system in reference to the two. I was about to remark that I listened to the bill when it was read, and it should, in my judgment, be entirely a night police, because the city authorities should take care of the police of the city in the day time. They are competent to do it, and they cannot ask properly to be relieved from that service. In that case, it would be very well to consult the Mayor, and it would be necessary to consult the officers of the city, in order to make the police a perfect one, as stated by the Senator from Mississippi. I will suggest to him, however, that he had better make his bill more specific, in order to leave no sort of question what this guard is intended for. As it stands now, it does not say that it is to be a night watch altogether.

Mr. BROWN. Nor would I have it an exclusively night guard. Its principal duty would be to guard the city at night; but in cases of riot, or anything of that sort, I should certainly expect them to do service.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then there might be a provision inserted in the bill that the superintendent should have power to call on this guard to aid in suppressing riots in the city in the day time, when it might be necessary; but its general occupation should be, I think, exclusively as a night guard. There is no reason in the world why Congress should be at the expense, or should take the responsibility, of furnishing a day police for the city of Washington. It is a service not very extensive, and one which the city can well render. I accede to the idea that there should be power to call upon this guard on special occasions, and perhaps on special days, when there is more danger than on other days of riots or other troubles arising in the city.

I would make one other suggestion, though I do not intend to move an amendment: I think as much power as can be possibly lodged with any safety should be vested in the commander of this guard; that he should not be hampered by general restrictions, or by a board. I believe that the ability of a police depends, in a very great degree, upon the character of the principal officer, and that the ability of the principal officer depends, in a very great degree, upon his having as much power as can safely be lodged in his hands without being troubled by a board over him; and therefore all the rules and regulations which are to be made, I think we should look upon with considerable care, and watch them.

I am not ordinarily in the habit of moving or suggesting that a sum appropriated for purposes not exactly specific should be increased; but all experience has shown, in every city, that a police is very frequently rendered ineffective from the want of ability to get information. The police officers themselves are watched; and according to the provisions of this bill, which has provided specifically for their wearing badges, notifying their characters day and night, of course all rogues will keep as clear as possible from coming in contact with them, and it is impossible for them personally to ascertain the haunts of people of this description to acquire information that is necessary. There is a want of money, and there is a want of money to pay for secret service. I believe that the secret service of a police force is among the most important duties which it has to perform. Information to be obtained by the commander of such a force, must be drawn from other sources than from the men under him—from persons who are not officially known as members of the force. I have always doubted whether the provision requiring that badges should be worn by police officers at night was not a very unwise one; because, if the badges are of any use at all, the use is to notify every vagabond who is prowling about that a police officer is very near him. In the day time it is very proper, but in the night time I much doubt its expediency or propriety. I would suggest to the honorable Senator—

Mr. BROWN. If the Senator will allow me I will state, in that connection, because I do not wish to say more than is necessary, the reason for putting that provision in the bill. The object is, that every citizen himself may be a watch on your guard. If a member of the guard does not perform his duty, and is seen not to be performing it, he can be recognized by his uniform and his badge. If he is seen in a beer-house, or other improper place, or seen in any improper association, any citizen may notify the chief of police of that fact, and have him dismissed for delinquency. But if he goes in citizen's garb, none but his acquaintances would recognize him. I saw, and the committee saw, the difficulty which the Senator points out; but that is not so great a difficulty as the other one.

Mr. FESSENDEN. You have to watch the watchmen—watch the police!

Mr. BROWN. Your whole six thousand voters, and all the strangers here, will have their eyes upon them. Wherever they are seen in the street, in whatever association, they are recognized as policemen. If any emergency arises, if a citizen is assaulted, he can see by the badge of the policeman that that is the proper man to call upon. If he does not perform his duty, you know whom to report. That is the reason for putting it in.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I know that opinions differ—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour has arrived for the consideration of the special order, being the bill to admit Minnesota into the Union; and that bill is before the Senate.

Mr. BROWN. I move to postpone the special order, and let us go on with this bill. If we are to do anything, surely all of us understand it is necessary to act promptly.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I hope the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia will not press the consideration of this bill at this time. There is something that ought to be said on the subject. I think Congress ought to pass no such bill. We ought to be engaged in something more legitimately within our sphere of action than in this business of paying a uniformed police out of the public Treasury to take care of this city. I hope it will not be pressed now.

Mr. BROWN. I must press a bill like this, which looks to the public peace.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on postponing the special order for the purpose of considering this bill.

Mr. MASON. I should really think the Senate cannot be insensible to the pressing, the absolute, necessity for the passage of this bill, or some other bill which will preserve the lives of the people in this city. We hear every day of nightly assassinations, many of them successful. I should think that the safety and the lives of the people who are placed under our jurisdiction is of more pressing importance than the passage of any bill which is likely to engage the attention of the Senate to-day, so far as precedence is concerned—not in general importance, certainly, but so far as precedence is concerned. I hope, therefore, the business, whatever it may be, before the Senate, will be postponed, in order to pass this bill promptly.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I would ask the Senator from Virginia if the police authorities of this place have not power to establish and put on guard as many police officers as they think proper? or do they require a law of Congress to authorize them to appoint an additional number? Have not the city authorities now power to put on guard as many police officers as they think proper, and have they not power to establish and fix their pay, to lay taxes to meet the expense, and provide for everything else connected with the subject? If that be so, I cannot really see the necessity for Congress acting in such hot haste on this subject, and taking jurisdiction of a matter that should be left to the city of Washington to control.

Mr. SEWARD. The suggestions which are made by the honorable Senator from Tennessee seem to me very pertinent and worthy of consideration; but they are pertinent to the consideration of the bill when it shall be before the Senate. I am obliged to confess what I thought ought never to be stated, or could never be truly stated, in the Congress of the United States, that persons who have business at the capital, whether they be foreigners or whether they be our own citizens, are deterred from being abroad in the evening, whether on business or social occasions, by the terror which prevails in this city. I think every man who is a resident of the city can bear witness that persons take care to avoid being out in the night, exposing themselves to violence and brutality by offenders who are at large in the city. It was but the night before last that one of the public officers, a messenger of the Treasury Department, was assassinated in the open streets, and at an early hour of the evening. It is certainly due to the character of the capital of the country that we should give this subject immediate attention.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If this bill is not going to take any great time, I do not wish to delay it by insisting on taking up the Minnesota bill. If it is thought we can get through with it immediately, I shall waive the priority of the Minnesota bill, with the understanding that it does not lose its place. I am induced to this by this consideration: we all know that life is not safe in this city at present; men are cut down and shot down at the doors of citizens, who dare not open their doors to rescue the wounded for fear of being killed themselves. A very prominent citizen of this city told me that he saw two men shot down near his own door, and that it was not safe for the lives of his family to go and rescue them. Such scenes occur every night on Pennsylvania avenue, the most densely populated part of the city. No man is safe. No man dares to go to his neighbor's house. He is liable to be shot down without provocation, and without notice. Something must be done in order to restore the government of law, or you drive the community to a worse alternative—an alternative that no man can look to except with shuddering—to protect their own lives. For that reason I will yield, with the understanding that this bill shall soon be disposed of.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President—

Mr. FESSENDEN. I believe I have the floor on the bill, in case it is taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair supposed the Senator from Maine had yielded the floor.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir. The Presiding Officer announced the arrival of the hour for the consideration of the special order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine is entitled to the floor.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. BROWN. I will say in reply to the suggestion of the Senator from Illinois, that if the bill gives rise to an extraordinary debate, I shall feel obliged to yield.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I was remarking that I had no very great confidence in the system of having a night police with badges, but I am told by gentlemen all around me that I am clearly wrong about that; and experience has shown it to be so. That is quite likely. It is an opinion of mine, which I entertain still, but which I am not disposed to urge on the consideration of the Senate. But, sir, I am perfectly well satisfied that an amount of money larger than that which is provided as a contingent fund in the bill reported to the Senate, is absolutely essential, and I hope that the amount may be increased, and that it may be understood to be a secret service fund, to be guarded in such a way as the Senator from Mississippi may think fit in any amendment he may propose; or I shall propose one myself, if he desires it, in order that the system may be more efficient, if we adopt it at all.

There is one thing more, which perhaps it does not become me to say, but which I will venture to suggest. In my judgment, much of the difficulty is owing to the very bad example which has been set in very high quarters. If it had been the case that assaults committed by men of position and standing in this city had been noticed as they should have been, and disapproved as they should have been, instead of being approved and defended as they were, I believe we should hardly have had the state of things which we are now witnessing in this city. I have no belief that the poor, the ignorant, the uneducated, and the vicious have any very great hesitation about following examples that are set them by the educated, and people holding position, both in the perpetration of acts of violence, and defending acts of violence.

I will further say that I am informed, and I have no doubt of the fact, that the officer, the judge, whose salary you are proposing to increase by one bill before the Senate, at the head of the police court, is entirely incompetent, either from age or some other reason, to the discharge of his duties; not for want of learning, but for want of ability, desire, inclination, or something else, to inflict those punishments which ought to be inflicted for crime, and to see that criminals do not escape through any misapplication of the law. It may be that it is unintentional. I am told that he is conscientiously scrupulous about capital punishment. If so, he is most unfit to administer laws which provide for capital punishment. Sir, I believe we must go deeper than merely providing an auxiliary guard; we must try to reform the character of men very much above the class who commit these crimes, and see that all are properly punished for offenses against the laws, as well those in high places as in low places.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Do I understand the bill as now being before the Senate; or is it the motion to postpone?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is to postpone the special order for the further consideration of this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I hope the Senate will postpone the consideration of this bill.

It involves principles of no ordinary character. In connection with the remarks made by the Senator from Illinois, I will say that I freely concur that there is a very bad state of morals here; that police regulations are needed, and that they ought to be rigidly enforced. I am fully aware and satisfied in my own mind that many persons around this city are not safe. But, while these matters are pressing themselves on our attention, it seems to me that there is another consideration immediately and strictly connected with it, and that is: who is responsible for them; where is the fault; where is the cause of this inefficiency of police regulations in Washington city? Is it because they want to force the expense and management of their police on Congress, and to get clear of them themselves? When we look at the statements in the morning papers of the outrages that are committed night after night, what a commentary is it upon the city of Washington, that the civil authority and the police regulations here are not sufficient even to preserve order and to prevent the recurrence of such acts as are published in the papers every morning! If we take upon ourselves the expense and trouble of forming a corps of police, establishing their officers, and fixing the number of buttons on their coats, and relieve the city authorities from it, of course they will be happy to have us do it.

But, while we admit that the police ought to be more efficient, what is the proper authority to enforce it and establish it? Suppose men are shot down here every night. They are shot down in Baltimore too; they are shot down in Cincinnati; they are shot down in New Orleans; they are shot down in New York. Pockets are picked, men are garroted or robbed in those cities as well as here; but because there is a man shot down in New York, must the Congress of the United States appoint a police regulation for them? Because a man is robbed in Baltimore must Congress take up the subject? It is legitimate and necessary that the city of Washington should establish and enforce its own police regulations as well as any other city. If we are to do it for them everything will be pushed upon Congress. I see a proposition to give up their charter; that the Senate, the House of Representatives, the President, and the Secretary of the Interior are all to be engaged, and their time occupied attending to the police regulations of the city of Washington. If the act of incorporation does not give the city authorities here sufficient power, let Congress give them whatever power they need, to raise a sufficient number of policemen; give them power to pass laws to punish crimes; give them power to collect taxes to defray the expenses of police officers. They have not got enough policemen; there is great inefficiency here; something ought to be done; but I think Congress ought not to incur the expense of taking up the police regulation of the city of Washington, and devolving them on the Secretary of the Interior. I hope the bill will be postponed. I think it ought to be looked into.

Mr. BROWN. I quite concur, and the report so states, that the city authorities here are bound to keep the peace; but the report states, and I repeat now, they do not do it, and you have no power to compel them to do it. Because they will not do it is the public property to be left exposed to depredation? Are foreign ministers and their families to be insulted, and their servants assaulted? Are we, the accredited ambassadors from the thirty-one sovereignties which compose this Confederacy, to expose our own lives, and our families to insult, because the authorities here will not discharge the obligation which is upon them? These are the questions which address themselves to my mind. I hold that it is your duty to see the public property defended; and when a foreign minister is accredited to this Government, it is your duty to see that he is protected, and that his property is defended against speculation, arson, burglary, and he and his family protected from insult. It is your duty to your constituents to feel at all times upon the streets, day and night, that you are not overawed by the assassin close upon your heels.

It is for these reasons that this bill was introduced, and it is for these reasons that I shall expect the Senate to pass it into a law, so far as the action of this body is concerned, as soon as possible.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. So far as the public property here is concerned, there is already a guard appointed by the Government to take care of and protect it; and I see no accounts of depredation committed on the public property. That now is in charge of guards appointed and paid by the Government. So far as outrages are concerned, they will increase; they are continuing to increase. The accounts of them in the city papers will be swelled every morning, until this bill is passed or rejected. I hope the bill will not be passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on postponing the special order for the purpose of continuing the further consideration of the bill to establish an auxiliary guard for the protection of public and private property in the city of Washington.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question pending is on the amendment of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER] to strike out of the third section of the bill the words "the Mayor of Washington, the district attorney for the District of Columbia."

Mr. MASON. I do not entirely agree with my colleague in his suggestion. I was one of the committee that framed the bill. It seemed to us that though the Mayor of Washington should have no connection whatever with the execution of the law, yet there was a propriety in having the benefit of his suggestions—not the present Mayor of Washington only, but any future Mayors of Washington—in reference to the regulation and organization of this force. It was simply to get the benefit of his suggestions, if he had any; and if he had not, there could be no harm. No executive power is given to him of any kind or description. The experience of one who is at the head of the police of such a city as Washington must be valuable. If not, it would not be used. I should be reluctant, therefore, to strike out that provision. It was thought also that the present district attorney, and all future district attorneys, might make useful suggestions in organizing this police; but if it should be found otherwise, of course it could do no harm.

Mr. HUNTER. This bill proceeds, as I understand, on the supposition that the authorities of the city of Washington will not keep the peace here, and that Congress is therefore to interfere in order to protect the Federal Government, the Federal officers, foreign ministers, and those attached to them, and strangers. If Congress has to interfere for that purpose, because of the neglect, the laches of the city of Washington, it seems to me that we ought not to call on the city authorities to interfere in the regulation of the force which we establish and pay. So far as the Mayors of Washington are concerned, I believe they have not been very efficient in preserving the peace of the city. I do not refer to any Mayor in particular; but I think, upon general principles, if we have to interfere on that ground, and raise and pay this force, it ought to be governed by Federal officers who are appointed and removable by the President.

Mr. WILSON. I think we had better retain this section of the bill as it is. It does not give any power to the Mayor, and it is well at any rate to be in harmony so far as we properly can with the Mayor of the city of Washington. I think this section of the bill, as framed by the committee, should stand, and that the Mayor of the city should be consulted or have a voice in framing the by-laws for the government of this force. The present Mayor of the city of Washington, and the inefficiency now manifest in the executive department of this city, perhaps, will not always exist.

I shall vote against this amendment. I shall vote for the bill in the hope that something will be accomplished for the preservation of law and order here in the national capital; but I confess I do not expect, and I think the Senate has no right to expect from it the reform which we desire, and which is needed. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] has made a suggestion here this morning that I thank him for making. I believe we are having now in Washington the fruits, the legitimate fruits, of the conduct of Judge Crawford of this city two years ago. I refer to his action in regard to what transpired in this body, and in regard to the murder of a man in this city by a member of the House of Representatives. I do not believe that officer is fit for the place he occupies; and I do not believe that we shall have a proper enforcement of the laws, that we shall have order, security of property and of life, while that man occupies the place he now fills.

The Senator from Tennessee thinks the city ought to protect life and property, and he says that the city authorities have the power to do so. Certainly they have; but they do not do it; and I think very little is attempted to bring it about. Why, sir, a few weeks ago, near where I dwell, and in the presence of a gentleman with whom I board, a person in this city drew a knife, a large bowie knife, and made an assault. He was taken on the spot by individuals who intended to take him before the police authorities. A police officer came up, took him himself, stepped a few steps, and told him to cut, and then raised a hue-and-cry, and went in another direction. Sir, there are police officers in this city who, I believe, would be arrested in New York or Boston on suspicion the moment they showed their faces. They are worthless men, in sympathy, and in harmony, I believe, with some of the men who are violating the laws in this city.

I shall vote for this bill. I shall vote for it in the hope that a force will be appointed composed of men of individual character—men who do not live daily in the rum-shops or the gambling-houses of this city. I hope men will be appointed who will perform their duty, and not run away, as we have the evidence that a police officer of this city did a few days ago, when two persons were shot near the Capitol, and refused to give his testimony, because he was afraid of his life. I hope, too, if it can be done, that this force will be appointed without any connection with politics; for all over our country, in this city, in the cities in my section of the country, and everywhere, law and order, the security of property and of life, are often put in peril by the appointment of worthless partisans to these positions. New York city, and other cities, have suffered in this way; and I believe it is one of the chief troubles in this city at the present time.

I want to ask the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, who has reported this bill, and has my thanks for reporting it, why it is necessary to give the power to the Secretary of the Interior to dismiss these men? I find, in the first section, that the chief is to be appointed by the President, and confirmed by the Senate; that the captain, lieutenants, and men, are to be appointed by the chief, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior; "and may be dismissed by the chief at his pleasure, or upon the order of the said Secretary." Now, it seems to me that there is no necessity for this double power of removal. I think the chief may remove the men, and should have the power to do so at pleasure; but I cannot see why the Secretary of the Interior should have it.

Mr. BROWN. I will state to the Senator my object in putting that provision there. I wanted to increase the responsibility of these men. I know that the relations which may exist between the chief and his men may be such that he will not at all times hold them to a proper accountability; and in such a case as that, I want the Secretary of the Interior (not the present one, as the Senator from Virginia has said, but any subsequent one,) to have the power of removal, independent of the chief.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Your bill does not accomplish that. He cannot act independently of the chief, as I understand the bill.

Mr. BROWN. I think he can. Certainly that was the design—that the chief shall have power to remove a man at his own will and that the Secretary may order him to do it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Read the bill.

Mr. BROWN. If it does not express that, it is not as I intended. The language is, "and may be dismissed by the chief at his pleasure, or upon the order of the said Secretary." If it does not carry out the idea I have expressed, let it be amended.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It reads differently from what I supposed.

Mr. BROWN. The object was, as I said before, to accumulate responsibility on these men. The chief must be appointed by the President. The President is not always accessible to those who choose to complain. Besides, his mind is too much engaged about other things. Then the whole execution of the law having been put, as I think, most properly under the control of the Secretary of the Interior, he being the only head of a Department that has anything to do with these local affairs, I thought it right that he should hear a complaint, even against a single guardsman, and on being satisfied that he was an improper officer, have power to order the chief to dismiss him, and then the chief would have no discretion about it. He may remove a man without consulting the Secretary, but is compelled to do it if the Secretary orders it to be done.

Mr. IVERSON. I shall vote for this bill, although I confess I do it with a great deal of reluctance. One of the grounds of my reluctance is that suggested by the honorable Senator from Tennessee; it is really holding out an inducement and encouragement to the city of Washington to neglect the duty paramount to that city to protect the lives and property of its citizens. After a while, the Federal Treasury will have to feed and clothe the citizens residing in Washington city. They call upon us to pave their streets, and we appropriate from two hundred to three hundred thousand dollars a year to pave the streets for the convenience of the people of Washington. They have called on us to expend two or three million dollars to furnish them with water. I voted for that, as differing from the ordinary appropriations. They called upon Congress, some years ago, to appropriate $2,000,000 to relieve them from a mortgage to the Dutch; and they call upon us every session to appropriate thousands upon thousands of money for the convenience and use of the people who reside here.

Is that just? Shall the people in my State be called on to contribute their mite to protect the lives and property of the people of Washington when they have their own to protect? It seems to me that the old maxim of charity beginning at home ought first to be applied before they call upon Congress and the General Government for these large sums for their protection. My opinion is, that if you pass this bill, and raise these one hundred men for an auxiliary guard, you will never hear of another policeman employed by the corporate authorities of the city of Washington. They will throw the whole responsibility, the whole expense, and the whole burden on Congress to protect their property and their lives.

Now, sir, are they not bound to perform at least some of this service themselves? Are they not interested in the preservation of order in the city? Ought they not at least to pay some portion of the public burden which is imposed upon the country to protect them from the rowdism which exists here? I think they are; and yet it seems to me that the passage of this bill will have the effect of exonerating the citizens of Washington from all this expense and all this trouble. They will go on, step after step, and year after year, until finally it will become necessary for Congress, from the public Treasury, to appropriate money every year to buy food and clothing for all the poor people in Washington city. In fact, that has been already attempted. Two years ago a proposition was introduced here to expend a large amount of money to buy wood for the poor people of the city of Washington, having no more claims upon Congress for such an appropriation than the people of New York, Boston, or any other city in the United States. Because we have exclusive jurisdiction over the District of Columbia, must we appropriate money to build up Washington city, and put money into the pockets of the people of this city? It is wrong in principle; it is not founded in justice or propriety that the people of the United States, in every quarter of the country, should be called upon to promote the individual interests of the city of Washington.

But, sir, I have much more serious objections to this bill, although, as I said, I shall vote for it as a mere experiment. I do not believe it is going to do any good; or very little good, if any. You are going to raise an auxiliary guard of one hundred men, to protect the order and peace of this city, and where are they to come from? You are to take them from the very class of society that commit these depredations. You authorize the raising of one hundred men, and where will you get them? From the very lowest class; because no respectable gentleman will enlist in this auxiliary guard. You give them a salary of $600, to be sure, but that is the lowest salary paid to any operative or employe under this Government here. The very workmen who work about this Capitol get that much. How many respectable men are going to engage in this menial service, to sit up all night and take care of the lives and property of citizens, on a salary of $600? Not a solitary respectable citizen will ever engage in it. You will have to draw the men from that very class of society who commit the depredations against which you are about to provide this guard—men who have associations with rowdies; men who have family connections with them; men who are of the same tastes and of the same grade, who sympathize with them, and instead of enforcing law and order, will be more apt to screen the depredators from punishment, and perhaps commit violations of law themselves.

Why, sir, it was but the other night that two men, near your Capitol, were knocked down by some ruffians and nearly killed. It is said one of them now lies at the point of death. Only the day before yesterday it leaked out that one of the men who committed the outrage was one of the police of this city. Another policeman saw the occurrence; knew who committed the depredation, and yet has, up to this time, for more than ten days, perhaps two weeks, refrained from disclosing the facts, because, as he stated before the magistrate, he was afraid that his life would be in danger if he developed the facts.

The city police, the auxiliary guard you are about to establish, will be part and parcel of the very rowdies against whose depredations you wish to guard; and what effect will that have? I have no doubt that many of the nightly acts of violence which have been committed in this city, and against which we protest, have been committed by this very class of individuals, who are doing it for the purpose of bringing about this very bill, in order to provide a place for themselves upon this auxiliary guard. They commit these depredations to urge upon Congress the necessity of raising an auxiliary guard of one hundred men, that they themselves may get employment at the public expense. I have no doubt that many of these depredations are committed for that purpose and with that object, and the very men whom you employ will be those persons who are themselves guilty of these horrible transactions. If they are not guilty themselves, they have cousins and brothers and uncles and friends and associates who are constantly committing them, and they will never step forward to execute the law as it ought to be executed.

Sir, there is but one way, in my opinion, in which you can ever have peace and order in the city of Washington, and that is to make it a military station. Place here three, or four, or five hundred regular United States troops, and use them as an auxiliary guard or police force—men who have no associations with the rabble of the city of Washington—men who have no connections with them, who will be kept aloof, under the discipline of their officers, from associations with the rabble who commit these depredations. When you have such a force you may expect order and peace in the city, and never before, in my opinion. I do not believe much good is coming out of this auxiliary guard, though I will vote for it as a mere experiment.

Mr. HOUSTON. This subject is a new one to me, and I have not had an opportunity to look into the bill particularly; but I understand the object to be the improvement and regulation of the police of the city of Washington. If I am correctly informed, it is very important to the security, and good order, and well-being, of the people here, that such a measure should be adopted. The gentlemen who have spoken in opposition to it have presented objections to the adoption of the measure; but they have not suggested a remedy that seems to meet the occasion. The honorable gentleman from Georgia says that when this force is organized, doubtless the very persons who would be selected are those who have contrived and produced the present condition of things, and it is a very deplorable one. But in the organization of the police it is not necessary that persons should be selected from the city of Washington, who are identified, either by relationship or association, with those who have been implicated in the disorders that have taken place. They may be selected from the adjacent country. The inducement will be sufficient to bring persons who are temperate, regular in their habits, and not identified with any of the disorders of this place, and let them know that they have a certain amount of character to maintain by their vigilance, their activity, and their fidelity, and you may organize a corps that will be very efficient, and become indispensably necessary. We all admit, that for the irregularities, the acts of violence, and other disorders, there ought to be a remedy; and it is a charge upon the people in Washington that it is necessary for Congress to make provision to employ a police force for the city of Washington. It is peculiarly situated and different from all other cities of the Union.

There is no other city that is extended over as vast an area as Washington in proportion to its population. It is in the suburbs and the streets remote from business that these outrages are perpetrated. Washington city is not a commercial place, and the men who resort here are not of the character for thrift and enterprise that are to be found in other cities. They are drawn here by various influences and circumstances. They are generally employes—certainly a large portion of them—of the Government; and they have not the means of contributing in the same proportion that the same number of inhabitants, if business men, would have. I grant you that they are not able to furnish a police, and make the improvements necessary not only to the general comforts of a city on so extended a scale; but it is very important that the members of Congress and the officers of the Government who resort here should have conveniences, some of which have been stated, as water supplies and other things necessary. The citizens cannot incur this expense. I do not think the citizens here ought to be reproached because they have needed wood for the comfort of the poor in winter, in extremely bad weather, when visitations of Providence have come upon the country. It seems to me that we ought to have some sympathy with the people of this District; and if we, from our connection with the Government, are more fortunate than they are, it ought not to exclude them from a certain degree of consideration and sympathy on our part.

It reminds me of a circumstance that took place when I was talking to a tribe of poor Indians, at Austin, in Texas. They were Lepas, or Muscalero Indians. They were charged with pilfering, robbing occasionally, and I was remonstrating against it, and inculcating the necessity or propriety for their own individual benefit, that they should assume a local habitation and a name. They were wandering, like Arabs, from place to place, encamping at different points. When game became scarce they abandoned their old encampment and went to another. They considered that it was necessary to remove in this way, and objected to having a local habitation. They said that when their deity was angry with them and called some person from among them, it was not good to stay there any longer lest some other person should die. They thought the best plan was to keep moving. I showed them, as I thought very conclusively, that the comforts of their wives and children would be greatly improved if they would build little huts and have spaces of ground around them for cultivation, where they could have domestic animals, and if game was scarce they would have the means of subsistence. After one of them had reflected for some length of time, he said to me, "you may tell the chief that I have thought of all he has said to me, and the truth is this at last: I believe that the white man's God is a very rich God, and he gives the white man everything he wants; but the Indian's God is a very poor God and he has nothing to give us, and the Indians have got nothing. That," said he, "is the difference between the white man and the Indian." It is pretty much so with legislators that come here; they have everything that is comfortable, and they do not think of the necessities of the people who have not got as rich a God as they have.

Mr. IVERSON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. HOUSTON. Certainly.

Mr. IVERSON. On this subject I beg leave to reply to the Senator from Texas, that I think the riches are on the other side. There is no city, perhaps, in the world, in which, for the population, so much money is expended out of the public Treasury as in the city of Washington. At the last session of Congress there were over four million dollars appropriated, to be expended within twelve months, in the District of Columbia, independent of the pay of members of Congress. Four million dollars, besides the pay of the employes of the Government, were appropriated to be expended within the District of Columbia, within twelve months; and then, when you come to consider the money spent here by members of Congress, by strangers who visit the city on public business, and by the clerks and other officers of the Government, you find that there is a vast amount of money expended here for the benefit of the resident inhabitants of the city of Washington. If they are not able, with all this vast expenditure of money among them, this immense circulation of coin amongst them, to keep up a police for the protection of their own citizens from the depredations of rowdies and cut-throats, it seems to me that the seat of Government ought to be removed to some other point. The very reason why the people of Washington do not furnish an efficient police is, because they expect Congress to do it. We already employ, I understand, an auxiliary guard of thirty men, paid by the Government of the United States; and the city of Washington employs what it calls a police—a very inefficient one, I confess; but it employs a police which, added to the thirty auxiliary guardsmen, ought to be sufficient, if they are efficient men, to protect the lives and property and good order of the city; but that is not accomplished. The reason why, perhaps, they do not employ an efficient police, such a one as is necessary and proper, to protect the lives and property of the people is, because they look to Congress to do it for them; and the very inefficiency, the very neglect on the part of the public authorities here grows out of this expectation that Congress is to pass this bill and provide a police for them at the expense of the Government of the United States. Here is a call on Congress to appropriate $75,000 or $80,000 a year, out of the public Treasury, to preserve the peace and good order of the city of Washington, and to protect the lives and property of its own citizens, who are bound by every principle of honor and propriety to protect themselves.

Mr. BROWN. My friend will allow me, at that point—

Mr. IVERSON. The Senator from Texas is entitled to the floor. He yielded to me.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator from Texas will allow me a moment. The Senator from Georgia speaks of this as though it were entirely new. This policy of imposing upon the General Government a portion of the duty of guarding this city is nothing new at all. By this bill you are only increasing a force which has existed here for a long time. The report shows how many men you have on this guard now—

Mr. IVERSON. I beg leave to ask the Senator from Mississippi—

Mr. HOUSTON. I am not willing to refer this controversy to the gentlemen themselves; I have a hand in it. [Laughter.] I believe I shall be ruled out, if I do not assert my claim. I really thought that the Senator from Georgia had risen to propound a question to me, or to correct some misapprehension of mine; and I had no idea that he rose with the deliberate intention of injecting a speech into the middle of mine. [Laughter.] He has effectually done it; and I shall proceed now, and I hope the gentlemen will wait until I have concluded before they interrupt me again. I seldom occupy a place on the floor as an orator, and I do not like to be interrupted in a speech, though I am willing to be catechised on all occasions.

But, Mr. President, I was going on to remark, in extenuation of the imputed offenses of the people here, that I did not think it was anything unusual for them to ask for assistance from Congress. No one supposes that they are capable of making the necessary improvements to make this place inhabitable, pleasant, or comfortable; or that they have the means to do it. The honorable Senator from Georgia speaks of the amount of money appropriated for the pay of the Government employes here. That is in compensation for their labor. They have their families to sustain out of it. They are non-residents, you may say; or, if you please, they are not generally property owners who receive these large sums. The employes of the Government here receive barely a pittance sufficient to subsist them and their families to a limited extent. They have no profusion of wealth to adorn, beautify, and decorate this city—not by any means. It is necessary that the Government should do it; and it is proper, befitting the honor of the nation. Unlike other cities, a large portion of the property here is exempt from taxation, because it belongs to the General Government. If the corporation of Washington were privileged to collect taxes from the Government upon its property erected here according to its value, they would be very well able to defray all the contingent expenses of the corporation; but they have not this privilege, and therefore they are beaten down. They have asked for nothing but what was necessary for the improvement of the city; and, if the employes of the Government have been required, and it has taken hundreds of millions to erect the public buildings, that does not make the community a wealthy one, and does not show that it is able to make all the improvements essential to the city.

The remedy suggested by the gentleman from Georgia, and the only one that struck me with great force, was, that we should have several hundred men of the regular army quartered in this city. Sir, I hope the youngest generations descending from us will never see a military guard in the city of Washington. It will never be here until liberty is crushed. Sir, I want no pretorian guards, no janizaries here. Give us guards of civilians; let them be alert, adroit, select men, who are capable of attending to their duty; and if it is an objection that men are selected here who are implicated in the disorders that have taken place, and have not character, appoint a responsible officer at the head, and if they are faulty, hold him accountable. But a military guard for such a purpose, I cannot agree to. What would be the character of such a guard? Of what men generally is your regular Army composed? Are they men who would be suitable guardians of the security and rights of citizens? Would they be beyond the temptations and allurements of vice, cupidity, and avarice? Are they the men to whose keeping you would be willing to confide the lives, the honor, the security of our citizens? Would you have individuals brought from other cities for this duty, not more moral and circumspect in their conduct, or of higher-toned honor, than citizens who could be selected here? The opportunities of gratifying thievish and pilfering inclinations are greater in other States than in the city of Washington. If you bring regular troops here for this purpose, they will be composed of persons from other cities; for it is there that the regular Army is picked up; composed of persons many of whom are not citizens of the United States, and have no sympathies with us.

I think the plan suggested by the honorable chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, who has properly matured it, who has considered it on former occasions as well as now, is the best plan that can be selected. Perhaps it is susceptible of amendment. If so, let us make the amendments that are necessary. The gentlemen who have been familiar with the police of cities, and who have had the misfortune to be reared under the restricted influences of cities, are the most competent persons to make the necessary suggestions of those amendments that are necessary to the perfection of this bill, if it is not now perfect.

I will vote for any bill that has for its object the improvement of the condition of the police of this city, so as to give security to person and property, suppress disorder, and put down mob violence. I will vote for any bill that seems to me to attain that object. I hope that some remedy will be found for the existing condition of things. I do not take the expense into account at all. It is true that the Treasury is poor now, and we are rather hard pinched for money. This results from having paid some of our debts before they were due. Within the last two years, I think there was great difficulty here on account of the apprehended dangers which were to result from a surplus in the Treasury. We were beset by the business men of New York and other cities to disgorge the Treasury of its vast surplus, so as to give a spring to business and sustain commercial transactions. The money was thrown into circulation, and I do not think the community has profited by it; for I believe the crash came when our money got all out of the Treasury. I am inclined to think that it is a good plan to keep a little there. My last few years' experience, at least, has inculcated the lesson that there is no danger but an emergency will arise to relieve the Treasury whenever it is necessary to deplete it. I trust we shall proceed immediately to adopt some plan that will afford a remedy for the disorders in Washington city. Let us establish an efficient police, that will give security to persons and property. Let the officer at its head be responsible for the preservation and maintenance of peace. If he does not secure it, let him pay the penalty. I will vote for any measure that tends to secure this result.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I thought, when the bill was introduced, that I should vote for it. I do not know but that I may do so now; but if I do, it will be with great reluctance, for various reasons, one of which is, that I have not confidence that any good will come out of it, because all the money we have appropriated heretofore, which is about twenty thousand dollars a year, for the police of the city of Washington, has been misapplied, and has not been spent for the purposes for which it was appropriated. I will make myself a little plain. Eight or ten years ago, I think, the city of Washington was as well regulated, so far as its police was concerned, as any city in the Union. You had at the head of the auxiliary guard, a police force paid by the Government, one of the most competent, faithful, honest, and efficient officers that I think was to be found in the police in any city in these United States, Captain Goddard. It turned out that there came about a revolution in the politics of the city, and this most faithful and efficient officer, who did not happen to coincide with the politics of the majority of the city, was turned out to make way for a political favorite of the party in power. From that day to this, the thing has run down, until this has now got to be the worst governed city on the face of the earth—probably the very worst.

Mr. BROWN. My friend will allow me to interrupt him, as I know he does not want to run into any historical error. When Captain Goddard was chief of police here, the police were appointed as this bill provides. Congress very improperly and unwisely transferred the appointment of the auxiliary guard, chief and all, to the Mayor of the city. It was in that way that he was turned out. This is a proposition to correct that error.

Mr. HALE. I know that. That is what I said. I did not say who did it. I said there was a political revolution in this city, and because Captain Goddard's politics did not happen to coincide with the majority, he was turned out—of course by the city authorities, and your $20,000 that you appropriated every year to preserve the peace of the city, was diverted from its proper and legitimate course by the city government, and made to reward political partisans, and from that day to this it has been growing worse and worse.

This bill proposes to remedy the evil in the manner suggested by the honorable Senator from Mississippi, that is, by transferring the police from the Mayor to the President. I do not know but that it may be a great improvement. I hope it will. But I want to say here that, unless we can, by some means or other, take this police out of the politics of this city and this country, and appoint men, and keep them in because they are fit for their place, you may have one hundred or two hundred men, and appropriate $75,000 or $175,000, and you will not remedy the difficulty at all. There is one source of the difficulty; and it is so all over the city. You have here the worst prisons in the whole country, and, I think, on the face of the earth—the worst set of prisons. What is the reason? Because when you go to appoint a warden, or a keeper, you do not look for a man that is fit for the place; it is not inquired of him whether he knows anything about it; it would be an objection to him if he knew much about it; but the place is given as a reward to some political hack. You may make this bill as perfect as human wisdom can make it; but if it falls into the same administration that your city police has, it will do no sort of good. If Captain Goddard had been let alone, and if the city government had made police, instead of politics, their business in spending the money you have appropriated, there would have been none of these difficulties, and we should not be reduced to the situation we are now in.

I am not certain that things have come to that pass, when the appropriate question is whether the seat of Government ought not to be removed? I say if we have got into such a community that life and property are not safe, and that a man cannot walk the streets except at the risk of running the gauntlet of assassination, the question is whether the seat of Government ought not to be removed; and I would not weigh equal to the small dust in the balance, the expenditures we have been at for the public buildings here in the city, for the whole expense of all the public buildings here does not amount to the annual increase of the Government expenditures in a single year, in President Pierce's administration. It is a mere flea-bite; it is not worth being thought of for a second; and I would sacrifice all this instantly, if we have come to that pass that we have got into a community where life and property are not safe. I say that the proper inquiry will be whether the proper remedy is not to remove the seat of Government to a civilized portion of the country, and to a place where the municipal authorities, if they cannot enforce the law, will, at least, make an attempt to enforce the law.

I know that these remarks are not exactly pertinent to the single question under consideration, which is the amendment of the Senator from Virginia; but some gentlemen have undertaken to speak of the causes of the state of things around us, and I may be indulged in a word on that point. Sir, it is a part of the general disregard of law which prevails all over the country, in high and low. As has been said, when you observe law disregarded and trampled upon in high places, you cannot expect those that are in the lower grades to observe it. I thought of this years ago, and I said it. I have thought of it when I have seen your Federal and your State judiciary, by the strong hand of power, trampling down the rights that were reserved to others and belonged to others—I mean that gross judicial usurpation which has practically annihilated trial by jury in several of the States, and in several of the judicial circuits of the United States. When I have seen that lawlessness upon the bench, I have thought there was an excuse and an apology for the ruffian outside of the court-house, when he perceived law and right trampled upon by those whose sacred duty it was to administer the law.

I have not a word to say about the individual who holds the highest place in the criminal court in this District; but I will say this about his administration: I believe it is utterly inefficient. I have been told by gentlemen who have been conversant with the practice here, (and gentlemen whose names I might give, if I saw proper, but I shall not do so unless I am urged a little harder than I am now,) that one of the great causes of the lawlessness and violence that reign in the streets of this city is the want of a prompt, faithful, efficient, and energetic administration of the criminal laws as it exists upon your statute-book; and I believe it. If I vote for this bill, I shall vote against the bill to raise the judge's salary.

I think there is great force in the suggestion made by the honorable Senator from Mississippi; and I do not know but what that consideration will finally induce me to vote for this bill. It is, that this being the Federal capital, the Federal Government owes it to those whose duties compel them to be here, to give them protection. But, sir, it is a reproach to Congress, it is a reproach to the city, it is a reproach to the country and to the Government, and the civilized world will take notice of it, that to-day, past the middle of the nineteenth century, one of the most lawless places, where violence stalks abroad unchallenged and unrebuked, is the very seat of your Federal Government, where your Federal Legislature sit to make laws, your Federal judiciary to expound them, and your Federal Executive to carry them into execution. It is a most curious anomaly, and one that must provoke the censure of Christendom and of the whole civilized world, to see the state of things which is apparent and manifest to everybody. I very much doubt whether the remedy is to be found in this bill; and I reserve to myself the question whether I shall finally vote for it. I think I shall; but I would vote for a bill to remove the seat of Government, I think, quite as readily.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Mr. President, I think there are peculiar circumstances in this case, which require from us, as a matter of duty, that we should provide for an adequate and efficient police in this city, so as to preserve the peace and secure the lives and property of individuals. The very fact of our session here draws together great multitudes of people, good and bad. We are, therefore, instrumental, to some extent, in producing the very evils which are now upon us. This District is under our unlimited control, I may almost say. We are the rulers and the governors of this city, and it is our business and our duty so to rule it as to secure to every one the peaceable enjoyment of his rights. We have failed to do that, and we are for throwing the blame now upon the city municipal authorities. We have constituted them, with the hope that they would afford sufficient protection. They have failed to do so. Are we at liberty, on that failure, to fold our arms and say, "We have done all that can be required of us; the city of Washington requires too much of us; the city of Washington ought to do more than it has done?" Are we to make these excuses, and let the evil go on increasing from day to day and from night to night? No, sir. It is as much our duty as it is our duty to govern any portion of the territories of the United States, to govern this District, so that peace and security shall be the result. From what I have heard, too, I must concur entirely with the gentlemen who have stated the great and extraordinary prevalence of crime now in this city, so that there is no security of person. Robberies are the business of every night almost; and murders or violent assaults mark every night. It ought to be suppressed—entirely and utterly suppressed.

But now, sir, how are you going to do it? I am willing that Congress shall employ a force; but are we to employ this sort of force and place it under the Government, as this bill does? You appoint a chief at $2,000, you appoint a captain at $1,200, you appoint four lieutenants at $800 per annum, to command one hundred men. I do not object to that organization, so far as it regards officers. There ought to be officers to increase the responsibility, and to head all the necessary force that may be sent out in the night to watch and guard the city and all its inhabitants. There are, though, to be one hundred men selected, and each of them paid $600 a year. These men are to be selected by the chief, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and the President is, in fact, to appoint all the officers. Now, sir, what is this but creating one hundred and six offices in the city of Washington; and all to be bestowed by the President of the United States and his Secretary of the Interior; and of the one hundred every man liable to be dismissed at any time the Secretary of the Interior thinks proper? The President can control all that force, for he can control his Secretary of the Interior; and he and the Secretary of the Interior have every man of this guard at their sovereign will and disposal every day and night in the year. Does that promise security? Do gentlemen feel security in that? You make the President and the Secretary of the Interior the masters of this city. They may preserve its tranquility, but what sort of a tranquility will it be? That tranquility which freemen are entitled to enjoy? The security which our Constitution and our laws promise to the citizens? Is it American freedom? Is it American security and American liberty? It makes the Chief Magistrate the despot of the city, if he pleases to be so. I desire not to be understood as having any allusion in these remarks to the President that now is, or to any one who may fill that high position. I speak upon principle.

This city of Washington, like every other city in the Union, is made up of parties of various politics. If I am rightly informed, there is one class of men in this city who entertain what are called American principles, and belong to what is called the American party. If I understand aright, of the class so called every one of them is hunted out of every office in this District, because of his opinions. I understand that at the last election held for municipal officers in this city, the military forces were called out to prevent these contending parties from actual violence. Where is the remedy to come from? Here are one hundred Federal officers to be raised. That is what they are. You talk about a chief, captain, lieutenants, and you come down, then, to the one hundred men. They are Federal officers, every man of them, call them by what name you will, holding their offices at the will of the President of the United States.

It is but very seldom that we have seen the military of this country allowed to approach the places of election. They have not been regarded generally in the feelings and opinions of the citizens of this country as the safest guardians to whom the ballot-box is to be intrusted. The cartridge-box is better fitted for them. The ballot-box has been supposed to be safer in the hands of citizens. Where the Government itself happens to be warmly enlisted against any particular party, these guards will come entirely from their adversaries. Any little uproar, any little violation of the peace, or any disorder at the polls, will furnish a pretext, if not for calling out the military—and it is not hard to find pretexts for that—at least for calling out this civil soldiery, this little Prætorian guard that occupies the city of Washington. It will be an easy and everyday matter; and we shall have not only the ordinary guarantees for our rights, but we shall have the imprimatur of the military stamped upon them! That is not my sense of American rights.

I cannot vote for this bill, I will not vote for it, unless the hands of the President and the hands of his Secretary are taken off it entirely. It is to guard the city of Washington. It is municipal in its character. Let the Vice President appoint them, or let the Speakers of the two Houses appoint them. It seems, from the argument of gentlemen, that Government officers are in danger. We belong to the Government. Who is better qualified to make this appointment than the heads of the two Houses? Let the appointment be given to anybody but the President of the United States—anybody but the chief of the general Executive Government. That is what I want, but I have no allusion to this President, or that President, or any President, present or to come. I oppose it upon principle.

I remember when the original bill for creating the auxiliary guard was before this House, I had the honor of a seat here then. It was framed as this bill is, so far as regards the appointment of officers. It was given to the President. It was but thirty men I believe. I objected to it at that time, and it was upon that objection that the appointment as it was proposed to be given to the President was taken away and the appointment made entirely municipal, given, I believe, to the Mayor of the city. But that bill will show, by a reference to the record, that it first gave the appointment to the President, and the Senate disagreed to it for that reason, and I made the objection then, as I do now. Sir, the little corps of guides, twenty-five in number, was expanded in the course of a few years into the imperial guard of France, amounting, I believe, at its greatest number, to fifty thousand men. That corps of guides was the model. That corps of guides was enlarged and expanded and became the mighty and magnificent imperial guard of France.

The evil is a great one which is now to be corrected, I admit; but it is exactly in such glaring and flagrant instances that we are apt, in the impetuosity of our feelings, to go beyond strict principles, to overlook all other dangers and all other consequences, and look to nothing but the evil that is to be suppressed. I believe these one hundred men would be efficient in protecting the city, and driving out those villains who now molest it. In any other form than this, I will vote for it. It is not necessary to the President to be connected with this matter; it is rather derogatory to the President. It is rather making him the ruler of cities, like giving him the appointment of high constable of the city. The President can derive no honor from it. There may be danger; there may be mischief in it, and I do not know how far the time may be off when certain proscribed members of a Congress may be placed under the particular vigilance of this auxiliary presidential guard. I cannot vote for it, unless gentlemen can find out some other mode of appointment, and will take this matter entirely out of the hands of the President and Secretary of the Interior. Let it be municipal in its character, or let the appointments be vested in some other power than that provided by the bill.

Mr. BROWN. I am sorry to find my friend from Kentucky—and when I call him friend he knows I use the word in no light sense—opposed to this bill, because I know his power in the Senate. I propose to answer some of his objections; and I trust I shall have his attention while I do so. He complains that the military were called out during the last summer to keep the peace between contending parties, and seems to apprehend that they were called out as against the American party, of which he is a member. I believe that, to some extent, is true; and that furnished one of the strong reasons, allow me to say to the Senator from Kentucky, for bringing in this bill. That an armed soldiery should be paraded in the streets of the Federal capital, to keep the peace, was to me, in my far-off home in Mississippi, one of the most distasteful, not to call it by a stronger name, pieces of intelligence that I ever received. For the very reason the Senator assigns for opposing the bill, I justified myself in bringing it in, that you should have a police force proper, sufficient to keep the peace, so that hereafter there should be no necessity for bringing the military power of the Government into action.

But the Senator from Kentucky objects to the appointment of the chief of this police force by the President of the United States. If you have such an officer the appointing power must be somewhere. If my friend, with all his experience, had pointed out some other mode less objectionable to him through which you could get this officer, I should probably have accepted it. I never cared to impose the duty on the President, but it had to rest somewhere. Suppose you allow the people of Washington to elect him at the ballot-box, will you get efficiency then? Suppose you allow any other Federal officer below the dignity of President to make the appointment, will you get it then? Who shall appoint him? You must have a head to this police force. How are you to get him? After looking all over the field, the committee came to the conclusion that the best way was to allow the President to appoint him; not because the President desired to do it, nor because we desired to have him do it, but because it seemed to us that you could get him more readily, and more free from objection in that way than in any other. If he be elected by the people here, the very marauders, house-breakers, assassins, and murderers, who perpetrate these outrages will go to the ballot-box, and perhaps elect your chief of the guard. That will not do. I wanted to take the whole influence and power of this police force outside of the District, and intrust it to hands that would have no motive but to use it for the highest and best purposes; but if it be suggested that the chief of police can be more properly appointed by anybody else than the President, I will hear the suggestion, and adopt it, if it strikes me as being right; but I know of no other way of obtaining him.

Then it is objected that power is given to the Secretary of the Interior. Well, sir, who else would you give it to? Ought not the powers given in the bill to be intrusted to somebody? Who shall have them? Where else would the Senator from Kentucky locate them? I want responsibility, and responsibility outside of the District of Columbia. I want responsibility to the Federal Government. I want the scoundrels who parade your streets, dagger in hand, to be assured that the whole power of this Government is to be employed to put them down, cost what it may, in money or in physical force, that they shall be driven from the purlieus of the capital.

I am not willing to trust the execution of this law to anybody elected by the people of Washington. It is a Federal law. I would have it enforced by Federal authority, with the whole power of the Government to back it up. It was for that reason that the bill was so framed as to give the appointment of the chief to the President, and the carrying out of the details of it to the Secretary of the Interior. Though the present Secretary comes from my State, and is my honored and valued friend, he was not introduced into this bill on that account. If it be thought that any other Federal officer, not connected with the District, had better be intrusted with the execution of this law, say so, and I will allow it. Never a word passed between the present honored head of that Department and myself in reference to this bill—not one word, sir. I doubt if he even knows that you propose to impose these obligations upon him. Certainly I never told him, and I dare say he has never seen the bill. The duty is imposed upon him because he is put at the head of all affairs which relate exclusively to the interior concerns of the Government.

But the Senator from Kentucky says that when the original proposition was first brought into Congress many years ago to create this auxiliary guard, he objected to allowing the President of the United States to appoint the head of it. Nevertheless, it was so passed, as I understand the history of it. Afterwards it was changed, and the appointment of the chief of the guard was given to the Mayor of the city; and from that day forward, the efficiency of the guard has dwindled, and dwindled, and dwindled, until it has absolutely become contemptible, and stinks in the nostrils of every citizen of Washington and the whole country. I undertake to say it is the most inefficient, contemptible, and disgraceful guard that ever watched over the peace of any city, and has been made so because it is mixed up in your municipal elections. The policeman, as the report states, is expected to be the guard of his own candidate at the ballot-box, and not the guard of the peace, happiness, prosperity, and security of the city. If you intend to have an efficient police force here paid by the Government, then put it beyond city influence; let neither the Mayor nor the Councils have anything to do with it. Make it a Federal police.

I gather from the general scope of my honorable friend's speech, that while he thought this police would be efficient, and while he thought it eminently necessary for the purposes for which it was designed, still he would not go for it because the bill conferred patronage in the wrong direction. I have already said, if that be his opinion, pray tell me where else you will give the patronage, and I will give it there? I am not looking to it as a question of patronage. But my friend will excuse me for saying that he and I put a different estimate on the important question of keeping the peace in this city, protecting property from the incendiary's torch, and life from the assassin's dagger. He would expose all this, leave houses to be fired at night, and lives to be taken away as men walk the streets, because, forsooth, patronage may be intrusted to improper hands! I care not who has the appointment of the chief. Give it to anybody. Elect him by the Senate; elect him by the House of Representatives; give the appointment to the Vice President or the Speaker—give him to anybody: I care not who has it. It is no design to give the President the appointment of another officer. The bill proposes to give it to him simply because he, of all men, seemed to the committee to be the most proper man to make such an appointment; and it gives to the Senate of the United States a control over the nomination.

Now, let me say to gentlemen on the other side, Americans and Republicans, that if the President sends a mere partisan nomination here, I pledge myself before the Senate and the world to vote for the rejection of it, and I think I can say as much for nine tenths of all the gentlemen on this side of the House. The committee of which I am chairman, which ordered me to bring this bill here, adopted an informal resolution that in case the bill passed, we would, as a committee, wait on the President and tell him that this bill was not in any sense to be executed as a mere party measure; that it was a bill intended for the security of life and property in Washington, and that it must be executed independent of all party considerations. If Mr. Goddard, whose name has been introduced into this debate, be the most proper man for chief marshal, I hope the President will appoint him; and if he be not, I hope he will select some one else; and if he cannot find a proper man in Washington, I feel perfectly justified in assuring Senators that he will go beyond the limits of Washington for a chief; he will go to New York, or Philadelphia, or Boston, and if a proper chief cannot be found there he may even go beyond the limits of the United States, though that enunciation, I dare say, would offend my friend from Kentucky. The imposition of a foreigner, I suppose, would not be distasteful to him; but I care not where he gets the man. The friends of the measure expect it to be executed in the spirit in which it was brought here, that proper men are to be selected, without any sort of reference to their politics or to the place of their birth.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not understand for what length of time the chief of police is to hold his office by the terms of the bill.

Mr. BROWN. No limitation is imposed in the bill; but, under a general law, he would go out of office at the end of four years, which is the limitation of the term of all officers.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not rise for the purpose of discussing the bill at length, but simply to call the attention of the Senate to this clause of the Constitution:

"The Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments."

I think there can be no doubt that this is an officer of the United States, being an officer created by a law of Congress; and therefore the appointing power under the Constitution must necessarily be vested in the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; or in the President alone, or in the courts of law, or in the head of a Department. A suggestion that the officer be chosen by the Senate and the House of Representatives, or be appointed by the Vice President and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, would, under the Constitution, be improper.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BIGGS in the chair.) The question before the Senate is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HUNTER. I propose to modify the amendment so as simply to strike out from the third section the words, "the Mayor of Washington." My purpose is, as this is to be a force of the Federal Government, that it shall be ruled entirely by the Federal authorities.

Mr. BROWN. I am not particular whether that provision be stricken out or not, but I desire simply to assign the reason why it was inserted, and I hope the Senate will recollect it when they vote. That clause was put in because there will necessarily be a double police—this auxiliary guard, as it is called, and the day police. The Mayor of the city does appoint the day police, and he makes regulations for them; and I was fearful that unless he had something to say in fixing the regulations for the night police, there might be some conflict in the regulations for the two forces, which might work badly. As, under the bill, he had nothing to do, except simply to perform that little duty of helping to make the regulations for the force, I thought his counsels had better be taken on that ground, and that alone.

Mr. PUGH. Do I understand that this bill is purely for a night watch? I think you had better take them for the whole twenty-four hours. If you give them two dollars a day, they can very well afford to do it.

Mr. BROWN. If you make it a day watch and a night watch both, the danger suggested by the Senator from Georgia may occur that the city will withdraw its police entirely. Heretofore, let Senators understand, the city has guarded the day and the General Government the night, and we do not propose to change that regulation; but we propose, at the proper time, to introduce an amendment, making the auxiliary guard specifically a night watch, liable to be called upon for day service, in case of emergency.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I would suggest to the Senator from Mississippi whether the power of appointing the chief had not better be vested in the chief judge of the District of Columbia. I think that would be the most proper depository of it. It is the province of the judicial department in one sense to keep order and preserve the peace, and I should be better satisfied if the power of appointment were given to the courts. I should have no objection to the bill if I were perfectly sure that it would always be executed in the spirit in which I know my friend from Mississippi offers it. But it is liable to abuse. I think it would be wisest and best, in legislating on this subject, if we can do so, to derive all the benefit possible from this bill, while at the same time we avoid all dangers of abuse. It is from no personal objection to the President, or any head of a Department, but on principle, that I prefer that the appointment should be made by another officer; and I would suggest the chief judge of the District.

Mr. BROWN. If Senators will allow the vote to be taken on the present amendment, I will reply to the suggestion of my friend from Kentucky.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Virginia as modified.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BROWN. Now, I will reply to the Senator from Kentucky, and state why I should prefer the bill standing as it is, to having the appointment of this officer devolved on any of the judges here—even the chief judge of the circuit court. I hope the chief of police will be not only a man of character, but one who will feel the dignity of his position, on account of the source from which he receives it—not a man who will be above his business, but one who will feel that he is a trusted officer of the Government; that he has not only been appointed by the President, but that he has been approved by the Senate; that he is an officer in commission, a man of some consequence. I want him to feel the full degree of responsibility that is devolved upon him. I want him to feel that Congress, in passing this bill, and making this provision for his appointment, has not been acting idly and without full consideration of what it is doing. If he gets his appointment from one of the judges, he will be like the clerk of a court; he will do things by rote, by routine; he will do very well while you are watching him; but I am afraid he will not feel the same degree of responsibility to the public at large, and hardly to himself, that he would if he got his appointment in the manner pointed out by this bill. If I thought the mode suggested by the Senator from Kentucky would procure us quite as efficient an officer, I would accept it; but I do not think it will. As I said before, I want the chief of the guard, when he is appointed, to feel that he is a man of some consequence; that the Senate of the United States has passed upon him and determined that he was the right sort of man for this position. Then I shall hope for the highest possible degree of efficiency that you can get in such a man. I cannot, for that reason, accede to the suggestion.

Mr. HUNTER. I would suggest to the Senator from Mississippi that I think he has one officer too many here, which adds unnecessarily to the expense. What is the necessity for this chief of police? Why will not a captain answer?

Mr. BROWN. He will not, for the reason that the chief of police ought to be stationary, except on very extraordinary occasions, like the mayor of a city, so that every one can always know where to find him, and not have to travel about over a vast city like this, from Georgetown to the Barracks, and from the Navy Yard to the Potomac bridge, to find the chief. He ought to have an office at a stated place, and be there during stated hours. The captain of the police, on the other hand, ought to be a man pursuing his way through the city constantly, looking everywhere, attending to the wants of the city everywhere. I think, myself, that all these officers are necessary, and I cannot consent to omit any of them. At the suggestion of the honorable Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN,] I propose to amend the bill in line of the first section, by adding after "to be paid monthly," the words "to serve during the night, and in the day time when specially ordered to do so." There is a blank in the eighth section—

Mr. FESSENDEN. Before the blank is filled, I wish to increase the sum appropriated for contingencies. It is now $5,000. I move to make it $10,000. The amendment is in section four.

Mr. BROWN. I shall not oppose that amendment; but it is proper that I should explain why we put in that sum, and the purpose of putting it there. We put in $5,000, being a little distrustful at the time whether the sum was large enough; but we did not want, upon a new bill of this sort, to crowd appropriations to an extent which might possibly destroy it in the estimation of some of its friends. The appropriation is really a secret service fund. It is called a contingent fund in the bill. What the real object is I may state here. It was not so expressed in the bill, because it did not seem right to be using that sort of language in an act of Congress. The object of the money is to enable the police authorities to employ detectives, and when villains congregate in the city, to employ secret men, not with uniforms or badges, but men who can be relied upon to go out into the community and look after them, to bring men here even from other cities, to detect and expose them—that is the object of it. Five thousand dollars we thought, for the first, would be sufficient for that purpose. We did not know how it was going to work here. It may be that not a dollar of it will ever be used; it may be that the sum is not large enough. On discussion in the committee, we thought $5,000 would do. If the Senate prefer $10,000, very well. I do not think, myself, there is any risk to run in voting for it, because it will not be used unless there be a necessity for using it. If there be a necessity for using more than $5,000, a larger sum ought to be voted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN. I now propose to fill the blank in line three of the eighth section of the bill with the words "$75,000," and I will explain it while I am up. The section will then read:

That the sum of money necessary to carry this act into effect, not to exceed $75,000, be, and the same hereby is, appropriated.

The sum is made up in this way: For chief of police, $2,000; one captain, $1,200; four lieutenants, at $800 each, $3,200; one hundred men, at $600 each, $60,000; making $66,400 in all. Then the bill provides that you are to have guard-houses. I have inquired into that. I think they have one now. They will probably want three more, it may be four. For that purpose we propose to add $8,600. That every one will see will be an expense which can be incurred but once. When you have once provided the houses, they will stand for a long series of years. The whole expense of the bill, then, will be $66,400 for salaries; and $5,000 for the contingent item, if that should never be increased, would make the whole expense $71,400 annually; and, for the time being, we ask an appropriation of $75,000.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I have an amendment to offer as an additional section; but I present it now, as it will affect the preceding section containing the blank proposed to be filled by the Senator from Mississippi. The amendment which I propose is:

And be it further enacted, That a tax sufficient to pay two thirds of the annual expense incurred by carrying this act into effect, shall be annually assessed upon the real and personal property and polls of the city of Washington, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, who is hereby authorized and directed to make such rules and regulations as shall be necessary for the collection of said taxation; and the same shall be assessed and collected in the manner now provided by law for the annual collection of the municipal taxes of said city.

There seems, sir, to be a perfect agreement on one point—that the city of Washington ought to incur the expense, and ought to be held responsible for the efficiency of its police; and then the inquiry is presented, how are we to enforce this duty upon them? how can we compel the city of Washington to establish an efficient police? It is very clear, that if we go on and establish a police force for their protection, we can lay a tax on them sufficient to defray the expense of that police.

One main argument relied upon for the passage of this bill is the necessity for protecting the persons who come to the seat of Government—foreign ministers, members of Congress, and others; and on this account it is said to be the duty of the Government to aid to some extent in establishing an efficient police at this point. If this bill be passed, the result will be that the city will dispense with its police, and rely entirely upon the police established by the Federal Government. Then, it seems to me, if the Government incurs one third of the expense of this police, and thereby imparts efficiency to it, the city property, polls, and personality ought to pay the other two thirds of the expense. This seems to me to be fair and just. All the other cities of the Confederacy impose taxes upon the property of their citizens to defray the expenses of the city for keeping up a police force, and for other municipal purposes. Why should Washington city be exempt from the burden of taxation for such purposes? If you adopt this amendment requiring them to pay two thirds of the expense, we can enforce it; and when it is understood that the city of Washington must incur a large proportion of the expense incurred by the creation of this police force, they will be more efficient, and they will come up to the aid of the Government in the execution of the law.

Several gentlemen have suggested to me to change the proportion which my amendment proposes to lay upon the city and the Government, and to divide the expense half and half. To accommodate gentlemen, I will change it so as to provide that half of the expenses shall be borne by the city of Washington. Then it will be necessary to change the preceding section, so as to read:

"That the sum of money necessary to carry this act into effect, not to exceed one half of the annual expense to be incurred in consequence of raising said auxiliary guard, be, and the same hereby is, appropriated."

And then will come in the additional section which I have proposed, and this, it seems to me, will place the matter on a fair basis.

While I am up, I cannot help stating that I concur in the principle enunciated by the Senator from Kentucky in regard to the creation of offices, and conferring additional appointments on the President of the United States. So far as the Secretary of the Interior and the President of the United States are concerned, there is no one here or elsewhere that has more confidence in them than I have. I have no sort of doubt that they would execute the law faithfully and efficiently; but there is a principle involved in this matter. I am opposed to increasing executive patronage in any shape, if it can be avoided; but here is a provision not only for one hundred officers, but for two hundred, at the discretion of the Executive. The Senator from Texas seemed to have his fears alarmed, and I agree with him on that point, at the idea of bringing any portion of the standing Army to suppress riots or put down mobs. What is the force you now propose to raise? I suppose it should be more properly called an auxiliary to your standing Army. It is to have captains and lieutenants appointed by the Executive, responsible directly to him for the manner in which they discharge their duty. I am for building up no pretorian bands here, either under a Democratic or any other Administration, I care not by what name they may be called. I am for building up no military guard here, to be placed at the discretion of the Executive. Everything must have a beginning: you begin now with two hundred at discretion, one hundred absolutely. Where will it end?

It is said that party has got into the appointment of the members of the present auxiliary guard, and that party influences have rendered them inefficient. In the name of common sense, and all that is sacred and right, will you ever have an Administration here that is not a party Administration? Will you remove the difficulty that is complained of? Will not appointments always be fashioned by party? Unquestionably; and the very difficulty which you desire to avoid will be fastened upon the country by this bill. If it is to pass, let us impose half the expense, at least, upon the city of Washington, and thereby make it feel its responsibility. If the citizens here have to pay taxes for this force, they will impart more efficiency to the execution of the law.

I had hoped that this bill would be postponed, but I am prepared to act upon it now. I have no unkind feelings towards the citizens of Washington, more than I have towards the citizens of any other city; but I must say that there is a disposition manifested here which must be apparent to all, even the most unobservant, to put the entire expenses of this District on the Government of the United States. An avenue cannot be graded unless Congress does it; streets cannot be lighted up unless Congress pays for doing it. There is a continual pressure on Congress to appropriate public money to sustain the District of Columbia. I have had some tables prepared which, at an appropriate time, when the proper measure shall come before the Senate, I will present, showing the amount that has been expended in this District for Government purposes. Over twelve million dollars drawn from the people of the different States have been poured out at this capital, expended here. The city of New York, or St. Louis, or Baltimore, or Philadelphia, or New Orleans, or Cincinnati, instead of asking you to give them donations out of the Treasury, would pay your Treasury a bonus if you would locate the seat of Government there. Is it no benefit to a community to have large sums of money, which are drawn from the great mass of the people, poured out in its midst? Do we not know that the expenditure of large sums of money at this point is beneficial to this portion of the community at the expense of other portions of the community?

The Senator from Texas has alluded to the fact that the Government has property here which is exempt from taxation; but how did the Government get that property? A donation was made to the Government on condition that Congress would locate the seat of Government here. Parties said, we will give you so many lots, and thereby realize immense fortunes by bringing the seat of Government here; and now they turn round and talk about taxing the property of the United States, when it was speculation on their part that got the seat of Government here. In what State or county in the Union do you ever hear of the capitol of a State or the court-house of a county being taxed, or any other public buildings? Every locality that gets a location of this kind considers that the benefits conferred by the location go far beyond any advantage that would result from the little tax that would be imposed upon its property. Which is worth most to the citizens of Washington, the large amounts expended by you on public buildings and the large appropriations made for local improvements here, or the little money which they would derive from the privilege of taxing the Government property? Twelve million dollars, as I remarked before, have been expended here, drawn from the States; and of this sum, over six million dollars have been given for the local improvements of this District, for the especial and particular benefit of the people here.

I am merely looking into this matter on principle. I have no objection to the citizens of Washington getting all they can; but while they are guarding their interests, it is our duty, as representatives of the States and of the people, to guard their interests, and see that their money is not taken from them and improperly expended in local improvements in this particular locality. What authority have we to make appropriations in the District of Columbia more than we have in any other section of the country? I know that it is argued by some that we have exclusive legislative powers here. That may be true; but because we have the power of exclusive legislation, does that prove that we have unlimited legislation? I know there is no other authority that can legislate for the District of Columbia but Congress. But because Congress has exclusive legislation, it does not follow that your power of legislation is unlimited, and that you can appropriate money here under the Constitution of the United States that you cannot appropriate elsewhere. You have no more power to take money from the Federal Treasury and appropriate it to local improvements in the District of Columbia, than you have to appropriate it for such improvements in St. Louis—not a single scintilla of power more. The argument on this point results from confounding a power of exclusive legislation with unlimited legislation. We have no power to appropriate money in the District of Columbia for local purposes more than we have elsewhere.

It is said that the people of the District have no representation in Congress. Well, suppose they had a Delegate in Congress, the same as the Territories have: what would it be worth to them? Give them a Delegate; I am for giving them one; I would rather they had one; it would stop clamor, so far as that goes. They are now better represented, and get larger appropriations, than they would if they had a Delegate in the Congress of the United States.

I am willing to confer all the power that Congress possesses upon the municipal authorities here; to give them power to lay and collect taxes; to give them power, if they have it not already, to establish that description of police which will be efficient to sustain the reputation and character of the population, so that the laws may be enforced, and persons be protected in life, liberty, and property.

I make these remarks out of no unkind feeling of prejudice to the people of the District, but I have seen how these appropriations have gone on from year to year. I have seen the feeling and the disposition that are manifested here. The public mind, in this locality, seems to be exercised in one particular channel: that is not in mechanics; it is not in agriculture; it is not in commerce; it is not in the improvement of the soil; it is not in producing and bringing the products of labor here and selling them in one of the best markets in the world; but the whole mind here is occupied and employed in devising ways and means by which we can get into the people's Treasury, divide it among ourselves, at our own discretion, for our particular benefit. If you refuse any appropriation they may ask or demand, it is very common to say: Why, you have exclusive legislation; the District belongs to Congress! I do not countenance any such idea. They are freemen. I assume that they are capable of self-government. I assume that they have got resources, as much so as the people have in other portions of the country, to pay their own taxes to enforce their own laws; and if they have not, what a commentary it is upon the population crowded around the Federal Government of the United States; that there is not enough moral power, that there is not enough capacity here to govern themselves, but they must call upon Congress to govern them—must go out to the States and bring in somebody here to govern them! Is it not a commentary on the Federal Government, on the population surrounding Congress and coming in contact with the elite, not only of the United States, but of all parts of the civilized world?

I shall vote against the bill, whether the amendment is adopted or not; but it seems to me that it is nothing but fair and just that one half or two thirds of the expense incurred in raising and sustaining this auxiliary, little standing army, whose appointment and control are under the Federal head, shall be incurred by this population. I am in hopes the Senate will adopt the amendment. After that, I am in hopes they will reject the bill.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. BROWN.) Did the Chair understand the Senator from Tennessee as moving his proposition as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I wanted to suggest the amendment, and show the necessity of making the eighth section correspond with my amendment when added as an additional section.

Mr. BROWN. I will suggest to the Senator that he let us go on regularly with the bill, and have the vote taken on my amendment, and then he can offer his, as it comes in as an additional section. I have no objection, however, to let him go on.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. We can come back to that section, and make it suit.

Mr. BROWN. I withdraw my motion until the Senator's amendment be disposed of.

Mr. GREEN. I intend to vote for this bill. I shall vote for it in almost any shape in which it may be placed. Exclusive jurisdiction over this District was given by the Constitution of the United States, for one very especial purpose, which can never be accomplished if we rely upon any other authority than Congress for our personal protection. It was that Congress might have the power and the means at all times to protect themselves. There is no personal security in this city. No man, in the discharge of his duty, walking the streets, according to the reports that come to me, is safe. If this power for protecting ourselves be given, and if the necessity for the exercise of the power exists, why shall we stop to say that a portion of the expense ought to be parceled out on the city, and a portion fall on the public Treasury of the General Government? Why, sir, if the city authorities will not do their duty, Congress must do theirs. It is not only personal protection to members of Congress, not only personal protection to officials having Government business to transact in this city, but it is a high, international duty, for which we could be held justly responsible, to protect foreign ministers, their agents, and their servants, as they ought to be protected in a civilized country. When the exclusive power to protect this District has been vested in our hands, and we see that that protection has not been given, to hesitate on the score of expense for twenty-five, or fifty, or one hundred, or five hundred thousand dollars, looks to me as little and beneath the dignity of the Congress of the United States.

It is true, there are other interests to be protected besides personal interests. There is property to be protected; and, so far as that is concerned, the city ought to bear its proportion of the expense; but if the city does not come up and do it, we must do it. It is not enough to hold out a threat, and say the seat of Government shall be removed. Let us do our duty, not by threatening others that, if they do not do theirs, we will do so and so; but let us do ours now. Let us do ours when the necessity for the exercise of that power exists. That necessity does now exist. In the ordinary administration of municipal affairs in the city government, the city bears the whole expense. Its common council, its mayor, its administration of municipal law—all is borne by the city without the power of taxation upon any of the Federal property. It is true, doubtless, that the original proprietor of this tract of land was anxious to have the seat of Government established here; but the present citizens of Washington had no agency in that. They purchased as other men, and they are not to be held responsible for the benefits arising to the original proprietor of the land in consequence of the location of the capital at this point; but even if they were, we must discharge our duty; and how shall we do it so efficiently, to accomplish so many beneficial results, as in passing the bill now pending before the Senate?

To vest the power of appointment of the chief of police, the head of this guard, with the President, I can conceive to be no objection whatever. The appointing power must exist somewhere. If we see by experience that the corporation of Washington will not exert the power to protect us, we must protect ourselves; and we, by the passage of this bill, can vest that appointing power where we will to correct it. To say, however, that it ought to be vested in the Vice President, as the venerable Senator from Kentucky asserted, shows a total disregard of the Constitution of the United States. In no single instance can you, in conformity to the Constitution of the United States, vest the appointment of any officer in the Vice President. If it be thought most advisable to vest it in the Supreme Court, or in the district court, as the chairman of the committee well remarked, so let it be done; if it be thought most advisable to vest it in the head of one of the Departments, so let it be done; but under the Constitution, you cannot vest it in the Vice President of the United States. He is precluded by the terms of the Constitution. But I apprehend no difficulty from this, nor do I think the creation of this one office will so increase the patronage of the President as to make the Presidency an object to be scorned and shunned by aspirants for that very distinguished position. I expect it will still be sought with the same anxiety as heretofore, no more and no less. As this is a Federal power, to be exercised for Federal protection, where else could it be so properly vested as in the Federal head? And that Federal head is responsible to the whole country; not alone to the District of Columbia, but to all the States and to all the people; and an enlightened public sentiment will restrain him from an abuse of this power. I have no fear of an abuse by the present chief of the executive department, or any of his successors.

So far as this army of officers is concerned, of which we have heard so much—the six hundred now holding clerkships in the Departments here—they are not a police; they ought not to be made a police. They have their duties to do for the Government in their appropriate sphere, and doing them, we must protect them when they walk the streets, when they proceed upon their ordinary avocations. Nor is it true that all are turned out who happen to differ in opinion with the Executive. There are many instances, and, I am willing to say to the Senator from Kentucky, more than meets my approbation, in which the enemies of the Government are kept in its employment. Where the responsibility exists, let the responsibility be taken, and stand before the country for justification.

All this, however, is outside the real question. There is a pressing necessity for this measure. We know that no man is secure in his life if he walks the streets of this city, according to the common reports that come, official reports that come to us in a tangible shape, from which there can be no escape. As we have a duty imposed, corresponding with the authority vested, to protect the District, to protect the city, to protect foreign ministers, their secretaries, attaches, agents, and servants, as we have a right to protect ourselves, as the Federal Government must perform its functions here, as we do not have that protection without the aid of Government money, sanctioned by governmental authority, we ought to pass this bill, or some other that will give an efficient police in the city of Washington.

Mr. BROWN. I want to say a word in reference to the amendment proposed by my friend from Tennessee. Even if it were right to introduce an amendment of that character to this bill, his is wrong, because he proposes to divide the expense of keeping up the specific police equally between the city and the nation.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I desire the Senator from Mississippi to understand my idea in offering the amendment. I am not influenced by the amount of money involved at all; but by imposing a part of this additional expense on the population here, you will give efficiency and effect to the bill, and you will impart more efficiency by reaching them through the taxing power, than in any other way.

Mr. BROWN. I never supposed that my friend from Tennessee cared anything about the amount of money involved; but his proposition is based upon no principle at all, or rather upon a false principle. It proceeds on the idea that the city ought to bear one half of the expense of this force. This, as I have once or twice explained before, is a night police. If the city is bound to bear one half the expense of the night police, why should not the General Government bear one half the expense of the day police? This whole proposition, I beg Senators to remember, goes on the idea that the city takes charge of it during the day, and you undertake to take charge of it during the night. The city provides, at the expense of the city treasury, for a day police; and you provide, at the expense of the national Treasury, for a night police.

Heretofore, notwithstanding all the charges which are made as to Washington being a constant drain on the Treasury, what is the fact? The report shows that the city has been paying all the time more than the Government; that while you have paid $18,000, the city has paid $19,000 and upward every year. What is true now? If this bill passes, it will call out one hundred policemen. How many has the city? At the time the report was written, they had within three as many as you have. Now, they have got their hundred, and what we propose is that you furnish your hundred. That is all there is of it; and all this outcry that the Government is doing everything, and the city doing nothing, is not true in point of fact. Senators mistake the true facts of the case, as they always do. I do not wish to delay the passage of this bill; I want action upon it, and action now; but at some convenient season, in the discussion of some District bill, I shall undertake to show that the Federal Government never has paid more than its due proportion of the expense of maintaining the city. Gentlemen who indulge themselves here in constant declarations that this city is a charge on the Federal Government, may think my statement is extraordinary; but I have looked into the record, and I tell you that Congress has never paid more than its due proportion of the expenses of maintaining the city government here. You build large houses. You build a Capitol, at an expense of seven or eight million dollars; but what of that? Does not that increase your responsibility as much as I should increase mine, if I built a house worth $10,000? You put a vast dome on your Capitol, at an expense of $1,250,000; and then you say you must not pay taxes, because you put a dome on your house! Because I put a dome on my house, am I to be exempt from taxation? If the Government is to be exempt from taxation, because it builds fine houses, why should not Mr. Corcoran be exempt, too, because he builds fine houses; not as fine as yours, but still, very creditable houses? Why should not the smallest house builder in the city be exempt from taxation on the same principle? Your duty is not to submit to taxation—that I would not do—but to allow a fair estimate on your property, and make a willing contribution to the support of the municipal government to the amount of what would be your taxes, according to the rate of taxation here. The city government now taxes upon its real and personal property about one hundred and ninety-five thousand dollars annually, and for city purposes you have never paid that amount of money; you do not pay it now; this bill will not bring it up to that. When you make an appropriation of a million of dollars for the Capitol, you are not to charge that to Washington. If you are, why should not Mr. Corcoran, when he builds a house worth $50,000, charge that to Washington?

But I am not going into that discussion; I reserve it for another occasion. I simply protest now that these suggestions are out of place and out of time upon this bill. There is a pressing necessity for acting upon it. What I rose especially to say, was to my friend from Tennessee, that he mistakes when he supposes the city is not doing its duty, and paying its part of the expense. Up to the hour when I speak to you, the city treasury has paid more to guard this city than the national Treasury has paid. The report shows it, and the figures are given; they are officially reported to us. I have seen by the newspapers—I have asked for no official report of it, because I have not had time, and have not thought it necessary—that the city has called out one hundred men. I have no doubt it is true. This bill proposes that you shall call out one hundred. Then you will be on an equal footing with the city. The city has her hundred, and pays them; you have your hundred, and pay them; she guards the day, and you the night.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have no disposition to prolong this debate; but I must say to the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, that he misapprehended my remarks in relation to the duty of the Federal Government to sustain this place, and make provision for the citizens here. He said that we were equally bound to the citizens of St. Louis, or any other citizen of the Union, as to the people of this city. Now, I have no doubt that a very large proportion of the appropriations made here benefit, in a great degree, other cities. The greater portion of the expense for the public buildings is paid, for their erection and embellishment, to mechanics and artists who came from a distance—from Philadelphia, New York, Richmond, and other places. They are the persons who receive the money, not the citizens of Washington; and for that reason the money expended here is not chargeable to Washington. If individuals residing in Washington absorbed all the appropriations made in the District, and all the money paid out here by the Government, doubtless they would be in a better situation, and would have an amount of wealth that would enable them to defray all the expenses incident to a city government. I think there are obligations resting upon us to appropriate money for this District that do not exist elsewhere. Other cities have no immediate connection with the legislative bodies and governmental officers of the United States. This city has; and for that reason it is necessary that appropriations be made here to promote and forward the public business which are not necessary in other cities. They are commercial cities, not dependent on the Government. They do not labor and toil for the Government, and do not receive their pay from it. A large amount of the appropriations made by this Government should be distributed here, because the people whom it employs and pays reside here temporarily, if not permanently. This circumstance makes the expense of city government fall heavily on the resident population, because the employes of the Government are generally from other places. If the property-holders here were to bear all the expenses of the city government, taxation would be exceedingly onerous—much more so than in any other city of the Union. I wish gentlemen to reflect that the money paid out here is not paid to the citizens of Washington city, but to citizens of other places, who are temporarily here; and hence the necessity of occasional provision to relieve the people here from those contingencies that the fact of the Government being located here has produced.

I have no disposition to protract the debate on this subject; but I think it is very manifest that the people of the District are not accountable for all the money disbursed here, but that other cities are to share a portion of the responsibility, whose citizens are recipients of it.

The amendment of Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, as modified, was read, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That a tax sufficient to pay one half of the annual expense incurred by carrying this act into effect, shall be annually assessed upon the real and personal property and polls of the city of Washington, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, who is hereby authorized and directed to make such rules and regulations as shall be necessary for the collection of such tax; and the same shall be assessed and collected in the manner now provided by law for the annual collection of municipal taxes of said city.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BROWN. Now I renew my motion to fill the blank in the eighth section with "$75,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I move to strike out the fifth section of this bill; and I hope the chairman of the committee will consent to it. The bill provides for raising one hundred men, authorizes the President to appoint a chief, and we have appropriated; by the provisions of the bill, $75,000 annually for the purpose. The Senator from Kentucky has warned us to-day against Executive influences and Executive powers. I think we had better strike out the fifth section, which authorizes the President to call out two hundred persons for temporary purposes, at two dollars a day. It is trusting the President with a great deal of power. I do not think it will be necessary; for I believe the raising of the one hundred men, and appropriating $75,000, if the chief is a good officer, and appoints proper men, will accomplish all the Senate desires. I fear that this section, if it remains, will endanger the passage of the bill through Congress. There will be a great deal of opposition to this measure—more than I had anticipated. I think authorizing the President to call out two hundred men for temporary purposes will give no strength to the bill; and I do not believe it will be necessary. Therefore, I move to strike it out.

Mr. BROWN. I want to explain, in a word, to the Senator from Massachusetts why that section was inserted. I suppose one half of the friends of this bill at least, perhaps a larger proportion, think that one hundred men will not be sufficient to keep the peace here at all times, but in ordinary times it will be quite sufficient. The election comes on here in June, and I find whisperings of riot on both sides, apprehensions expressed that you are to have the scenes—I will commence South—of New Orleans, Louisville, Baltimore, Washington, and other places, reenacted. I do not feel exactly authorized to bring in a bill to keep a permanent force here as large as two hundred men, when perhaps the whole force would not be called into actual requisition more than once a year, perhaps not more than once in two years. But if you are to have the scenes of last June reenacted here, then I propose to provide in this bill that the President of the United States, instead of calling out the marines, or any portion of the Army, or anything which is recognized as the military power of this Government, shall simply increase for the time being this auxiliary force. That is all the section means.

Now, is it not better to allow the President, in case of an emergency, to interpose a civil auxiliary force, than to permit him to exercise his discretion in calling out the marines, or any portion of the Army. I have an instinctive horror and dread, which I cannot shake off, of calling in the military power of this Government to take any part in your civil affairs. As I have said before in the course of this debate, it struck me with horror when I heard that the marines had been paraded in the streets of Washington. I know to what dreadful consequences these things must lead. But if we are to have rioting at the next election—and when I speak of rioting, I do not mean to say that this party or that party is more or less to blame—this provision will be necessary. Peaceable, orderly citizens want quiet, and the Government ought to let them have it. This section will give it to them through the peaceful agency of a citizen auxiliary force, the real city police. I cannot consent to give it up. I think it is one of the vital parts of the bill. I have no dream that this additional force will ever be called for, except under the circumstances anticipated by the bill—that in the case of a riot or serious disturbance, the President of the United States may authorize a temporary increase of force, and disband it, as the bill requires, just so soon as the emergency which calls it into existence shall have passed away.

Mr. WILSON. There is a great deal of force in what the Senator from Mississippi says. It may be that there will be riots at the next election here as there were at the last; but I would suggest to the Senator that, if this authority be put in the hands of the President to add a couple of hundred men to this force, to be called out at that particular juncture, it may perhaps be regarded here as having been brought out for the purpose of carrying and controlling the election. I apprehend this may be the case. I do not wish, however, to press this amendment, and I defer a great deal to the judgment of the Senator from Mississippi in this matter. This force of one hundred men, raised for the purpose of watching during the night, can be used to preserve the peace of the city on election day. Besides, as the Senator says, there is a city force of about one hundred men, and the Mayor has it in his power to call on the citizens, and if he is a good officer, fit for his place, he will do so. I think the Senator from Mississippi had better consent to have this section go out of the bill; but, at the same time, I shall not press the matter upon the consideration of the Senate.

I believe good men can be found for this force, and in this I disagree with the Senator from Georgia, who thinks these men will be selected from that class who are making all this trouble. I believe a good chief can find one hundred substantial, law-abiding, God-fearing men; in this city, who will serve for $600 a year, who will perform these duties properly. I believe there are men who read their Bibles, who go to church, who are poor men, in this city, law-abiding men, whom you can hire for $600 a year to watch during the night, who have no sympathy and no connection with rowdism. I have no fear but that you can get good men, if you put a proper officer at the head of the force, and take it out of politics. If the object is to enforce law, and have order and protection in this city, I have no fear about it at all. But I do not see the necessity of this provision, and I think it will weaken the bill in this branch and in the other, for it will be said that it is conferring too much power on the Executive of the United States. I learn that the measure has been before the other House to-day, and that a great deal of opposition was manifested to it there. I withdraw my motion, however, and leave the matter to the chairman of the committee, in whom I have a great deal of confidence.

Mr. BENJAMIN. If the motion is withdrawn, I will renew it. I really do not think this section ought to remain in the bill. I think the Senator from Massachusetts is right in his objections to it. I can see no earthly necessity for the additional corps required by this section of paid policemen. Surely not for the purposes the Senator from Mississippi suggests. If we are to have a riot at an election, if a riot is anticipated, it will be very easy for the night police and the day police, if at all efficient, so to control the polls in so small a city as this as effectually to preserve peace. This section provides for the calling out, in the discretion of the Executive, of an additional body of paid men. Why do you want men paid at two dollars a day for a few hours' service. If it is only for election purposes, the election lasts but a single day, and these riots come up suddenly. Will you have the President authorized in advance to have one hundred men employed on election day at two dollars apiece?

Mr. BROWN. I prefer answering that here. The Senator asks me whether I would have them employed in advance? I say, emphatically, I would. You always have murmurings and grumblings before an election that you are going to have a riot. When you have a proper, efficient force, you can keep down riot. A police force known to be efficient, known to be available, known to be on hand, keep down riot. If last June the power had existed in the President to call out this force, and it had been known that he had exercised the power, there would not have been a musket fired in the city of Washington, nor a drop of blood shed. The Federal city of this great nation would have escaped the odium of being a scene of riot and bloodshed on election day.

Mr. BENJAMIN. If the Senator from Mississippi is right, we had better have a permanent item in the appropriation bill of $400 each year for two hundred policemen on election day; for if it will only require rumors of intended riot at an election to justify the President in employing two hundred men at two dollars each, the rumors will exist undoubtedly.

Mr. BROWN. My friend puts a lower estimate on human nature than I do. I do not suppose these rumors would be put afloat to the extent of influencing the chief of police, and the captain of police, and other persons who would have access on this point to the President of the United States so as to induce him to act unless there were some real danger.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I still think the section is an injurious one, entirely so. If there be any real danger at any time of a riot at an election in the city, which cannot be quelled by the two hundred men of the permanent police, organized in advance, prepared by reason of the antecedent rumors of apprehended riot, I should think an effective temporary police could always be organized without pay. If the citizens of this District would not allow themselves to be organized, or so many of them as might be necessary for preserving the peace on an election day, without being paid at the rate of two dollars per diem, I think the further protection ought to be left to themselves. So far as Congress is concerned, so far as the Representatives of the nation are concerned, I do not see why we should go to this additional expense to protect them in their local elections. If the President of the United States were authorized to call out this additional police force, when violence was apprehended, without pay, I might, perhaps, agree that it would be a salutary provision; but if you put this provision in the bill for pay, however low my estimate of human nature may be, I am satisfied that two hundred men will be called for at every election ever held in Washington. I think it is a bad provision; I believe it will injure the bill, and I do not suppose it adds anything to its efficiency.

Mr. MASON. I should be very averse to striking this provision from the bill. I do not understand that this power is to be invoked only in order to repress riot at elections. If it should become necessary to use it for that purpose, I think it would be very well used on the part of the President; but in framing this bill, with an earnest desire to make it efficient, at the same time there was a desire on the part of the committee not to make it more expensive than the occasion might really call for. Nobody can tell, however, in such a city as this, whether one hundred policemen will be adequate to the ends to be attained by the bill of preserving the peace of the city and the lives of the inhabitants. It is a very large city in space, although not as densely populated as other cities are, but these men may be lurking in every quarter of the city. I confess that I am greatly surprised to find the extent to which they already pervade the city. My purpose was in the humble share I took in preparing the bill in committee, to give a force sufficient, effectually, and at once, to suppress the rapine, the murder which is taking place in every quarter of the city. I presume, therefore, in the exercise of his discretion if it shall be found that one hundred men are not sufficient, the President will at once employ fifty or one hundred more for the very purpose of the bill to afford a police for the city.

So far as riots at elections are concerned, or any other riots, I do not at all sympathize with honorable Senators who have expressed regret that the military arm was called in to suppress these riots. Sir, I have always considered that when men are in arms against the law, whether to prevent an election, or for any other purposes, they were to be treated as enemies, and shot down as such. No power is so effective for that purpose as the military arm. They are to be treated as the worst kind of enemies, for they are insidious domestic enemies, under the garb of friends. I am not one of those who are at all scrupulous in using the military arm when it is necessary to suppress insurrection, treating the insurgents as domestic foes, and treating them as I would treat all other foes.

I think it may be necessary also to insert another provision, and while up I would mention it. I think it has been the purpose of the Senate to make this an efficient bill; but there is one feature wanting to make it an efficient bill, and that is to authorize the proper authorities, if necessary, to employ horses for the purpose of transporting their commanders, or men, from place to place.

At the proper time I may offer an amendment for not a great number—I suppose not to exceed ten. The instances around us occurring every day show that from some quarter or other, whether they have arisen in the midst of this population, whether they have been sent here for the purpose, or whether they come here because they look upon it as a city in a lawless condition, for some reason or other it is manifest there is the most lawless population in our midst that I have known to exist anywhere.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. It is about four o'clock; it is nearly time to adjourn; and I sincerely believe we have had this bill discussed until every gentleman here understands it. I think it is a waste of eloquence to speak any longer about it. I hope very much we shall be able to get the vote now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Louisiana, to strike out the fifth section of the bill.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The suggestions of the Senator from Virginia have had, I say it with due respect to him, the effect of confirming my objections to the section. I thought, originally, this additional force was intended only for an emergency; but, from the argument of the Senator from Virginia, it seems that it is intended to vest a discretion in the President to keep an additional force of two hundred men, if he finds it necessary for the general purposes of the bill. That is a discretion that I would prefer retaining in Congress. I thought, originally, and the Senator from Mississippi so stated, that it was intended for special emergencies; but the Senator from Virginia apprehends that the one hundred we are now voting may not be sufficient for the general purposes of the bill, and, if found insufficient, he proposes to leave to the President the discretion of increasing the number.

Mr. MASON. That is my idea, clearly.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I think we ought not to do that. We ought to determine the proper number.

Mr. BROWN. I would prefer that my friend from Louisiana should judge of the section by what appears on its face, rather than by what my friend from Virginia says. Certainly the language of the bill does not justify any such construction as the Senator from Louisiana assumes that my friend from Virginia meant.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The Senator from Virginia says it does give that construction, and that that was the object.

Mr. BROWN. But what is the fair construction of the language of the section? The words are:

"That whenever, in the judgment of the President of the United States, the same may be required, he be, and is hereby, authorized to order such temporary increase of the guard as in his opinion may be expedient, not to exceed two hundred men, who shall be paid at the rate of two dollars per day while in service, and be dismissed so soon as in the opinion of the President their services may no longer be required."

This shows clearly that it is a mere temporary force which may be called out at an election or on any other occasion, and not to exist any longer than the emergency requires.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I admit that any construction of this section would accord pretty nearly with that of the Senator from Mississippi; but still these words, "temporary service," are of themselves exceedingly vague and indefinite; and it is not at all impossible that, in that appetite for power which pervades public men generally, an Executive might be disposed to give that enlarged and latitudinous construction which strikes the Senator from Virginia to be the correct one. I think, on the whole, this is an objectionable section. I shall say no more on the subject. I have given my ideas to the Senate, and I hope the section will be stricken out.

Mr. HALE. I shall vote against this section, and, it may be, against the whole bill. I vote against it because it is another departure from the great principles of this Government to give the citizens of every place local self-government, and interfere with it as little as possible. This bill is based on the idea that they want some assistance, and it goes on to give that assistance; but this section goes still further, and increases the power of the President. I was opposed to increasing the standing Army for him, as a police force all over the country. That was the ground on which it was put; and I am opposed to increasing this min-istate army in the city of Washington, to be placed under the disposition of the President. This bill, I suppose, is reported with the consent of the city government.

Mr. BROWN. I must say that I considered the city government so inefficient that I never consulted them about it.

Mr. HALE. I supposed it was an admission, on the part of the friends of the bill, that this city corporation was incompetent to carry on the city government; and I wanted to know whether they had confessed it, or whether it was to be taken for granted. It seems they have not pleaded at all, and the chairman of the committee has taken it for granted that they are utterly inefficient. I have no doubt of it—not the slightest in the world. The very fact that they have spent your $20,000 to pay political partisans, instead of appointing policemen, shows that they are utterly incompetent to the duties that are assigned to them. I am opposed, then, to giving the President this power, and I am not entirely certain but that it would be the safest way altogether to postpone this whole matter until next June, and see if there is not in this city a set of men that can take the government of the city in their hands, who are competent and fair and honest, who will faithfully discharge the duties which belong to a city government. I shall vote for striking out this section.

The amendment was rejected; there being on a division—ayes 20, noes 21.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I desire to inquire of the Chair whether it is in order to move to recommit the bill to the committee that reported it, with instructions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Such motion is in order.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Then I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on the District of Columbia, with instructions to report a bill retroceding the District of Columbia to the State of Maryland, reserving the public buildings and public grounds, &c., and that said committee report at the earliest moment practicable.

I have but one object in view. It is, if I can, to impart some efficiency to the police of this city. There is great complaint here that we do not make sufficient appropriations, that Congress has exclusive power of legislation over the District; that we are their guardians, and that we should appropriate whatever they ask. They have no Representative in Congress. Now, if we retrocede this District to the State of Maryland, they can be represented in her Legislature, and have the power to tax themselves, and appropriate the money raised by taxation for all the necessary purposes of the community. The people of that portion of the District ceded by Virginia were anxious to go back to her jurisdiction, and they were retroceded to Virginia by a law passed some years since, and we have never heard any complaints from them since. Pass this District back to Maryland, reserving the public buildings and grounds, and we get clear of all this trouble. I venture to predict now, that if you send this bill back to the committee, with these instructions, with a probability that the Senate will pass a bill of that kind, in four weeks from to-day, there will be an efficient, energetic police in this city, and you will not hear of another murder, or robbery, or assassination during the session of Congress.

Mr. HALE. I move to strike out the reservation in the instructions as to the public buildings and grounds.

The amendment was agreed to.

The motion to recommit as amended was rejected.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. In the eleventh line of the first section I move to amend the bill by striking out "the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate," and inserting "the circuit court of the United States for the District of Columbia," so as to give the appointment of the chief of this force to the circuit court.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; and the amendments agreed to as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I was not exactly satisfied with the vote on the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky; and I now offer that amendment again in the Senate, so as to give the appointment of the chief of this police force to the circuit court of the United States for the District of Columbia, instead of vesting it in the President. I renew that amendment.

Mr. GREEN. I call for the yeas and nays on the amendment. I would rather trust the President and Senate combined than the court by itself. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. The honorable Senator from Missouri took occasion, a little while ago, to give me some instruction as to the unconstitutionality of the provision which I suggested. I dare say his remark would have been appropriate enough if he had not forgotten that this is legislation in relation to the District of Columbia—a territory under the almost unlimited control of Congress in all respects. I should like to know what constitutional inhibition would prevent us from conferring the appointment of this municipal force upon the Vice President and Speaker of the House of Representatives. If I understand the Constitution in regard to the Territories of the United States, there is no power that Congress may not exercise, except that which is forbidden by the Constitution. That is my understanding of the Constitution of the United States, and you have shown it in all your exercise of power. You have shown it particularly in the appointment of judges. The Constitution says that the judicial power shall be exercised by judges holding their office during good behavior. You are not limited by that in respect to the Territories. You appoint the territorial judges for a term of years. The constitutional inhibitions on that subject do not apply to the Territories, nor does any constitutional provision, that I know of, apply to the manner in which we may constitute or choose to appoint an officer as the head of an official force of this kind here. I feel myself bound to suggest this to the honorable Senator for his consideration.

I have heard, and I regret to detain the Senate a moment while I say so, the most extraordinary doctrines urged during this debate. Here is a temporary and momentary exigency demanding an additional police force. In my opinion, it sets a most dangerous example, and involves high principles. You are establishing here, in the heart of this city, a quasi military force. You are doing it, as we are told by one gentleman, especially in respect to elections. We are told by another gentleman that this provision recommends itself to him, because he thinks that persons who engage in election riots, ought to be considered altogether as enemies to the country, the worst of its enemies, and ought to be shot down as such. These doctrines are new. They amaze me, I confess; but we are making provision to shoot down people at elections, are we? Is that the idea, unless they observe a certain course of demeanor and practice a decorum which shall be prescribed by whom? They are at the hazard of their lives to observe it without anybody to teach it! What may be right in the opinion of one gentleman may not be in the opinion of another gentleman. What is right on the part of our political opponents in heated elections is, in the eyes of those who constitute the Opposition, a very different thing. Who is to decide, and who is to shoot first? Upon any principle of equality, I should think both sides ought to have military force ready to shoot down the other, in case of anything occurring which they should decide upon the instant, in the heat of an election, to be a riot.

Sir, these elections of ours do sometimes run into violence, riots, and mobs, that are to be deprecated and condemned, and nobody is more ready to do it than I am. Nobody feels a stronger repugnance to any such course of conduct than I do. The people on all occasions in my country, and that is almost the only place where I have ever seen elections, consider themselves entitled to some little license on that day. It is a free day; it is the day of the election, when a man feels rather fuller of his rights and powers than he does on any other occasion. That is the time the militia are to be ready to shoot him down, if, in the exultation of such feelings, excited feelings, he commits what they would call a riot! I am surprised at the assertion of such sentiments here. We are providing for their suppression with an injunction to shoot them down as the worst enemies of the country! These are entirely new doctrines. I have seen many elections, and I have hardly ever seen a contested election in my country where there has not been more or less of violence, but I never heard any man suggest the propriety of having a military force or a quasi military force in the form of police there to keep the people in order.
